L. K. writes, "Query: The second coming of Christ is declared to be thief-like, (1 Thess. v. 2; Rev. iii. 3,) but viewed in the light of other Scriptures (1 Thess. iv. 16; 2 Peter iii. 10; Rev. vi. 14-17,) is it not a forced conclusion, to say that his coming will be secret, and his doings also secret, after He comes? True, He will take one and leave another, (Luke xvii. 34-36,) for in whatever way He should come, He would not do otherwise; 'the Lord knoweth them that are his,' and these only will He take to himself. Please give an answer that the Scriptures do not gainsay."

The second coming of Christ will occupy a considerable period of time called the day of the Lord; not a natural day, but a dispensational one, the length of which is known only to Him who hath determined the times before appointed. Prophecies relating to this period refer to events which will take place at different intervals, and though seemingly in conflict, when regarded as belonging to the same event, are in perfect harmony as distinct parts of an extended period. Again, events often have different aspects, and predictions relating to the same event may apparently disagree when viewed in but one aspect, and yet are entirely consistent in their distinct relations.

The term second coming of Christ, [illegible] a dispensational period that covers probably more than a hundred years and embraces many events, some contemporaneous, others consecutive, and some having different aspects. If these events appear to us to be in conflict, we may know that we are viewing successive events as contemporaneous, or we are confounding different aspects of the same event.

The second coming of Christ, as an event, will be characterized by two particular epochs or stages, clearly defined:

1. The coming from the holiest of all to the atmosphere of this earth, where his saints will meet Him, and He will manifest himself to them and not to the world.

2. The coming from the air to the earth with his saints; for when He shall appear, or be manifested to the world, they shall also appear with Him in glory.

At the first stage of his coming the dead saints will be raised and the living saints changed and caught up together in the clouds to meet him, and remain with him in the air, unseen by the world until the second stage of his coming.

It is the first stage of his coming which, in the first class of texts referred to, is said to be thief-like, and that because, first, as a thief comes at an unexpected time, and in an unobserved manner, so will this stage of Christ's coming be to an ungodly world and a secularized church. 1 Thess. v. 1-3; but the prepared and watchful Christian will not be overtaken by it, verse 4. Second, as a thief takes something out of the house, so Christ will take the saints out of the earth to meet Him in the air. Up to this point the coming will be to the world as a thief in the night. And Rev. iii. 3, is an admonition to all who profess to be Christ's, to watch lest, otherwise, He should come upon them as a thief, and they should be left with the hypocrites and unbelievers. So also, Rev. xvi. 15. "Behold, I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garment, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame;" for the shame of all such will be exposed by being left in the earth when the saints are taken out of it.

Now, in the second class of texts referred to, there is no contradictions of the conditions of the first class; for they relate to conditions of a different time and aspect of the coming. Hence, when Paul, in 1 Thess. iv. 16, says that "the Lord, himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the arch-angel and with the trump of God," he speaks of conditions belonging to the second stage of the coming, when "them that sleep in Jesus shall he brought with him." Verse 14. The argument is that if all the saints shall be brought with Christ when He appears at the second stage of his coming, they must all be first raised and changed and caught up to meet Him in the air. The Greek word proiou in this passage is not used to indicate that the dead in Christ will be raised before the rest of the dead, for that has no bearing on the argument, but that they must be raised before they can come with Him at his revelation from heaven; and at the same time the living saints will be changed. So that the shout the voice and the trump belong not to the thief-like stage of the coming, but particularly to the second stage of it, as may be seen by Jer. xxv. 30-33; Zech. ix. 14; xiv. 1-5.

Nevertheless, when the saints shall have been taken out of the earth, there will be great consternation among the people as to what has become of them; and then, as the master of the house knows by the loss of his goods and the state of his house that the thief has been there; so the world will know by the translation of the saints that Christ has come to the air where they are to meet Him. And this will be the first ring of the shout, the first echo of the voice, the first clangor of the tramp, by which will be announced the coming of the day of the Lord. It will be the sign of the Son of Man in heaven, the evidence that He hath come to the air, and hath taken his saints to himself, and will cause many to prepare for his coming with his saints. But after a while they will sink into a general forgetfulness of it, so that the second stage of his advent will come upon them as unexpectedly as the first; as illustrated by the parable of the ten virgins. Hence the declaration by Paul and Peter "that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night," while it unquestionably applies to the initial steps of the first stage of the coming, has an application also to the unexpectedness of the second stage, when, at the sacking of Jerusalem, "the Lord shall be seen over them, and his arrow shall go forth as the lightning," and He shall come and all the saints with Him.

The passing away of the heavens with a great noise, the melting of the elements with fervent heat, and the burning up of the earth, are figures employed to denote the overthrow and termination of all worldly governments, the reduction of all their official grades to the common mass and the subversion of all their possessions; to be succeeded by the kingdom of heaven, the exaltation of the saints with Christ as kings and priests unto God, and the possession of the whole earth as their territory, and all nations as their subjects; being the new heavens and new earth which according to his promise we look for.

In conclusion, we see that the figure "as a thief in the night" has its appropriate application to the initial steps of both stages of Christ's coming; and does not conflict with the effects and manifestations which follow in the progress of the coming and are represented by different but appropriate figures.—Prophetic Times.

"Bought" and "Redeemed."

The term (agorazo) in the original was derived from the word that signifies market-place, (agora) and supplies to the mind the ample idea of a mercantile transaction, in which a certain price is paid for something without reference to any special condition in which the thing paid for existed at the time of transaction. The term "redeemed" (lutroo) in the original is derived from the word that signifies to loose, or release (luo) and thus supplies to the mind the additional idea of release from captivity through the price paid for the one in question. The terms therefore are not convertible, and their use in Scripture is very exact, and most interesting and important to notice.

All men have been bought by the Lord Jesus, and the price paid for them is his blood, and hence they all belong to him in that way. The merchantman, in the parable, bought the whole field to get the treasure in it, and the field, we are told, is the world. So Christ, in the way of price, gave himself a "ransom for all," and upon this ground the gospel goes out to all men, as that which is available for them if they will receive it. In this connection we read of those who deny "the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction," speaking of those who reject Christ, and refuse the value of his blood. All this is a question of being "bought" in the way of a mercantile transaction, and does not necessarily involve salvation, as the verse quoted above proves.

When salvation is in question, those bought are spoken of as "redeemed," because in their case the price paid,—the blood of Christ, stands in relation with the idea of release, as the means by which they are brought out from under the power of the one that held them in captivity: as when we speak of a slave being redeemed from slavery. Hence when Peter speaks of believers he says, "Forasmuch as ye know ye were not redeemed with corruptible things as silver and gold, from your vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers; but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot."

Christ has title over all men in two ways: 1st, as Creator, and 2d, as Purchaser; but He is the Redeemer only of those who believe in Him, of those who can say, "In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of our sins."—Sound Words.

Obstacles in the Truth.

Among the obstacles to the prevalence of the truth we may enumerate the following:

1. Prejudice.—The judgment is often formed without light—without evidence. And should the truth be presented to a mind thus pre-occupied, before it can lodge there it has an obstacle to encounter and remove of a very formidable magnitude. The strength of prejudice is amazing. Though assailed by reason, and argument, and revelation, it often remains as deeply rooted and vigorous as ever. Nay, it is frequently nourished by the very efforts which are made for its destruction.

2. Pride of Opinion.—When a man has formed an opinion and committed himself to its support, his mind is fortified against the reception of evidence showing that his opinion is false. Though he may feel himself unable to answer the objections which are urged against his views, he still clings to it with the most obstinate tenacity. His pride of opinion revolts at the thought of a change. It would be to him a weakness, a degradation to which he cannot submit.

3. Authority.—There are but few minds which think for themselves, and form their judgment independent of others. Whether they will acknowledge it or not, almost every man has his Magnus Apollo, to whom he listens as to an Oracle. And whatever changes the responses of his Oracle may undergo, he changes with it, and echoes its last dicta.

4. Education.—When the mind is in its forming state, it takes readily the impressions which are made upon it, and retains them through after-life in all their distinctness and vigor. Hence erroneous impressions early made are apt to be enduring. And it is here that truth meets the firmest resistance.

5. Interest.—What multitudes are governed by calculations of profit and loss, in forming their opinions! And by habitually acting upon these sordid principles, are given over to believe a lie.

6. Personal Attachments.—Man is a social being, and has his favorites, who insensibly exercise a control in the formation of his opinions.

7. Personal Aversions.—When the truth comes from the lips of those we hate, the resistance to it is far greater than if it proceeded from a different source.

8. Consciousness of Error.—This often prevents men from coming to the light, lest their deeds should be reproved. They love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil. And though conscious of their error, they are not willing to confess and forsake it.

9. The Dread of Ridicule.—How many are prevented from entertaining the truth because it will expose them to the ridicule of their companions. They had rather endure the pangs of a wounded conscience than the scoffs of the wicked.

A Bath in the Dead Sea.

Mr. C. A. Kingsbury writes as follows, in "Forest and Stream," of a bath in the Dead Sea:

Reaching at last this most remarkable of all the seas and lakes on our globe, we prepared to take a bath—and such a bath I can hardly expect ever to take again. I had previously bathed in numerous seas, lakes and rivers, but never did I enjoy such a bath as this. The specific gravity of the water is such from its holding in solution so large a proportion of salt that one floats upon its surface like a cork. At the time there was only a gentle ripple upon the sea, and being a good swimmer I at once struck out into deep water. I soon found that I could not only swim and float with wonderful ease, but that I could actually walk in the water, sinking only to the arm-pits. Discovering this fact I made for the shore, and taking by the hand one of our party who could not swim, led him out where the water was many fathoms deep. At first he was quite reluctant to follow me, but he soon gained confidence on finding there was no danger of sinking, and enjoyed the novel bath as much as if he had been an expert swimmer. Should the bather allow water to get into his eyes or mouth he would suffer considerable abatement in his enjoyment, on account of its extremely salt, bitter and irritating nature. No fish can live in this sea; but various kinds of ducks abound here at certain seasons of the year. The water was as clear as ordinary sea water, its temperature was agreeable, and it has an oily feeling, and altogether its action on the surface of the body was such as to develop those pleasurable sensations pertaining to the sense of touch, accompanied by the most delightful exhilaration. Of all the baths in the world, give me a bath in the Dead Sea.

Exploration in Palestine.

The surveyors of Palestine are now engaged in the south, which they expect to finish off before the summer. The winter has been one of unexampled severity, and field work was necessarily suspended for some time. As regards the collection of names, Lieut. Condor reports that he has, up to the present, a list of nearly 2,000 in Arabic. The most important of the recent identifications proposed in his last letters is that of Bethabara, the place where John baptized. The word means simply the "house of the crossing over," or ford, and therefore might apply to many points in the course of the Jordan. The place has generally been identified with Bethnimrah, but Lieut. Condor shows that this site is too far south, one condition being that Bethabara should be within a two days' journey of Cana in Galilee. Upwards of fifty fords of the Jordan have been found in the progress of the survey, only eight of which appear in the latest map. Among them, at a distance of twenty-five miles from Nazareth, is one called Makhadet Abara, the "ford of the crossing over." It is described by Lieut. Condor as one of the principal northern fords; the great road descending Wady-Jalud on its northern side, and leading to Gilead and the south of the Hauran passes over it; the river bed is more open than at other places, and the steep banks of the upper valley further reduced, leaving a broad place for the collection of the great crowd which followed John the Baptist. There are no traces of the ancient village on the spot, but then there are hardly any ruins, except of Christian times, in the Jordan valley. If the identification is accepted, another difficulty in Biblical typography will be removed. Lieut. Condor thinks the Bethabara of the Book of Judges must not be confounded with the Bethabara of the New Testament. The new number of the "Quarterly Statement" of the Palestine Fund, now in the press, contains his paper on this site. Among the other papers are an account of the German excavations in the Muristan, those of Mr. Henry Maudsley on Zion, showing the old scarp of the rock and the course of the first wall; the complete survey of Tell Jezer, where M. Clermont Ganneau discovered the boundary stones of Gezer; and a paper on a subject rarely touched upon, the mediæval typography of Palestine.—Academy

Unanswerable Objections.

If the soul is immortal, or an undying part of man,—it must survive the death of the body.

It is, or it is not, the conscious part.

If it is not,—then the dead are dead, soul and body, and both are mortal.

If it is the conscious part,—it is the only part God ever spake to; how, then could he say to immortality—thou shalt surely die?

If the soul is immaterial, it is not material. Immateriality cannot die a material or literal death.

If the soul dies a spiritual death, it must be spiritually mortal. For nothing can die, except what is mortal.

If the soul is a spiritual thing, and immortal, it must have spiritual immortality; then it cannot die a spiritual death.

If literal death destroys a literal thing,—spiritual death destroys a spiritual thing.

Again, if the soul is the conscious part, it is the only part capable of sinning, and the only part that incurs or suffers the penalty of the law. This penalty is death.

A death that does not kill, is no death at all. Neither does it mend the matter to say the soul is spiritually killed; for if the soul is spirit, it cannot be killed any other way than spiritually. And spiritually killing a spiritual thing, is the same as literally killing a literal thing. So the penalty of the law is death. If it is not just that, it is just nothing, as we have shown, and we are at liberty to sin without fear of punishment of any kind.—Age of Gospel Light.

Family Troubles.

Among all the follies of the present day, none are more marked than the matrimonial infelicities that so curse the world. People who are miserable when they are apart, think they will be happy when they are together; and then finding themselves miserable when together, they think they will be happy if they can only get apart. So they shift the bed, and keep the pain. The fact is, the devil is in them, and they are miserable anywhere, whether single, married, or divorced. And the most of the misery they enjoy is the fruit of their own faults or follies. Good husbands make good wives, and good wives make good husbands; and any man who regards his wife as his inferior, or boasts of his superiority over her, will do well to remember that he showed something of the extent of his wit in picking out a fool for a wife, while wives making the same complaints may participate in the same consolation.

"Trouble in the family!" Well, who does not have trouble in the family! Do not all people have troubles, trials, and vexings, and temptations, and faults to deal with? But is that any reason why people should make fools of themselves, and quarrel, and separate, and spread scandal and discord on every hand? We all have troubles; let us bear them with patience and love, and let us remember that in married life as everywhere else, we are to overcome evil with good, and conquer all difficulties in the spirit of Christian fidelity and tenderness.

A gentleman who did not live very happily with his wife decided to procure a divorce, and took advice on the subject from an intimate friend, a man in high social standing. "Go home and court your wife," said the wise adviser, "and then tell me the result." They bowed in prayer and separated. When another year had passed away the once complaining husband came again to see his friend, and said: "I have called to thank you for the good advice you gave me, and to tell you that we are as happy as when first we were married. I cannot be grateful enough for your good counsel." "I am glad to hear it, dear sir," said the other, "I hope you will continue to court your wife as long as you live."

A fortnight of honest, careful, loving effort on the part of husband or wife, would heal nine-tenths of the family broils and sad troubles that curse the world to-day; and if both would join in the endeavor, they could as a rule, settle their difficulties in fifteen minutes, and be at peace among themselves as long as they live.—The Christian.

The Bible and Creeds.

It is not to be assumed by the Christian or the infidel, that we have in fact, in our creeds and in our interpretation of the Bible, precisely the system that was revealed. That we have the true record in the Bible we are to believe, and the infidel may hold us to that; but that we have the proper interpretation of that record is not to be assumed as certain.

Christianity has been transmitted to us from a far distant age. It has come in contact with all the philosophical systems in the world. Its outward form has been much molded by philosophy—much by its alliance with the state. The synods and councils that have determined the creeds of the church have been, like other assemblies, composed of imperfect men—often of men more under the influence of philosophy than religion; often ignorant of the plainest rules of exegesis; and often seeking rather to establish a hierarchy than to promote the kingdom of Christ. As a matter of fact, we know that during that long period there is no absurdity of doctrine or interpretation which has not been embraced by the church; almost no error which has not been sanctioned by the synods and councils; almost no truth the belief of which has not exposed him who held it to persecution by the church itself.

Christianity has thus come down to us through the descent of eighteen centuries, collecting in its progress whatever of good or bad there might be that could in any way be made to adhere to it; adopting as its own the opinions in mental philosophy, and the doctrines of conscience, true or false, which have prevailed in the world; and uniting all in its symbols of faith,—making the church at large, a vast and monstrous conglomeration of original sacred truth, and of the error and absurdities which the world has accumulated in the lapse of ages.

It is a ship, not now sailing out of port, fresh, and new, and clean, but one that has sailed afar, and has collected in distant seas, whatever of barnacles and sea-weed could be made to adhere to it. Those barnacles and that sea-weed must be detached from it if the ship is to be made to traverse safely distant seas again. A great part of the work of the church in modern times, has been to detach from it the errors and corruptions which it had accumulated in the long period of its history. This was, in fact, the main service which Luther rendered to the church, restoring it in a great measure to its pristine beauty, and purity, and vigor.

This is the service which has been rendered by modern sacred criticism: this is the work to be done by the efforts to secure a correct text of the Bible; this the work to be done by the application of the canons of criticism to the word of God.—Albert Barnes.

"That the Spirit may be Saved."

"Paul...over such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus."—1 Cor. v. 5.

This text is often quoted to prove that the spirit, abstractly considered, is to be saved; or, in other words, that the spirit, without the body, possesses consciousness, and is capable of being saved in that separate state. But this conclusion cannot be reasonably deduced from the text, for it does not read, "That the spirit may be saved at death;" but "in the day of the Lord Jesus;" and in that day the spirit and body are to exist in an unclothed state, as our opponents admit; hence, the whole man is to be saved at one and the same time. If the spirit is not saved till the "day of the Lord Jesus," it cannot be saved in a separate state, for body and spirit will then be together; hence, the text contains no proof of the separate existence of the spirit.

What Language Did Adam Speak.

Prof. Bush, the distinguished Hebraist, in his "Notes" on Gen. xi. 1. "And the whole earth was of one language, and of one speech," has the following interesting remark:

"The language there spoken therefore, was in all probability the language of Noah, and the language of Noah can scarcely have been any other than that of the antediluvians; and that this was the Hebrew cannot well be doubted, if we consider that the names of persons and places mentioned in the early history of the world are as pure Hebrew as the names of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, or those of Solomon or Malachi. Thus Adam, Eve, Cain, Seth, Abel; Eden, Nod, Enoch, etc., are all words of purely Hebraic form, structure, and signification, and there is not the least evidence of their being interpretations, as some have suggested, of primitive terms."

To Avoid Calumny.

"If anyone speaks ill of thee, said Epictitus, "consider whether he has the truth on his side; if so, reform thyself, that his censures may not affect thee." When Anaximander was told that the very boys laughed at his singing, "Ay," said he, "then I must learn to sing better." Plato, being told that he had many enemies who spoke ill of him, said, "It is no matter; I will live so that no one shall believe them." Hearing at another time than an intimate friend of his had spoken detractively of him, he said, "I am sure he would not do it if he had not some reason for it." This is the surest, as well as the noblest way of drawing the sting out of a reproach, and the true method of preparing a man for that great and only relief against the pains of calumny—a good conscience.

—The duty of personal independent investigation is thus significantly set forth by an English writer of repute: "He who refrains from inquiry lest it should involve unpleasant consequences to himself; lest it should alienate some whom he loves, or bring reproach upon his own good name, is loving himself better than the truth; and shrinking from that particular form of self-denial which is essential to the exercise of true charity towards those whom he believes to be in error. Tenderness to the weak, though a high duty, is by no means the highest nor is it the only one that has a just claim to be regarded."—Selected by W. H. S.

A veteran observer says, "I never place much reliance on a man who is always telling what he would have done had he been there. I have noticed that somehow this kind of people never get there."

An English barrister who was accustomed to train students for the practice of law, and who was not himself a religious man, was once asked "why he put students, from the very first to the study and analysis of the most difficult parts of the sacred scriptures?" "Because," said he, "there is nothing else like it in any language, for the development of mind and character."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Communications.—The Editor must not be understood as endorsing all the sentiments expressed by correspondents whose articles are inserted under this head. Each writer is alone responsible for the articles bearing his own signature. If the teaching of any writer is not endorsed, an article setting forth the views of the party differing may be forwarded. Free discussion of Bible doctrines on all's duly will be allowed, but the Editor reserves the privilege of criticising those communications which antagonize a belief and obedience of the Gospel as a means of salvation, or which undermine its principles.

The Resurrection of Christ.

The words of the Lord, that he must go up to Jerusalem and die (Matt. xvi. 21-23), were not acceptable to the disciples. They wanted the golden splendors and triumphant pomp of the promised visible kingdom; but they were not willing that such glories should come through darkness and suffering. In the weakness of the flesh they shrank from any baptism in blood, or in water.

Hence Peter—the ardent and impulsive—took the master to task, "Be it far from thee, Lord; this shall not be unto thee;" and was humbled by the stinging reply, "Get thee behind me, satan, (adversary), thou art an offence unto me; for thou savorest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men."

Kingdoms of men which originate upon earth—kingdoms of iron force and cruel fraud—may be established either by congress, conquest, or colonization; and in their best forms they are imperfect and transitory. But the great kingdom of justice and truth, wherein liberty and law find perfect reconciliation, must be founded first in spiritual form in the human soul; for the materials which are to endure through eternity require vast moral preparation. But neither prophets nor apostles erred in declaring, as a fact, the coming of a visible political dominion—extending from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth,—wherein all the dreams of prophets, poets, and sages, may find more than accomplishment in immaculate justice and divinest freedom; the throne glorious and unsullied, the people loyal, peaceful and blessed forever. Indeed, the truth which regenerates and takes root in the human heart would be wanting in the prime element of power, if it failed in the end to subdue and transfigure to itself all external things. The foolish declamation of preachers about the rapture and glory of the disembodied, contains neither philosophy or divinity, but is equally hostile to reason and revelation.

Men's minds have been turned away from labor in the legitimate province, and their time and strength have been wasted by seeking to glean in a field where there is nothing but stubble. Revelation does not introduce us into vapor and cloud-land, but distinctly reveals that in the present we are training not only for spiritual blessedness, but for august power and royal dominion. Hence, according to our advancement in the life divine, and in substantial service rendered to humanity and to God, we are promised dominion over five cities or ten when the Lord appears in the Resurrection Kingdom. The little flock are not to fear, for it is the Father's good pleasure to give them the Kingdom. They are kings and priests, and in power and consecration shall reign on the earth.

There is a chapter in John, rich in the moral sublime, which makes known how the True Shepherd of humanity would be revealed, and how he might be Exalted. All that came before him were thieves and robbers, who came but to mangle and to steal; ambitious self-seekers, who gather around them materials for the burning, that deceivers and deceived may perish in one ruin. The sheep did not hear them. But the true shepherd came by the door of self-sacrifice. "The good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep." There never was love like his love, and there is clearly such preparation of the soil, such nurture of heart and soul in the training school of God, that the sheep can distinguish the voice of the good shepherd, and will not follow a stranger. Their senses are fully exercised, and their spiritual instinct is sure; and they follow him into a pasture where the emerald is unfading and the water of life perpetual.

But there is in the chapter a glimpse of resurrection as well as sacrificial death. Christ said of his life: "No man taketh it from me, * * * * I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again."

We see, then, how the divine persons concur in the scheme of redemption. God the Father raised him up, as many passages declare. The Spirit of holiness quickened him. But he likewise had equal share in the resurrection work. It was not possible that he should be holden of the bonds of death. He manifested his power by taking life again. He laid down that life a voluntary victim; he closed his eyes in death, and was enclosed in the rock; but the illustrious prisoner knew that he must open his eyes again at the appointed hour, and when that hour struck he shook off the lethargy of death and came forth victorious from the grave.

The Gentiles, especially the most cultivated, were slow to apprehend the idea of resurrection from the dead.

Their Elysian fields, for disembodied souls to wander in, stood in the way. The body was little better than the unsightly grub which was to crack and let out the winged thing of gold and purple for the glory of the summer life.

While Paul once waited at Athens, his spirit was stirred within him when he saw the city wholly given to idolatry. The philosophers of the Stoic and Epicurean schools encountered him. The Stoics had added as little to divine virtue as the Epicureans had to solid pleasure, but they concurred in considering Paul as a futile babbler, and looked upon him as a setter forth of strange gods, "because he preached unto them Jesus and the resurrection." So dimly did they apprehend the matter, that they supposed he was setting forth two additional gods, Jesus being one, and the Anastasis, or resurrection, the other.

In Paul's memorable discourse, delivered at Areopagus, one important phase of the resurrection is presented. The resurrection of Christ from the dead is the public pledge or assurance, given by God to all men that there shall be a solemn winding-up period—a righteous judgment day:

"God now commandeth all men everywhere to repent; because he hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men in that he hath raised him from the dead." Acts xvii. 30-31.

The resurrection reality was not easily held fast by those whose minds he had debauched by Gentile speculations, for it was not a thing which philosophy could prove or reason explain. Hence Hymenæus and Philetus were subverting the faith by teaching that the resurrection was past already, and the apostle had to deliver them unto satan that in the penal and cold darkness outside they might learn not to blaspheme.

In like manner some of the Corinthians were drifting away from their moorings by saying that there was no resurrection of the dead. Paul shows most powerfully the consequences of such a conclusion, for it followed by necessity that if there was no resurrection of the dead then Christ had not risen, the preaching of the Gospel was vanity and falsehood; the faith of the converts superstition and delusion; forgiveness a dream, and eternal life a lie; for the living were yet in their sins, and the dead had utterly perished. It is likely that this exhibition of consequences would alarm the speculators, and that they would draw back with horror from the gulf they were approaching.

There is another view of the matter presented in the Epistle to the Ephesians well adapted to nourish quiet confidence and abounding gladness of heart. The apostle says that we may know "the exceeding greatness of God's power towards us, according to the working of his mighty power which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead." Ephesians i. 18-21.

In periods of exceptional blasphemy and rebuke, in days of sore tribulation and great darkness, we sometimes half doubt the reality of the hidden power which is to strike down the mystery of evil and quell the giant forces of sin and ruin. Occasionally a desolate feeling creeps over us, as if we were well nigh forsaken, and the earth abandoned to the revel of wrong-doers. In Ephesians the needed consolation is provided. The scale is given for the measurement of power, and according to this scale we may judge "the exceeding greatness of God's power which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead and set him at his own right hand." In similar majestic working shall the power of God shine forth, victorious over every hostile force, that the kingdom of eternity may be revealed in withering bloom and lustre.—Our Hope.

The Final Residence of the Redeemed.

Where is it? Is it on high? Up yonder? Above the sky? On some remote orb? So we are often told. But we are no wiser; for, after all, no locality is designated.

The final residence of the redeemed is this earth. That is the doctrine of the Bible, everywhere. Not this earth, as it now is, polluted by sin and blighted, and burned by the cursed, but this earth as it shall be after the devil and his angels, sin and death and the grave, have been cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, and is restituted to purity, beauty, and glory, surpassing those in which it shone when it emerged from the plastic wing of the Spirit brooding over chaos,—sparkling with brighter jewelry than the pristine dewy brilliants of holiness, bridal-robed in the smiles of Him who redeemed it with his blood, and vocal with his praise, never to be disturbed by the sin of man; then this earth will be the fit and final home of the redeemed.

This is distinctly taught in God's covenant with Abraham, when he says, "I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan for an everlasting (eternal) possession; and I will be their God." This land Abraham and his seed have not yet got; but, to secure the fulfillment of this covenant, God has sworn that he will bring them up out of their graves that they may possess it. From this covenant with Abraham, and which was renewed with Isaac and Jacob and their seed after them, it is manifest that this earth is to be their everlasting residence. Could God have declared it in stronger terms? If they are to inhabit the earth forever, after they are raised from the dead, or come up out of their graves, if then it is to be given to them for an everlasting possession, it is evident this earth must be the place of their everlasting residence. So says Ezekiel xlii. 8-25. "And they shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob my servant, wherein your fathers have dwelt; and they shall dwell therein, even they, and their children, and their children's children (perpetual generations) forever (to eternity), and my servant David (or the beloved, that is, Christ) shall be their Prince forever (or eternally)." If language could teach eternal residence of the resurrected children of Abraham in Canaan upon this earth; for it is most positively declared by Jehovah that they and their children's children, through unceasing generations, shall dwell therein forever. But all the saved are to be with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom; consequently this earth will be the kingdom and the final residence of the saints.

The same doctrine is clearly taught by Dan. vii. 27, "The Kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the Kingdom under the whole heavens shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose Kingdom is an everlasting Kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him." The Kingdom under the whole heaven must mean this earth, for we know of no other kingdom under the heaven, and the Bible speaks of none, and this kingdom is to be given to the saints. It is peculiarly worthy of notice that this kingdom is not on high, nor away up yonder, as the Kingdom of the saints is frequently said to be, but under the heavens. Here is the common teaching of men and that of the Spirit of God are in direct conflict. Men say the final residence of the redeemed is on high,—above the heavens—somewhere (but they know not where) in the unexplored regions of space; but Daniel, by the Spirit, positively teaches it is under the heavens; that is, the Kingdom which the God of heaven shall set up upon this earth, and which shall never be destroyed, but which shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms upon earth, and which shall stand forever or to eternity. The same doctrine is taught by John in Rev. xi. 15. "The kingdoms of this world (earth) are to become the Kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ; and he shall reign forever and ever." It is a common saying, and oft a used to conceal our ignorance, "Where Christ is, there will be heaven." We admit the truth; it is herein taught that the kingdoms, not of a world on high, or above the sky, but of this world, earth, are to become the Kingdom of Christ, and that here he is to reign forever and ever, or to eternity and eternity. If, then, Christ is to be on this earth forever, when renewed, and his dwelling place is to be the dwelling place of the redeemed, then beyond all controversy this earth is to be the final dwelling place of his saints.

This doctrine is everywhere taught in the Prophets, the Psalms, the Gospels, the Epistles, and Revelation of John; but we shall not attempt at present to present it nor exhibited in these. Enough has been said to convince every unprejudiced student of the Bible that this earth, restituted at the time of the restitution of all things, will be the final home and everlasting dwelling place of the redeemed.

Instead, then, of looking for home beyond the skies, to which we are to be taken by Christ after the Judgment, of which the Bible says not a word (for it never says that Christ will leave this earth after he comes to judgment) let us be looking for the renewal of this earth, which shall be accomplished at the times of the restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy Prophets since the world began, and for which Prophets and Apostles, according to the promise of God, with one hope, and faith looked; for this will be our glorious dwelling place forever. Then his tabernacle will be with us, and our communion with him will be more intimate than that of Adam and Eve with him in Paradise before the fall. Here, on this earth, the second Adam, the Lord from heaven, with his glorious Bride,—the redeemed children of men,—will dwell forever and ever.—Selected by H. J. Miller.

Where I Stand.

In a recent number of the RESTITUTION I saw a short article purporting to set forth the past and present theological whereabouts of Isaiah Hornaday, which does not fairly represent him; but I do not charge any misrepresentations intentionally, but not knowing, and with the Editor's permission, I will, for their benefit and the satisfaction of others, make a correction of some things contained in said article.

He says that I claim that Christ made his second personal appearance at the destruction of Jerusalem, raised all the apostles from the dead and took them to glory and that was the end of the world spoken of by Jesus and his apostles.

Isaiah Hornaday will state what he does verily believe and that is this:

When Jesus arose from the dead the graves of many of the old saints were opened and they came out and went into the city and were seen of many and I believe they were taken into the heavens and are now there and that after near the destruction of the Judean commonwealth and city, Christ gathered together his elect, all the Abraham's living and dead from Abel to that time, who had not been previously taken (except the apostle John) changed them from mortality to immortality, and took them into the heavens with himself, and with them came in power and great glory visible to his saints—his elect, but invisible to the Jewish world in general, and Titus with his armies were their instruments to execute the judgments decreed and written against that nation of hypocrites and whited sepulchres, and He thus judged and ruled them until the powers of their heavens (political) were shaken, their sun turned into darkness, their moon into blood and their stars fell to the earth; and thus ended Deity's world of worlds and nation of nations, that He created out of the loins and flesh of Abraham, and the Bible from the 12th chapter of Genesis to the last epistle of John is simply a brief history of the dealings of Deity with that nation religiously and politically in covenants in promises in blessings in curainge, in punishments and reverses; but lastly by the administration of Jesus and his brethren that order of things has closed, that world has ended, and they put under the foot of the Gentiles until their times are full. Then Israel will come to the surface again, and tread down the Gentiles for a thousand years.

But a few words in relation to the personal coming of Jesus.

Did He promise a literal personal coming to any but his saints? Evidently not. Hear his last words as He left them: "Ye men of Galilee, (his disciples followed him) why stand ye gazing up into heaven; you shall see this same Jesus descend in like manner" And so they did, when He came and took them into the heavens with Him, but if He ever made such declarations to his enemies, I have no recollection of it. But they should see Him as they saw Deity in the armies of Nebuchadnazzar, when he laid waste and desolate their land and city, and led them captive into Babylon seventy years. Was Deity there? Yes. Did they see Him in person? No. Did God perform these works? Yes; through the instruments He had selected, just as He has always done and will do in the future. To my mind it is nonsense to presume that Christ will come to earth in person, clothed with immortality and a divine nature, and take up his abode with mortal men, and sit on a literal throne as the Czar of Russia, and walk and talk, mix and commingle with mortals as He did while clothed with the flesh of Mary. Is that the way Deity has heretofore accomplished his purposes? No. When Israel had become rebellious, and He wanted them chastised He did not select one of his immortal ones in the heavens, but selected an old heathen idolatrous king of Babylon that had neither knowledge of God or his purposes, and made him do it. When He wanted them returned back to their land, He selected another earthly king for the purpose, and made him do it. When He wanted the children of Abraham delivered out of Egypt, He did not send Michael to do it but selected Moses, one of their own nation, and accomplished it through him. When He wanted a former ruler for Israel He did not dispatch an immortal messenger from the heavens, but sent Samuel the prophet, to the house of Jesse, and called in a shepherd boy from minding his father's sheep, heard and made him the king and the sweet singer of Israel.

Have we got to believe that the Father, Jesus and the angels cannot operate, govern and control nations and kingdoms, turn and overturn the same without being personally present? When David ruled Israel did he do it or did the Lord do it through him? God ruled invisibly hid in David, but manifest in power and wisdom through him.

When Israel is to be ruled again Deity will select one from their own nation, as a second David, and will invisibly in person, but visible in power and wisdom rule them for one thousand years.

Let me here frankly admit that after having canvassed this subject over for the last twenty years, I never expect nor look for Jesus to come to earth in person, and no mortal eye will ever behold Him in person, that mortality and immortality do not dwell together or live in the same locality, and they that are looking for Him to come in that way and manner will be terribly disappointed in the future as many have been in the past.

But the Editor asks why did Jesus take all the rest of the apostles and leave John to die a martyr?

That was the very thing that troubled the rest of the apostles when they asked Jesus how it was that He had said that John should not die. He told them He did not say so. But if I will that he tarry till I come what is that to you? John xxi. 23. And the history clearly proves to my mind that he did keep and preserve John until his coming and the destruction of Jerusalem and placed him in the Roman earth together with the remnant of the church that had not ripened ready for the harvest and placed John over them as their teacher, and to them through John Jesus made known to them in brief the history of the Roman or Gentile world, religiously and politically, from that time to its close, together with the restoration of Israel, and their government over the Gentiles for one thousand years. If that is not why He did not take John with the balance I have failed to see it.

Again the Editor says: If Christ came at the destruction of Jerusalem, and took all the saints to glory why did He not take the saints at Antioch, at Rome, at Ephesus, at Thessalonica and other Roman cities? One would naturally conclude from the above questions that he expected Jesus to personally come to Jerusalem and get the saints that were there, then personally travel to Antioch and get those that were there, then to personally travel to Rome and get those that were there, and from there to Ephesus and get those that were there, and so on until He had personally visited every city where there had been a church established. While I read that it was to be done by the sound of a trumpet and the voice of the archangel that was to awake them, and they to meet Him in the air. Again I read that He shall send his angels, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds from one end of heaven to the other.

Again the Editor says, How did it happen that all these things took place, and no one but brother Hornaday found it out? Doubtless, he fixed out some plan by which to save himself. In regard to the latter he is much mistaken for I will here say I do not expect to be either saved or lost, for these phrases are not applicable to us, for I will not be saved or lost before I could be saved or lost, for no knowledge of ever having been lost, therefore I cannot be saved, but the nation of Israel to whom these declarations had been made, had been covenanted to Deity and had become sinners, and unless redeemed and saved, they must of course be lost and that is the very good reason why Jesus and the apostles were sent out to preach the Gospel to them, for there had been an offering made for them for the first time in their nation's history, that could take away sin.

Now I have written the above as an outline of the things I do believe, without giving but little quotations from the Bible, but if the Editor will publish this and give me the liberty, I will furnish plenty, as plain and simple as the English language can make it, for it was the burthen of all that Jesus and the apostles taught, and it is evident that they fully believed that some of the churches they wrote to would live to see the consummation of the whole matter, and they themselves immortalized,

Prayer is a power to which the Divine agency condescends to submit itself, and which in some measure seems even to share with God the empire of the universe. Before such a view, unregenerate reason stands appalled. It involuntarily raises every possible objection against a doctrine which, nevertheless, pertains to the very essence of religion; but, to the heart converted and subdued, how natural and necessary does it appear! How eagerly does it embrace it, and hasten to place it among the number of its dearest convictions!

—The excesses of youth are drafts on old age, payable with interest forty years after date.

—The shows of religion however fair, will not be accepted without the substance of it.

THE RESTITUTION.

PLYMOUTH, IND.....Sept. 22, 1875.

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.

A Religion Without a Hope.

It will be remembered by our readers, that sometime ago we called attention to the peculiar views of Josiah Hornaday, of Indianapolis, and gave some Bible reasons for rejecting his very unscriptural positions. Mr. Hornaday states that we did not clearly understand his position, and now claims the right of giving his views in his own language, which we do in this number of the RESTITUTION.

It may be well to remark, before noticing the points in Mr. Hornaday's article, that the positions taken by him are neither original nor novel. They were written out in full and published in a book by Alpheus Crosby over twenty years ago. The positions may be stated in the following summary:

1. Christ has never promised to appear personally to any one but his saints.

2. He came and took his saints at the time Jerusalem was destroyed, and is now reigning with them in heaven.

3. He will never personally appear on earth again. All the promises from Gen. xii. to the last epistle of John have been fulfilled.

4. The book of Revelation is the history of Gentile times from the destruction of Jerusalem to the end of their age.

4. That Peter's burning day alludes to the downfall of the Jewish state, which was the passing away of the old heavens and earth, etc.

The foregoing Rems express in brief the sentiments of Mr. Hornaday as we understand them both from his article and from personal interviews.

Now let us compare these points with the Word of God.

NOTE 1. "Christ will never appear personally to any one but his saints." This position flatly contradicts our Lord's own words: "Ye (Jewish people) shall not see me from henceforth until ye shall say: Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." Matt. xxiii.

Again, "They shall look upon him whom they have pierced, and shall mourn for him." Zech. xiii.

Again "Behold he cometh with the clouds, and every eye shall see him, and they also that pierced him." Rev. i. 7.

Then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven; then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and THEY SHALL SEE THE SON OF MAN coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." Matt. xxiv.

In addition to these plain points, we may add that Jesus appeared to Paul in person on his way to Damascus while yet in the bonds of iniquity.

In the light of all these facts it seems that nothing but a theory would ever so blind the mind as to affirm what is affirmed by Mr. H.

NOTE 2. The idea that Jesus came at the destruction of Jerusalem, and took his saints away with him to glory, is simply making assumptions. Mr. H. might just as well have said that Christ came and took the saints to Jupiter, and from there to Saturn. It is a profound mystery to us how any man claiming to rely upon his Bible for proof, should make such extravagant statements. Does not Peter say that the heavens are to retain Jesus until the times of the restitution of all things spoken of by the prophets? Will Mr. H. contend that these times began when Jerusalem was destroyed, and the people led away into captivity?

Has the promised regeneration come and is Jesus on his throne of glory, reigning with the twelve apostles over the twelves tribes of Israel? And further: Is the promise fulfilled? "The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever and of his kingdom there shall be no end?" Luke i. Did Jesus ever promise his disciples a joint reign with Him in any other place, and over any other people, than the people of this earth? It seems almost incredible that any sane man should be so far misled, by wild speculations, as to take positions like those referred to above. And yet this is the unenviable dilemma into which Mr. H. places himself.

NOTE 3. "Christ will never appear on earth personally." This is also in direct opposition to the sure word of prophecy.

"His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives." Zech. xiv. This prophecy refers directly to the close or the times of the Gentiles, which Mr. H. himself believes.

Job says: "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day, upon the earth." Job xix.

In the book of Revelation it is stated that Jesus is to stand upon Mount Zion with an hundred and forty-four thousand harpers. This can have no reference to Mr. H.'s Jerusalem coming, for he himself admits that the book was written years afterward. The coming of Jesus is repeatedly stated in this book which at once shows the absurdity of the proposition under notice.

NOTE 4. "The book of Revelation is a history of Gentile times, from the time Jerusalem was destroyed," etc. This being the case, then we are yet to look for a new heaven and a new earth; the redeemed are to reign with Christ, and that reign is to be upon the earth. Mr. H.'s position here completely upsets his views of Peter's burning day. For the new heavens and the new earth do not appear until the end of the times of the Gentiles, whereas the theory of Mr. H. has the old heavens and earth mean the Jewish state and that they came to an end 1800 years ago. We are therefore driven to the position, that there has been no old world for 1800 years, or else the new heavens and earth have been in existence for that length of time. The new earth looked for by Peter is certainly the one described by John.

Now as Mr. H. has the present world since the flood destroyed, when Jerusalem was destroyed, we are either in the new earth now, or else we are in the old. If the latter, then the whole theory of our friend is without foundation. If we are in the new earth, then we are beyond the reach of sin and death. In either case the position taken by Mr. H. is most absurd.

The theory is lame in both feet, and our only astonishment is that such views should be entertained by any intelligent man. But we are assured by the apostle that in the latter days men will depart from the faith giving heed to fables, and truly there is no greater fable than that under examination. We submit that the theory is a mere chimera, and that it can but beget just such a state of mind as is apparent in the article referred to, which leaves the subject in a condition where he "can neither be saved or lost!" May Heaven protect all true hearts from such soul withering delusions.

There are a number of other points set forth in the article which we might notice, but they are unsupported by testimony, and are words which tend to darken council. We will therefore not weary the reader by a further examination at present.

Human Physiology.

By way of continuing our subject we quote again from Mr. Brown, p. 247.

Under the caption entitled "Relation of Mind to Matter," he says: "Many well disposed persons object to referring the mental manifestations, in any case to the proper development and healthy action of brain, because of a supposed tendancy to materialism. But the relation of mind to matter is a question of fact, and is independent of all theory.

Nothing is clearer than that all our knowledge of an outward world as well as our knowledge of the thoughts and actions of other minds, reach us through sensation; and on the other hand that we can transfer our thoughts to other minds only by muscular motion.

In addition to what Mr. Brown has said relative to the relation of mind and matter, we will give a quotation from Alfred Smee, F. R. S., London. On pp. 63, 64, in his work entitled, "The Voltaic mechanism of man," or "Electro Biology," he says:

If we take a review of the functions of animal life, we find that all sensations, the registration of impressions, thought, action and other phenomena of animal life, are voltaic effects, and are solely obedient to physical laws; and to the idea of the performance of these functions we assign the idea of vitality. Life, therefore, is one word used to signify a number of changes. It is no independent reality apart from the matter which exhibits the phenomena. Neither is it an imponderable attached to matter; nor is it an all pervading ether, or anima mundi, as some philosophers would have us suppose.

Life, mind, memory, reason, thought, come from organization, are purely physical phenomena, and cease at death."

These men who have devoted years of study upon this subject talk very much like the men of olden times, who professed to have been divinely inspired in what they said.

Moses says: 1. "That God formed man of the dust of the ground."

2. "That God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life."

3. "That he (man) became a living soul."

The functions of life as described above by these men, were not in man when first created, nor were they in the breath of life before it was breathed into his nostrils. But they were the results produced by the movement of the power (breath of life) upon the organism (man.)

And as these men above state that these functions cease at death, so does the Inhuman sage write in the book of Job xxxiv. 14, 15. "If he (God) set his heart upon man, if he gather unto himself his spirit (Ruach) and his breath (or containing the Ruach) all flesh shall perish together, and man shall turn again unto dust."

David—Israel's lord—in Psa. cxlvi. 4, says of man: "His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish."

Solomon in his book of Ecclesiastes ix. 5, 6, says of man in death, that his love, his hatred and his envy is perished, and that his memory is forgotten.

Again in the 10th verse of the same chapter he speaks of the condition of man in death, and says, that there is no work or device, (Douay rendering—reason) nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave (sheol—hades) whither thou goest.

If death takes away sensation, the registration of impressions, thought and reason, and consigns man to a place where there is no work, where there is no reason, where there is no knowledge and to where there is no wisdom, what can be his condition otherwise than that described by the patient man of earth in his book (Job x. 21, 22,) where he speaks of man in death as going to a land of death, a land of darkness, and without order.

Herzegovina.

For several weeks in the past there has been almost daily a small paragraph in the European news about the insurrection in Herzegovina. One day it was "spreading;" the next it was "put down;" again, Austria, backed by Germany and Russia, had sent a diplomatic note to Turkey to warn her of the consequences if not suppressed at once. Then we heard that Turkey had dismissed one minister and installed another more energetic and warlike, who was going to crush the rebellion at once. And lastly, we hear that the consuls of the different great powers of Europe have met and are trying to heal up the difficulties.

All this, we presume, has been of but little interest to the most of the readers of the daily papers; but to the observer of European politics, and to the student of the prophetic word, it has been of deep import, and has given promise of becoming of absorbing interest. One our ablest daily papers said in speaking of it: "There is kindling wood in Turkey;" and to an interested student of prophecy, the question has arisen: Is this the spark that is to kindle the flame; that is to cause the great powers of the Roman Earth to rush into the last great conflict, for which they have, all so unconsciously, been preparing themselves during the last generation. The balance of power is so nicely poised at this time in Europe, that a very small event would be all that is needed to destroy the equilibrium; and the more especially if that event was connected with the Eastern question; for there is nothing that will send the cold shivers over the monarchs of Europe so quickly and so violently, as a reference to that much dreaded topic.

But where is Herzegovina and what is the cause of the present outbreak? It is the extreme north-western province of the Turkish empire, and of little smaller area than the state of Massachusetts. Between it and the Adriatic is the narrow province of Dalmatia, belonging to Austria. To the east of it are Bosnia and Servia, semi-dependent provinces of Turkey. All these three provinces are very mountainous, and the chief occupations of the people are agriculture and grazing. The majority of the inhabitants belong to the nominal Christain church the most of them being members of the Greek church.

The revenues of these provinces are farmed out by the Turkish government, and once a year the tax collectors, aided by a squad of Turkish soldiers, make a tour of them to gather up their money. They make an arbitrary assessment on the population generally, taking all they can wring out of the poor inhabitants. This year the crops have been nearly a failure; and without giving anything to the collectors, the prospect looked hard to the poor people, for "keeping the wolf from the door." But the Turkish officials came as haughty and insolent as ever, and proceeded to levy their tax. The people, maddened at the prospect of seeing the bread taken from their children's mouths to enrich the proud infidel, flew to arms and thus brought on the present rebellion.

Will it flame up into the last great conflict, and usher in the great day of God's wrath upon the Gentiles? I would not be dogmatic, but it seems to me that we cannot look for the Lord as long as Turkey holds the Holy Land in her grasp. She is the Gentile power that has "trodden down" the sanctuary; she holds the territory of the "kingdom of God"—for Judea is the kingdom of God proper—all outside being the dominion. Her name is the synonym of oppression, blood thirstiness, lust and anarchy, the world over. Even the savage tribes of the interior of Africa have a proverb, "That no grass will grow where the Turks bear rule." Although she has a large army, and is really still a powerful nation, yet she is honey combed with corruption, and her treasury is bankrupt. Should a revolt become successful within her borders, it must surely reopen the Eastern question: and that once fairly opened must—from every human standpoint—eventuate in the great battle of God Almighty. The nations are "waking up the mighty men," and though all hesitate to begin the strife, yet the torch will probably be applied by this or a similar outbreak.

Meanwhile two societies, supported by the two great Anglo-Saxon nations, are busily at work surveying and exploring the Land of Israel, and mapping out her boundaries, all unconsciously preparing it for the possession of its rightful king; and the sons of Israel are returning and settling in the land of their fathers as never before since the fall of Jerusalem, in A. D. 70.

These things all speak of coming deliverance; they tell us that the long night of Israel's dispersion is coming to its morning. Let us all watch carefully the "signs of the times," and ever pray that the crescent may continue to wane, until it is swallowed up in the resplendent glories of the rising Sun of Righteousness.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Brief Notes of Travel.

Since our last report we have attended the Iowa, Indiana and Illinois conferences. It has never been our privilege to witness more zeal, interest and harmony among the children of Abraham. There was a general attendance of our brethren and sisters at each of these annual meetings.

There seemed to be but one object in attending these meetings, and that was to unite in the promotion of those means which will most efficiently promote the cause of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

These interviews and interchanges of views in the spirit of kindness and forbearance were profitable to us. The preaching was more practical than most of our preaching in former years. The influence of these meetings in the communities in which they were held has been most salutary.

This is equally true of the local meetings we have attended. We have visited Antioch, Ripley, and Cooperstown stately. We have also visited Buchanan, Muddigan, and Eureka, Wisconsin, several times. Our meetings were generally well attended. The congregations have been large wherever there had been sufficient notice. Baptisms have been of frequent occurrence. At Eureka, Antioch, Ripley, Coopertown, and our recent conference in Illinois, some were obedient to the faith. I make these statements not for the purpose of parading numbers, but to encourage all who are laboring in our Father's vineyard, that they may persevere in their efforts, and not weary in well doing.

At no period since I engaged in the promulgation of the Gospel have there been so many ears to hear, or more zeal among the friends of truth. There seems to be a general waking up among the brethren in reference to the importance of our position as a people who are waiting for the speedy return of our absent Lord. There seems to be an expectation that some great event is just upon us. The world seems to be on tip-toe of expectation that the present stirring events portend the grandest era the world has ever known. The question is being asked, in some form or other, by the millions, "Watchman, what of the night?!" A notice that offers any clue to the nature of coming events will call out a multitude everywhere to hear.

"We are living, we are dwelling
In a grand and awful time."

Correspondence.

In April, by special request, I visited Warren county, Iowa, where I delivered two funeral sermons and several discourses on the restitution—to the dissatisfaction of some of the wonderers and despisers of the covenant of promise God made Israel. Several Gentile preachers in the place, contrary to the apostolic injunction, "beast against the branches," but for some reason they did not oppose me while there. After I left, however, they spit out their venom, and I presume are still engaged in the work of opposing the truth in a rancorous, malignant spirit which is not of Christ. "If any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his."—Rom. viii. 9. Neither can he belong to Christ and reject the truth, for we are to be sanctified through the truth.

While there I learned that many years ago Elders Robert Chowen, Henry Collins, and Rathbun used to preach in the place, and were the first to introduce the truth among the people.

The doctrine of the soon to come second advent has been forgotten by some, and ignored by others, yet I found some open-minded persons who were disposed to receive and expressed themselves favorably impressed with our position.

I found a pleasant home with Mr. Glass, Mr. Watson, and Joseph Pine, the latter an elder in the Advent church. I shall never forget their kindness.

I would like to accept the invitation to return there some time this fall or winter, could I find the time, for I think a good work can be done in that place and the surrounding country. The interest and prospects are good, not withstanding the opposition of the Gentile priests, who have taken away the key of knowledge, enter not in themselves, and are a hindrance to those who would enter. They have departed out of the way, and caused many to stumble at the truth; have corrupted the covenant of Levi—Mal. ii. Yea, you have been partial in the law of God; have declared the things concerning the name of Christ, but have hid or concealed the things concerning the kingdom.—Malachi ii: Acts viii.

Jesus is king anointed of Israel, So said Peter when he used the key of knowledge to unlock the mysteries of the kingdom.—Acts ii. 30; which key the Jewish priests had taken away. Gentile priests are guilty of the same. They deny that Christ is to reign king of Israel. Yet the angel Gabriel says he shall reign over the house of Jacob. This cannot mean Gentiles. The house of Jacob was not composed of immortal saints. Jacob never had such a house. The twelve tribes of Israel—with Jacob as their father—alone constitute Jacob's house. As the twelve tribes are now scattered, the house of Jacob is therefore in a disorganized state. Hence, before Christ can reign over the house of Jacob it must be reorganized. God says he will bring them again, and that they shall be one nation, one kingdom and one king shall be over them.—Ezekiel xxxvii. 32. Christ is the one that is to restore again the kingdom to Israel"—not to the Gentiles, for they never possessed it.

The times and seasons of the restoring of the kingdom of Israel the Father hath put in his own power.—Acts i.; which is the time of restitution,—Acts iii. 21.

Paul says all Israel shall be saved,—Rom. xi. 26. Gentile priests say that all Christians. In the 25th verse we read of Israel's blindness until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in—at which time the same blind Israel is to be saved. Then on their hypothesis these Gentile priests are all blind Christians and cannot see afar off, and have forgotten that they were purged from their old sins.—2 Peter i. 10.

Christ says, "If the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch."—Matt. xv. 14. The truth of the matter is, God has spoken glorious things concerning Israel. The time is at hand for their fulfillment — Gentile times—are about to close.

Let us be sober, and hope to the end.

Gleanings.

The following lines from Bro. Corbaley will, we have no doubt, interest many of our readers:

BRETHREN:

On the 22d of August last I organized a church of eighteen members at Independence School House, five miles north of Healdsburg, in Sonora county, California. This is the first and only church of our faith I know of on this coast. There is a prospect of our membership being increased ere long. On last Sunday evening we partook of the Lord's Supper.

R. CORBALEY.

We give below a letter from Bro. Hatch:

BRETHREN:

Since my last report through the RESTITUTION, I have visited the brethren near Paris, Edgar county, Illinois, but was quite poorly all the time, I have not been well since our conference. I am now at home, not able to get out. How long I may be confined at home I cannot tell.

I have calls on every hand to go and hold meetings. The day before I went to Paris, I received a letter from D. Wright, of Clark county, Illinois; and the day I left I received a letter from brother Joseph Gardner, of Champaign county, Illinois; but my health will not admit of my attending to these calls at present.

J. S. HATCH.

We glean the following words from a letter written us by Father Gower, formerly of Kansas, now in Texas:

BRETHREN:

This letter leaves me in Texas, among strangers, with nothing to console us, as I expected when I reached this place to meet the RESTITUTION. I commenced reading the "Gospel Banner," and have read it through, all its changes, and now what a welcome visitor the RESTITUTION would be in a strange land.

Let me state to some of its readers, such as Kinney, Frame, Sanford, Hayden, Green, Hicklin and others, my condition. I arrived here the middle of the week—on Wednesday—and on the following Saturday evening the Christian church, the decision called Campbellites, commenced a meeting. On Sunday at 11 o'clock the speaker took up as a subject the Organization of the Church and Kingdom; when he closed, I asked permission to speak at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, upon which a grave looking old man arose and asked me if I had anything that would sustain a character. I answered no, but could have if necessary. This raised quite an excitement after I had made a few remarks. The people seem anxious to hear.

I have a large acquaintance among the brethren; those who see this, and think me worthy and qualified, will immediately respond to the demands. There is no preaching (so far as I can learn) of the Gospel of the coming kingdom in this country.

If there are any readers of the RESTITUTION they will do me a kindness to write to me immediately and let me know their whereabouts. I had no thought, when I started here, of feeling so lonely; but I am determined to fight it out on this line.

I remain your brother, waiting for Christ and the kingdom, when tears which are many will be wiped away.

Brethren write to me.

Iowa Conference.

Our meeting which convened in Moullin's Grove, Iowa, Sept. 3d, closed on the 5th. Owing to the recent heavy rains, the attendance from abroad was not so large as anticipated, for which we thought it best to defer the organization of a conference until we could meet under more favorable circumstances, and confer with more of the brethren.

Visiting brethren and friends present were: Dr. Black, of the Brighton Water Cure, Illinois; Wm. M. Dugger, C. D. Cortright, Eld. S. Baldwin, Lorenzo J. Baldwin, Lucy J. Dugger, and Ella Dugger, of Iowa; Bro. Barber, Miss Barber, Miss Oatman, Eld. A. C. Long, of Missouri.

Notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, we had a very good meeting.

Saturday morning Elder Baldwin discoursed on the value of the Scriptures. In the evening our highly esteemed friend, Dr. Black, by special request delivered a very able lecture on Health and Health Reform, which was listened to with marked attention. He drew his arguments from physiology and the Bible, and maintained in a lucid and forcible manner that it was the duty of every person to heed the injunction, "know thyself."

Sunday morning A. F. Dugger addressed a large audience on the Keys of the Kingdom. At 3 p. m. A. E. Estlack, followed by H. J. Miller, spoke on the Bible hope. He showed that our only hope was in the coming of Christ and the resurrection from the dead. The rain Sunday evening broke up our meeting appointed in the grove for night. But at the house of my father, Nathan Miller, about 30 present, by request Dr. Black delivered another very fine and interesting lecture, after which we sung choice harmonies expressive of our faith and hope.

The next morning we took the parting hand, perhaps not to meet again until we meet in the kingdom of our Father, where we shall live forever, and paradise shall be made vocal with the songs of the redeemed.

The Call and Reply.

Just as thou art—without one trace
Of love, or joy, or inward grace,
Or meekness for the heavenly place,
O guilty sinner, come!

Just as I am—without one plea,
But that thy blood was shed for me,
And that thou bid'st me come to thee,
O Lamb of God, I come!

Thy ship I hore on Calvary's tree:
The stripes thy due were laid on me,
That peace and pardon might be free—
O wretched sinner, come!

Just as I am, and waiting not
To rid my soul of one dark blot,
To thee, whose blood can cleanse each spot,
O Lamb of God, I come!

Hear'st not with guilt, would'st thou be blest?
Trust not the world; it gives no rest;
I bring relief to hearts oppressed—
O weary sinner, come!

Just as I am—though tossed about
With many a conflict, many a doubt,
Fightings within, and fears without,
O Lord, of God, I come!

Come, leave thy burden at the cross:
Count all thy gains but empty dross:
My grace repays all earthly loss—
O needy sinner, come!

Just as I am, poor, wretched, blind;
Sight, riches, healing of the mind—
Yea, all I need, in thee to find,
O Lamb of God, I come!

Come hither, bring thy boiling fears,
Thy aching heart, thy bursting tears:
'Tis mercy's voice utters these cares:
O trembling sinner, come!

Just as I am, thou will receive,
Will welcome, pardon, cleanse, relieve;
Because the promise I believe,
O Lamb of God, I come!

"The Spirit and the bride say, Come!"
Believing souls re-echo Come:
Who thirst, who thirsts, who will, may come:
The Savior bids him, Come.

Just as I am—thy love unknown
Has broken every barrier down;
Now, to be thine, yea, thine alone,
O Lamb of God, I come!

General News.

A great cannon, lately built at the works at Obonkowsky, has cost 805,000, and weighs 40 tons. It is a breech loader, entirely in crucible steel, 20 feet 6 inches long; its largest ring is 67½ inches in diameter, and the tube has thirty-six grooves.

There are in the cities of Buenos Ayres and Montevidio sixteen Protestant places of worship, in twelve of which the English language is used and Spanish in the remainder. More than fifty thousand copies of the Bible in Spanish have been circulated in South America in late years.

Forty-five Jesuits arrived in New York from Germany, on the first of August. They undoubtedly have a mission in this country, which time will reveal, in the proselyting of negroes, or in a well-drilled army of Irish and German voters.

The population of Jerusalem is estimated at 21,000, of whom 5,000 are Moslems, 5,500 Christians, mostly of the Greek church, 10,000 Jews, and about 500 Europeans, chiefly Germans. The Jewish population has increased about 2,000 within the last two years; and German settlers also arrive in considerable numbers. The manufacture of soap is the chief native industry.

Dr. I. I. Hayes, who attended the millennial in Iceland a few months ago, and who is consequently in a position to speak intelligently of everything pertaining to the island, has written a letter to the New York Herald concerning the recent volcanic eruptions. He estimates that one-third of Iceland has been rendered uninhabitable. The present eruption has been raging with greater or less violence since Christmas. Three large craters are incessantly roaring and thundering. As we have already noticed, the people fear most the ravages of scorbutic diseases, which will inevitably appear if the supplies of fresh meat, milk, etc., are cut off. Dr. Hayes earnestly seconds the appeals that are being made in England for the relief of the destitute and afflicted people. He hopes that the United States also will contribute something to this worthy cause. There certainly ought to be some money in America that can be spared for the poor people of Iceland, and perhaps our government can now be induced to look more favorably on the scheme for the emigration of Icelanders and their settlement in Alaska. All that they ask to decide them in this matter is a promise of free transportation,—which perhaps the American government might afford as a work of mercy, if not as an economical enterprise.

THE MEDIATORS.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Sept. 17.

No news has been received from the Consuls on their mission of peace to the insurrectionary districts since their arrival at Scutari yesterday. Telegrams to their embassies, during their journey stated that they met with a warm reception everywhere. Several insurgent chiefs had accepted their mediation. Some, however, declared their mistrust of Turkish promises, and demanded a formal guarantee and indemnity.

A dispatch from Vienna says the reports of victories by Servian bands near Novo Warosch are all untrue.

A corps of invading volunteers compelled the Christian inhabitants of Grulowa, near the Dalmatian frontier, to revolt. A fierce fight occurred last Wednesday with the Turkish inhabitants, in which the insurgents were defeated.

Authentic accounts received from the Zubet district say that the Turks are advancing slowly, and that the insurgents are discordant. A majority of the volunteers have returned to their homes.

THE BONAPARTISTS.

NEW YORK, Sept. 17.

A dispatch from Paris states that the formal conference of the Bonapartist party, at Arenburg, has been abandoned. The cause assigned is that the popular excitement was so threatening that it was considered more prudent to remain quiet for the present. The Bonapartist organs and leaders preserve the strictest silence in regard to the affair. The Government is closely watching the movements of the Bonapartists, and is prepared to act with vigor should circumstances require.

The Two Witnesses.

Are Moses and Elias the two witnesses? I took the position in 1868, that Enoch and Elijah were the two witnesses spoken of in Rev. xi. 3, and I have never had reason to change my mind. I look for Enoch and Elijah to come before Christ comes. The two witnesses are called two prophets, the two anointed ones, that stand by the Lord of the whole earth. John says: "These are the two olive trees, and the two candlesticks standing before the God of the earth." I am pleased with Brother Magruder's position on the two witnesses, except that Moses being one of them. It is so much better than the old position of being the Old and New Testaments, held by some of our brethren. I understand Moses is dead, and not standing by or before the God of the earth, but Enoch and Elijah were taken away from the earth without seeing death, and will come again and finish their testimony. They will come and prepare a people for his name, that is Christ's name. As John was the forerunner of Christ's first advent, so Elijah and Enoch will be of his second advent. Jude says, "And Enoch the seventh from Adam prophesied" of the Lord's coming. Enoch commenced his testimony before he left the earth, and is standing by the God of the earth, and will, with Elijah, come and finish his testimony. When they shall have finished their testimony, then they will be put to death. Some take the position that John was the Elijah, but Luke records it thus: "And he shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elias," not in the person of Elias.

And this is the record of John, "And he confessed, and denied not, but confessed, I am not the Christ. * * * Art thou Elias? And he saith, I am not. Art thou that prophet? And he answered no." Then if John told the truth, he was not Elijah. Then what was his mission? He was the voice of one crying in the wilderness, as the prophet Isaiah had said. When John made his appearance the Jews did not know who he was, they saw the promises of God in Isa. ix. 6-7, in regard to the child born and son given. See also Isa. vii. 14. The Immanuel was to come; see Mat. iv. 5. When John came they were anxious to know who he was, and he told them, "I am not Christ." Zach. iv. 11-14 reads thus: "Then answered I and said unto him, what are these two olive trees upon the right side of the candlestick, and upon the left side thereof? And I answered again, and said unto him, what be these two olive branches which through the two golden pipes empty the golden oil out of themselves? And he answered me and said, Knowest thou not what these be? And I said, no, my lord. Then said he, these are the two anointed ones, that stand by the Lord of the whole earth." They stand by, or before the Lord of the whole earth. I for one look for the two witnesses to come and prophesy three years and a half, or twelve hundred and sixty days, and the holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months. The Gentiles will tread under foot the same length of time that the two prophets are prophesying. With all this testimony before me I must look for these two witnesses before I can look for Christ. They are to be sent to Israel, and when they come, then we can tell something near when the Lord shall come.

Arkansas Conference.

The following report of the Arkansas Conference has been placed in my hands to prepare for publication, and note as I may think proper.

And I will remark that while I am decidedly opposed to written human creeds, yet I am as decidedly in favor of co-operation, concert of action, and thorough organization, which is the life of all causes and systems. Yet it is very difficult for brethren to talk over, agree upon, and write out a plan in reference to a point of expediency by which they may work in harmony, without some one seeing in it a creed. And it may be that some heresy hunter will find a creed in the following "Resolves." Yet we have no idea that these "resolves" were made with any such intention in the minds of these brethren; yea we are perfectly satisfied upon this point. And more than this, we believe it would be the next thing to impossibility for any one, we care not what his ability might be, to force upon these brethren a written creed. This much then in reference to the "resolves."

Now, in reference to the wording of some of these resolutions it might possibly have been bettered, and it might have been better possibly to have left No. 3, 4 and 5 out entirely. But these brethren have commenced a good work, and we do not intend throwing obstacles in their way. As advances are made in grace and knowledge all things will be regulated. O. M. H.

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The brethren of the Church of Christ in North-Western Arkansas in accordance to notice, met at Wild Cat Church, Washington county, Sept. 6th, 1876. After deliberation the following resolutions were offered and adopted:

1. Resolved, That we, the Churches of Christ, establish an annual conference, to be known as the North-Western Arkansas Conference.

2. This conference will be composed of all the Evangelist in the bounds of the conference, and each congregation to be entitled to three representatives, and one representative from any settlement sufficiently strong to form a congregation, to have a place for preaching.

3. No Church to be established with a less number of members than ten, unless otherwise thought advisable by one or more Evangelist.

4. All the Evangelists connected with this conference shall be furnished with credentials by this conference, and said credentials to last their lifetime, or during good behavior.

5. Any person wishing to become a minister of the Gospel with us, will receive license from us to do so, or from the hands of an Evangelist or Church to last till the next annual conference.

6. This conference shall be organized to elect by a president, a secretary, and a treasurer, who shall hold these offices until the next annual conference be organized.

7. The object of this conference will be to cultivate union, to give advice, and to have a concert of action in devising ways and means to sound out the word of truth, to have the Gospel spread as far as in our power lies; also to attend to any business that the conference may think proper to be attended to.

The conference was organized by electing J. H. Philips, president; C. Righlsell, secretary, and J. C. Thompson, treasurer.

The report of Elder H. Robertson was read and received, and ordered to be sent to the RESTITUTION for publication.

It was agreed that H. Robertson be our Evangelist for the ensuing year, and that we will try to sustain him in his labor in the good cause in which he is engaged.

The next annual conference will be at Zion Hill, near White River, twelve miles south-east of Fayetteville, Washington county, Arkansas, and to commence Saturday before the first Sunday in September, 1876. Preachers from a distance are invited.

EVANGELISTS' REPORT.

To the North-Western Arkansas Conference now in session, I make the following report of my labors. Since the middle of June last, I have traveled over a large part of Washington county, and over a part of Benton and Madison counties; I have visited alone twenty different places, preached some sixty discourses, conversed with many on the subject of the kingdom, and eternal life through Christ. I have had a good hearing, by large and attentive congregations. I trust that the good seed has been planted in many good and honest hearts, and that a rich harvest will be the result. I have been received and well treated where I have stopped to refresh myself, and to stay of nights, and I will now take this opportunity of expressing my thanks to the many who have opened their houses for my reception, and have treated me with so much kindness in my travels through their country. May the Lord bless them and give them a rich reward.

Brother Kidwell has been with me a part of the time, who is a strong man for his age, and is doing good service in proclaiming the Gospel; some have believed and obeyed the Gospel, and are now, we trust, like the Eunuch, going on their way rejoicing. I have had some opposition by a few of the Christian order, and from a few of the Methodist preachers, but I ask them but little difference, so long as I have the truth, and they have their fables. I will now say from experience, that if Evangelists would carry with them a package of tracts from the RESTITUTION office, and sell them at cost to the people in their travels, there is no telling the amount of good that the tracts would do in establishing the faith among inquiring minds. The conference, I think, would do well to look to this matter, and furnish the Evangelist with all the tracts that could be disposed of if it could possibly be done.

H. ROBERTSON.

A DECLARATION OF FAITH.

As many persons would like to know our peculiar views as a religious people, we will give the following as some of the items of our faith, not as a creed, but for information to those who desire to know:

1. We believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God, and that He is, according to the covenants of promise, heir to the throne and kingdom of David, and to the land of Canaan, and the whole earth for an everlasting inheritance.

2. We believe that the kingdom spoken of by the prophets, and preached by Christ and his apostles, is yet in promise; is yet to be established; that it will be set up on the earth; that it will be a government to govern the house of Israel, and the nations of the earth forever and ever; that Christ will be the only potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of Lords, and his saints subordinate rulers with Him in the kingdom.

3. We believe that man is mortal, and that when he dies he is dead, and knows nothing, that he has no immortality existing in a conscious state while dead; but that he is beholding to the resurrection for life and consciousness.

4. We believe that eternal life is the gift of God through Jesus Christ; that the obedient believer has this life in promise, and he will put on immortality when Christ comes, and he is raised from the dead.

5. We believe that in order to salvation the sinner must believe that Jesus is the Christ, the son of God; the things concerning the kingdom of God, must repent of his sins, and be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sin; must then live soberly, righteously and godly, in this present world, looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ.

—Education does not commence with the alphabet. It begins with a mother's look; with a father's nod of approbation or a sign of reproof; with a sister's gentle pressure of the hand, or a brother's noble act of forbearance: with handfuls of flowers in green dells, on hills and daisy meadows, with birds' nests admired, but not touched; with creeping cats, and almost imperceptible cannots; with humming bees and glass beehives; with pleasant walks in shady lanes; and with thoughts directed in sweet and kindly tones and words, to nature, to beauty, to acts of benevolence, to deeds of virtue, and to the sense of all good, to God himself.

THE RESTITUTION.

The Prayer and the Lit

Do I mean the prayer I offer,
Do I feel the words I say,
When before our heavenly Father,
I kneel down from day to day;
When at morning and at evening
I incline to seek his face,
And my voice goes up in pleading
To his glorious throne of grace?

When my voice goes up in pleading,
Does my heart go with it too?
There are many things I ask him,
That his might and grace may do;
Petition on petition
Goes up to meet his ear;
Oh, are they such petitions
As our Father loves to hear?

I tell him of my wants—my needs;
But when I turn away
Do I think of what I asked for?
Do I watch as well as pray?
Do I strive against temptation?
Do I ask like Christ to live?
Do I use aright the blessings
That so freely he doth give?

My prayers are with much speaking—
Yet, when I leave the spot
How quickly are its memories fled;
How soon those prayers forget!
Oh, if the thought that gave them birth
So lightly treasured be,
How can I think God's mercy
Will remember them for me?

Yet one petition further, Lord!
Will thou not deign to hear?
O, let my spirit breathe anew
Through all my daily prayer;
Then help me, as I pray, to live,
Kept by thy grace divine,
And the glory of the prayer and life,
Alike, O Lord, be thine.

Testimony to the Truth of the Bible.

Tyre from its ruins, Sodom from its ashes, Rome in her apostasy; Jerusalem in her degradation, the Arab in his tent, the Jew upon our streets, all living and lasting, even if unconscious, witnesses, proclaim that the Bible has God for its author, truth for its matter, as it has immortality and glory for its issues.

Let me suppose, for a moment, that a number of persons in different ages and places have been engaged in making various parts of a marble statue; suppose a person in St. Petersburg made a finger, a second in Rome a hand, a third in Edinburg an ear, a fourth in Athens the body, and so on till the whole was completed, but all without communication with one another, and in different ages as in different lands. Suppose, that when all the fragments were brought together they formed that magnificent statue, the Apollo Belvedere; would you not suppose that some superintending statuary must have guided and given an impulse to every chisel; that some beau ideal, some great archetype, must have been placed before each of them, after the form of which they were inspired constantly to work? In other words, they composed the parts, not as their own fancy prescribed, but as the presiding power directed? This is the fact in reference to the Scriptures? Let us take the portrait of our blessed Savior. Isaiah describes his sorrows, Malachi his triumphs, the dying Patriarch proclaims his empire, and the sweet Psalmist of Israel the extension of his kingdom; one prophet gives one feature, and one gives another; and looking at the parts in detail, irrespective of the original, and comparing one with another, we should say they were so contradictory, that they can never belong to the same individual.

At last, Bethlehem and Gethsemane rise above the horizon, Calvary lifts its awful head, the Son of God appears upon the cross, what prophets said is compared with what Christ is: and lo! all the parts delineated by the pens of prophets in distant and different centuries, and under different circumstances, at first apparently contradictory, come to be put together and they constitute "the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person." By this alone it is proved that the prophets "wrote as they were moved and guided by the Holy Spirit," and that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah.—J. Cummings.

Christ and the Resurrection.

Who is this amazing figure of purity, of wisdom, of dignity, of calm and balanced courage, that amid the rank growths of contemporary unwisdom and superstition stands up in such immeasurable superiority above his generation,—nay, not above his generation only, but above all generations? Who is this that, in the incredibly short space of three years, regenerated and redeemed a rapidly dying out and corrupting race? Who is this that—not for a throne, or a war horse, or from some literary pedestal of honor—but from a gibbet, has ruled over eighteen centuries, has transformed a world decaying under Roman Cæsarism into the fresh youth and vigorous life that characterizes modern Christendom, and has even forced from the lips of the most advanced critics and philosophers of our own day such confessions as these, almost identical with the language of Mr. John Stuart Mill?

"The teaching of Jesus carried morality to the sublimest point attained, or even attainable, by humanity. The influence of his spiritual religion has been rendered doubly great by the unparalled purity and elevation of his own character. Surpassing in his sublime simplicity and earnestness the moral grandeur of Chakyamouni, and putting to the blush the sometimes nullied, thought generally admirable teaching of Socrates and Plato, and the whole round of Greek philosophers, He presented the rare spectacle of a life, so far as we can estimate it, uniformly noble and consistent with his own lofty principles, so that the 'imitation of Christ' has become almost the final word in the preaching of his religion, and must continue to be one of the most powerful elements of its permanence."

Such acknowledgements appear to us to concede almost all that we could desire; and we feel strongly inclined to ask pardon of our author for every hard word we have said of him. After all, "Thou, O Galilean, hast conquered!" If this much can be said, if this absolutely amazing moral and historical miracle can be honestly allowed we feel the most entire confidence that a little farther reflection will not permit our author to stop where he now is. Jesus of Nazareth is, assuredly, either a great deal more or a great deal less than the words just quoted claim for Him. His pretensions were clear. He did not aim merely to found a new moral philosophy, or to add one new link to the ever lengthening chain of ethical speculation. He claimed to found a religion—a thing which alone can bring the highest morals home to the poor, to the slaves, to the vast uneducated and uncivilized masses of mankind.

Now the beauty and power of Christ's example having been fully conceded, it only remains to point out that one thing, and one alone has given authority to his teaching and has transformed it from a "philosophy" into a "religion," seizing with a divine force upon the imagination of mankind. And that one thing is his resurrection from the dead. If that be not true, christianity at once shrivels up into a disputable system of ethics. But if it be true, then christianity lays its hand upon us and thrills us, as though it were with the hand of God. All other miracles may then be freely canvassed. Gospels may then be keenly criticised. Old Testament authorship may be thoroughly sifted; various readings and other literary phenomena learnedly descanted upon; history cleared of legends and falsehood; church mechanisms reformed and improved.

All these things, to one who has accepted Christ's resurrection, are as welcome and as free as air. For the key to the whole battle field has been mastered, the clue to the vast labyrinth of human problems has been gained, the question of questions has been answered the mystery of mysteries has been solved.—Edinburgh Review on Supernatural Religion.

Geology and the Bible.

Some people condemn geology as setting aside the dictum of the Scriptures, and representing the world as a great deal older than is set down in Genesis. They say that facts of its own finding actually condemn its own assumptions; for instance, one of the remote periods of geology is the cretaceous, or age of chalk. Between that time and this, incalculable ages have come and gone, say some geologists. This is sheer assumption, for deep-sea soundings prove that chalk is now being deposited in the Atlantic Ocean; to-day is the chalk-age, and your long-drawn periods of time are pure myths! Again some geologists set the carboniferous epoch so far back that the six thousand years of Hebrew history sink into insignificance. But this is set at naught by the fact that the wooden supports in certain of the Hartz mines in Austria have been converted into lignite since they have been put in, only a few centuries ago. This shows that the production of a carboniferous strata does not necessarily require a greater length of time than the Bible gives as the age of the world. The action of certain chemicals will convert wood into coal in a short time. Again, in the South Sea, the corals of to-day are forming strata that are the exact counterparts (fossils excepted,) of—say—the Trenton limestone. In other parts of the world sand deposits are now forming, such as composed the Potsdam sandstones. Why not say therefore, that the silurian period is a figment of the imagination?—Compiled.

While some condemn geology because it disagrees with the Bible, others discard the Scriptures for the same reason. But this is a great mistake. It is only the interpretations of each that disagree. When properly interpreted and understood they are in perfect harmony.

Future State of the Jews.

There are many expressions in the Old Testament which may lead us to expect not only the conversion of the Jew, but their national restoration from their present dispersion, to their own land. The late Mr. Scott thus summed up his own views on the subject, in his work on the Restoration of Israel. He says:

"It is now becoming more and more the opinion of serious Christians, that when Israel shall be converted to their long-rejected Messiah, they will be gathered from their dispersions, and reinstated in their own land; which being rendered as fertile as in times past, (perhaps much more so,) and extended to the utmost limits of the grants made to the Patriarchs, will yield them in rich abundance, all things needful and comfortable for this present life. It is also thought that they will live in this land under rulers of their own nation, as the vicegerents of the Messiah, of David, or the Son of David, in entire peace and security, free from invader or oppressor, and from the fear of any; and that, along with all spiritual blessings in rich abundance, they will be voluntarily regarded by all other nations, then truly converted, with peculiar love and gratitude, and honor, as the source of all their spiritual blessings, and especially as most nearly related to their common Messiah and Savior, who is the light of the Gentiles, and the glory of his people Israel."

The following is a collection of promises concerning the calling of the Jews and the glory which shall be in the latter days, taken from Powel's Concordance, published in 1673:

"1. The Jews shall be gathered from all parts of the earth where they are now scattered, and brought into their own land. For this see Isa. 11: 11. Isa. 27: 12, 13. Isa. 43: 5, 6. Isa. 49: 11, 12. "So that we may say, as Balaam did, prophesy of that very time; 'Alas, who shall live when God doeth this!'" Num. 24: 23.

It appears, from a careful consideration of the whole series of prophecy in the Old Testament, that, of the prophecies delivered before the captivity, many have even a chief reference to a yet future return of Judah and Israel to their own land. The returns from Babylon both of Judah and Israel, were very limited, but especially those of the ten tribes, so as not to meet the promises in any literal fulfillment.

The expressions in Deut. 30: 1-5, (following that remarkable prophecy of their dispersion among all nations) naturally leads our minds to a return from their present dispersion to their own land. Josephus says, (Book 11, chap. 5,)—"The entire body of the people of Israel remained in that country; (where they were carried captive) wherefore there are but two tribes in Asia and Europe subject to the Romans, while the ten tribes are beyond the Euphrates till now, and are an immense multitude not to be estimated by numbers.

The declaration, (Isa. 10: 11,) that "The Lord will again put forth his hand a second time to recover the remnant of his people that remaineth, from Assyria, and from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush, and from Elam, and from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the islands of the sea," received not, as far as we are informed, a full literal accomplishment in the return from Babylon; neither did that recorded in Jeremiah, chapters 30 and 31, where the distinction made between the captivity of Israel and of Judah. (30: 3,) leads us to expect the return of Israel, an event which appers yet to be accomplished. The apostle, (Rom. 11: 26,) quotes Isa. 59: 20, as referring to their future conversion, and thereby justifies our taking such a view of that prophesy, and others of a similar kind. The whole series of chapters, Ezekiel 36 to 39 inclusive, with several other instances, might be added, as prophecies that have yet, as far as we can at present judge, to receive their chief accomplishment.

The rejection of the Jews is foretold in language so plain and literal, and has been so minutely accomplished and they have been so widely scattered, that nearly all men that dwell on the face of the whole earth have sensible and visible witnesses before their eyes of the truth of God's Word, the purity of his law, and the certainty of his judgments.

And can we suppose that the judgment and righteousness in the threatening shall be so literally accomplished, and the mercy and loving kindness in the promise not be also fulfilled literally and exactly? This is not the method of him whose name is Love! The very sight of their present scattering and degredation, may be to us who believe God's Word, a palpable evidence of the reality of their future restoration and honor, and show us how to interpret the innumerable plain predictions which foretell this their future glory.

The extraordinary fullness of Scripture is most wonderful. When do we seem to get wholly at its unsearchable riches! O, how like it is to the divine mind as manifested in the works of creation! There are inexhaustible treasures of grace in its sacred contents to enrich the humble and patient inquirer from age to age!

Many of the prophecies of the Old Testament show a very important, humbling, and afflictive course of dealing with the Jews, on their return and before their final glory. Zech. 13: 14. Joel 2: and 3. Isa. 66.

The New Testament brings before us divine truth in its spiritual character. The object of our Lord's first coming, however, was not, we are told, "to destroy the Law or the Prophets but to fulfill," (or complete.) Without, then, setting aside the prophecies of the Old Testament, the New adds to them those spiritual elements which are the highest glories of the whole church. This view accounts for its comparative silence on the literal glories of the Jewish nation.

In the New Testament, therefore, little is said on that subject; but there is nothing to throw doubt upon our hopes respecting the Jews; and two strong passages, in oblique hints, however, rather than by positive assertions, confirm this hope. Both proceed from our Lord. One is, "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled."—Luke 21: 24. The other is his reply to the inquiry of his disciples, "Wilt thou, at this time, restore again the kingdom to Israel? And he said unto them, It is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power."—Acts 1: 6, 7.

Every book almost of the New Testament contains expressions which show that God has not cast away his people Israel.

Respecting the future conversion of the whole Jewish nation, as distinct from their national restoration, the prophecies are clear and decisive. "For the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim. Afterward, shall the children of Israel return, and seek the Lord their God, and David their King, and shall fear the Lord and his goodness in the latter days."—Hosea 3: 4, 5.

The New Testament does not here speak obscurely. As when Moses went in before the Lord he took the veil off, Exod. 34: 34, so shall it be with the Jewish nation; "Nevertheless, when it shall turn to the Lord, the veil shall be taken away."—2. Cor. 3: 16.

If They have in part now fallen, their fulness shall hereafter come in.—Rom. 11: 12. If they are now cast away they shall be received; (verse 15) If they have been broken off, they shall be again grafted in; (verse 23) and so all Israel shall be saved, (verse 26.) How cheering are such promises! and they are accompanied with the delightful assurance that their recovery shall be a blessing to the world, even as life from the dead.

The salvation of Israel is connected with the coming of the Savior. Paul shows, that "all Israel shall be saved; as it is written, There shall come out of Zion the Deliver."—Rom. 11: 26. So Isaiah declares, "Behold, your God will come with vengeance; even God with a recompense; he will come and save you," Isa. 35: 4; and in his eleventh chapter, he connects the restoration of Israel with the reign of Christ.

Daniel also foretells, "At that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince, which standeth for the children of thy people; and there shall be a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time; and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book."—Dan. 12: 1. So in the Psalms it is predicted, "When the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory."—Psa. 102: 16.

We read in Zechariah 12: 9, 10, "It shall come to pass in that day, that I will seek to destroy all the nations that come against Jerusalem; and I will pour upon the house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem the spirit of grace and of supplications; and they shall look upon me whom they have pierced; and they shall mourn for him."

And again; "Then shall the Lord go forth, and fight against those nations, as when he fought in the day of battle; and his feet shall stand upon Mount Olivet," Zech. 14: 3; and presently afterwards, "the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with thee." And so, in the closing book of Revelation it is declared, "Behold, he cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him; and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him."—Rev. 1: 7.

These varied quotations all bear to one point, that the Lord Jesus will personally and visibly come, not only for the destruction of his enemies, but also in mercy to his people Israel.

That announcement, which the angel made to Mary before his birth, "The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end,"—Luke 1: 32, is still to be fulfilled; our Lord Christ has never yet had the throne of David, nor reigned over the house of Jacob, which includes the twelve tribes of Israel.

Their future history is to be the very contrast of their present state. They are all to be sought out, gathered together, and restored to their own land. God himself will take this work especially under his own care. Ezek. 34: 11-13. The nations of the earth are described as assisting in it. Isa. 49: 22. Isa. 60: 20.

When thus gathered from all lands, and re-assembled once more in their own country, they will be placed under the care and government of our Lord Christ. "I will set up one shepherd over them, and he shall feed them, even my servant David. Ezek. 34: 23. Luke 1: 32, 33. Who can conceive the joy of that Shepherd, who wept over their desolation, in the recovering again of those his lost sheep. Or who can imagine their joy, after all their wanderings, terrors, dangers and miseries, in being thus sought out and restored, governed and forever blessed by Him?

In that full and minute description given by Ezekiel of the latter-day glory, of the the city, the temple, and the promised land, the Prophet closes all by stating, "The name of the city from that day shall be, The Lord is there." Ezek. 48: 13.

Again, "Thou shalt be called, Sought out, A city not forsaken," (Isa. 62: 12,) is a part of their promised glory. The very expression, city, shows gathering together, and national restoration, both union and a kingdom. And when Zion is thus a city not forsaken, that prediction will be realized, "Whereas thou hast been forsaken and hated, so that no man went through thee, I will make thee an eternal excellency, a joy of many generations,"—Isa. 60: 15.

Great are the blessings to be bestowed upon Israel; and what shall be the issue of all this? Glory will be given to God in the highest, and universal joy diffused among all holy beings.

The conversion and salvation, the restoration and glory of Israel, will eminently display the honor of Jehovah. What riches of forbearance, patience, long suffering, and faithfulness, will it manifest in our heavenly Father! How wonderful the glories of his love in once rebellious, and then recovered Israel! What efficacy in our Redeemer's blood! What a prevalency in his intercessions for his worst and bitterest enemies! Oh, what a bright and valuable jewel in the Redeemer's many crowns, (Rev. 19: 12), at the latter day, will be converted Israel, holy and joyful in their own land!

What joy also in heaven! If the angels joy over one sinner that repents, (Luke 15: 10,) what will be their joy over the restoration of the long lost, the ancient people of God?

The very ancestors of these Jews cannot be uninterested in the remnant to be saved. Oh, how will hallelujahs refresh resound through all those glorious mansions, when their own descendants, after so many ages of delay, at length return to the Savior, and yield themselves to him!

Nor will the nations of the earth be without their share in this general joy. "The Gentiles are to rejoice with his people."—Deut. 32: 43. Songs of glory will at length burst forth from every land to the divine Redeemer. When we are told, "He has remembered his mercy and truth towards the house of Israel," it is added, "And all the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our God. Make a joyful noise unto the Lord, all the earth; make a loud noise, rejoice and sing praise."—Psa. 98: 3. And so "the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."—Hab. 2: 14.

The whole history of the Jewish church, foretold and illustrated by prophecy, presents many a striking lesson. It shows us the sovereign, righteous, and merciful government of Jehovah; the fatal consequences of unbelief; the infinite importance of knowing the day of salvation, and rightly improving our privileges. It holds forth many an affecting illustration of the wisdom and power, the forbearance and loving kindness, the justice and compassion of the great Lord of all."—Bickersteth on the Prophecies.

A brief cable dispatch lately brought the announcement that the Turkish Government had given its consent to the circulation of the Bible in Turkey. A letter from Rev. Dr. Bliss in the Congregationalist gives further details of the concession, and shows it to be a very important victory for the missionaries. By it the Turkish government authorizes the printing of the book, and also the insertion upon the title page of a statement to the effect that this authorization has been given, so that nobody can stop its sale in the empire. A persistent demand was made at the very last on the part of the officials that the book should be labeled "For Protestants," or "Protestant Translation." Had this point been conceded, any colporter caught selling the book to Turks might have been stopped, and pointed to the title-page, and told that the book was for Protestants, and must be sold only to them alone. "But," argued the officials, "something must be appended to the statement of authorization to prevent the people saying that the Mohammedan government is responsible for the book. Finally it was agreed to put on the title-page, in addition to the authorization, the name of the printer and the name of the Bible Society under whose auspices the book is published. This saves the point the officials made, while the official authorization secures the right to sell to anybody who wishes to buy.

THE RESTITUTION,
Plymouth, Indiana.

Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the doctrine of restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through christ, and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential to final salvation.

Communications.—The Editor must not be understood as endorsing all the sentiments expressed by correspondents whose articles are inserted under this head. Each writer is alone responsible for the articles bearing his own signature. If the reading of any writer is not endorsed, an article setting forth the views of the party differing may be forwarded. Free discussion of Bible doctrine is on all sides will be allowed, but the Editor reserves the privilege of criticising those communications which antagonize a belief and obedience of the Gospel as a means of salvation, or which undermine its principles.

The Size of the Holy City.

In the Bible Echo for July 30th, something is said about the supposed dimensions of the New Jerusalem and the supposition of its pyramidal form is spoken of as ridiculous; but what more likely form could be conceived for a city whose height was reckoned by thousands of furlongs, while less than a hundred and fifty cubits measured the height of its wall. The really ridiculous thing is to suppose that such a wall surrounding such a city, could be called great and high, and the "thoughtful reading" of those words long ago convinced me "there must be a mistake somewhere," either in the text or the interpretation. It also struck me that possibly a similar mistake had been made regarding its length and breadth, in which there seemed an unreasonable expenditure of divine energy, especially when compared with a city having much the same features, and to which the same or similar purposes were assigned both in nature and extent. The suspicion that a critical comparison of the two would reveal their kinship, was strengthened by reading the following from page 202 to 205 of Begg's Scriptural Evidence of Christ's Speedy Return in Glory, etc., second edition, London, James Nisbet, 1850:

"In all the works we have seen which treat on this point, a great discrepancy is indeed supposed to exist between the statement of the prophet and that of the apostle. But this mistake has arisen from an oversight of the fact, that while the one states the circumference, the other informs us of the square measurement. Ezekiel says, 'It was, round about, eighteen thousand measures' of the angel's reed, which was 'six great cubits' long, of twenty-two inches each. Being a square, each 'side' was 'four thousand and five hundred measures' of the reed. Ezek. xlviii. 32. But John does not specify its length or breadth, but having mentioned that it is square, he gives the measurement accordingly: 'And the city lyeth four-square, and the length is as large as the breadth; and he (the angel) measured the city with the reed, twelve thousand furlongs. The length and the breadth and the height of it are equal.' Rev. xxi. 16, 17. It was not the length, or breadth, or height, which the angel measured. These he declares to be 'equal,' but the twelve thousand furlongs' is not the dimensions of each or any of its sides, as is commonly supposed, but of 'the city'—'four square.' Considering this, therefore, as neither the length nor the breadth, but as the measurement of the area of the city, and reckoning by the Jewish furlong of 206⅔ cubits, as stated by Maimonides, on extracting the square of the measurement of the circumference of the city given by Ezekiel, we obtain a view by which the statements of the prophet and apostle are found to correspond very nearly, and which would probably correspond exactly if Maimonides' standard were perfectly accurate, thus confirming the view of their identity. * * * From the account of the descent of the New Jerusalem being placed in John's vision after that of the final resurrection and general judgment, it has been supposed by some to be the place of blessedness after the millennium. But the order of insertion is of itself no criterion of the order of time. When the apostle has carried forward his narrative of one class of events, he refuses to take up another or to explain particular parts which would have occupied too much space in the narrative itself. The whole book is constructed on this principle; and thus, long after the announcement of the kingdoms of this world having become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, we have again brought before us the existence and success of antichrist. But, in all such cases, a key is given for the elucidation of the prophecy, and for determining the relative periods of the several parts. In the case before us, the New Jerusalem descends to the new earth, and this is connected with the millennium by the prediction of the prophet Isaiah. Its relation to time and the things of time is farther evident from the fact, that 'the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honor into it;' it must, therefore, have a reference to this world, while the relation subsists between kings and their subjects."

The size of the city as calculated by Begg, would be 91¼ miles each way, or 37 miles round. It will be seen that he does not trouble himself about the height. An ardent Bible student, well known to some of your readers, Joseph Hollingworth Wood, understood not that the height was equal to the length or breadth, but that there was no inequality in the height, length or breadth of any of the four sides. Supposing the words, whose authenticity is questioned by Granville Penn to be an interpolation, may not that have been the interpolator's meaning?

The Man of Sin! Who is He?

Commentators of considerable ability contend that "the Pope is the Man of Sin." Let us turn to Daniel and we notice that the "vile person" spoken of obtains the kingdom just after the tax-gatherer comes to his end neither in anger or in battle. And this "vile person" becomes "the king of the north" and contends in battle with "the king of the south." Now if the tax-gatherer who comes to his end so queer, has ever existed, then we are able to tell who his successor was, or is. Surely if these personages have existed there must be some history of them, and if so, where are their deeds and lives recorded. Yes, "the king of the north" is to make war with "the king of the south." But when? Ans. —Just before, "and at the time (or years of the end." Also at the time of the end shall be the vision; (Daniel saw) and at the time of the end the king of the south shall (not may but shall!) push at him:" the king of the north, or the vile person referred too. "And at that time Michael may stand up." When? "The king of the north shall plant his tabernacle between the two seas; (not in Rome) but in the glorious holy mountains, and he (the vile person) shall come to his end and none shall help him." How can anything in prophecy be plainer?

Well, Paul declares "the Man of Sin must be revealed." If so, then it must be hereafter, and he must be a personal man, and not a power or a succession of powers, but a personal antichrist, and as Christ was and is to be personal Savior, so must his opponent be personal and without a successor. For he is to exhalt himself (as no one else does it for him) above everything that is called God, and he is to sit in the temple of God, etc. Now as to that temple being a congregation of believers of another gospel, whether Jew or Gentile, Italian or German, bond or free, I dare not take such a position, for then I might admit the old Pope to be the "Man of Sin," which I cannot do, with the faith of the gospel as delivered by Paul.

We read in scripture, of Solomon building a temple unto the Lord and dedicating of it, etc. Again Zerubabel also erects the temple; and one being built just before Jesus came preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God. Now brethren, if those three were literal temples, so must the one be that the "Man of Sin shall sit in." It can not be figured away or symbolized either, you need not try. Well, after a temple is erected, where Solomon's once stood in all its glory, and containing the shekinah, so I verily believe, another temple, on the same spot, will be erected, and the "Man of Sin sit in that, and declare himself God, and worship a God his fathers knew nothing of. And this same "Prince that shall come," or as Jesus terms him, "the Prince of this earth," and as Paul has it, "the god of this world." I believe he is the prince, and "he shall confirm a covenant with many for one week." Now, I ask, what week is that? Ans.—The seventieth one, found in Daniel's prophecy. And in which we find this Prince "in the midst of this week, causes the sacrifice and the oblation to cease," for a certain purpose. And in that week or seven years, we learn the saints is given into the hands of the Little Horn, "for a time, (one year) and times, (two years) and the dividing of time," (six months) to wear them out, and the same length of time, which is 1,260 days, or 42 literal months. God gives power to his two witnesses, whoever they are, to prophecy clothed in sackcloth. Now, when two persons so clothed, and prophecying, and doing such wonders before "the beast." The "man of sin," the "vile person," the "Prince of this world," we certainly will know it.

Let no one deceive you, for if we are the children of the light, we need not grope around in darkness; but rather let us walk in the light, as God is in the light. But if we follow the wisdom of this world, and not the wisdom of God's prophets, will we be blinded just as far as we are led. In my first letter on "time," I enumerated six things to be done in the seventy weeks determined upon Daniel's people. And of the 2,300 days, the 1,260, the 1,335, and the 1,290 being literal days, and in that last week spoken of in prophecy, when it shall be said, "there shall be time no longer," that is the end spoken of, comes within that year the acceptable one of the Lord, when he shall remember Zion and his people, "Judah and Israel" shall return unto Zion, etc.; and shall enter into that "rest" that is "glorious," for God will be there, and everlasting peace and joy will be upon their heads. And all the saints will be there, and the world's jubilee have come, and such a glorious gathering will be "in that day," eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, neither can ye think how or what it shall be. But God will have the glory of the universe after the last week has past, and the "Man of Sin" revealed, and comes to his inglorious end, and none to help him. Though he slays the two witnesses of God, and they lie in the city three days without a burial, but the Spirit of God raises them up—oh, such sublimity, amazing wonders, when they are past, then the kingdom of God—and his will done on earth as in heaven—amen.

The River of Life.

I notice in an article by Edward Turney, copied from the "Bible Echo," into the last number of the RESTITUTION, on this subject, that the writer takes the position of Major Scott Phillips, that this river, spoken of by the prophets as healing the waters of the Dead Sea and filling it with multitudes of fish, is caused by an earthquake valley from Jerusalem to the Mediterranean Sea; or rather from sea to sea, by which the waters of the Great Sea come rushing through and down the declivity of 1317 feet into the Dead Sea, and with a mighty torrent, sweeping away all barriers till it finds an outlet in the Red Sea at the Gulf of Akaba; thus making Jerusalem at once the emporium of the world, the commercial metropolis of the globe. This may be a harmless conceit in itself; but as it is being followed by not a few, and stands in the way of a proper understanding of some important things stated concerning the ages to come, I think proper to call the attention of the readers of our paper and possibly of Mr. Turney himself to the facts.

In the first place, all the prophets agree in making Jerusalem the source of these waters. They do not begin at the sea coast and flow through and past Jerusalem; but they rise within the city itself, and flow opposite ways, one half going down to the Dead Sea, and the other half to the Mediterranean, Zech. xiv. 8. Hence Jerusalem the source of the waters, is higher than the surrounding country; and this is expressly affirmed by Zechariah, who says that the country from Geba to Rimmon, one on the north, other he calls "Jehovah Shammah," or "The Lord is there." Through this city "in the midst of its broad street" the western branch of the River of Life wends its way. Its majestic wall and golden streets, form an impassible barrier to the profane vessels of trading Gentile merchants. They may moor their barks upon the coast and possibly replenish their barrels from the healing stream at its mouth; but their keels shall never pass its channel, much less shall they cast anchor in its harbor. Isaiah expressly affirmed that "Then the glorious Lord will be unto us a place of broad rivers and streams wherein shall go no galley with oars, neither shall gallant ship pass thereby." Isa. xxxiii. 20-21. Two cities in the land, the Old and the New Jerusalem, one the political and religious, but not the commercial capital of the world; the other the princely abode of Jesus and the Redeemed Saints, hidden from all profane eyes by the over-shadowing cloud; both watered by the healing stream and fed by the trees of life are most clearly brought to light in the Scriptures. May that river "the streams whereof shall make glad the city of our God, the holy places of the Tabernacles of the Most High soon send out its healing waters to refresh and enliven the land promised to Abraham, and gladden the whole earth." Amen.

Standing Armies.

Five millions men are under arms in Europe. These five million include the very flower of the population, those least liable to death under the natural and normal conditions of life, and it is proved, beyond doubt by army physicians, that in our military hospitals, as, for instance, in that of the Val de Grace at Paris, that the mortality of soldiers is double and treble that of the remainder of the population of civil life. How much of valuable labor does this system take away from the work shop, the hearth, and the family? And during this time what becomes of the 5,000,000 women who ought to be companions of these men, and of the families which should be the fruit of their marriages?

When throughout the surface of the civilized world, we see every year the return of spring, and renovated life everywhere, then also at the sound of the drum, and at the summons of the trumpet, the young men, our laboring youth are called to present themselves, in each district, before the representatives of the central authority of the country. They come in parties with ribbons in their hats. These young men are but food for cannon, and those representatives of authority are only ordered to judge of the quality of the supply. And when they have them ranged like beasts for sale, they compel them to take off the garments which protect their modesty, and to do violence to their feelings of shame. They make them naked in each other's presence, like brutes. Then they examine them, they handle them, they turn them about, they open their mouths as if they were horses or dogs, in order to see their teeth, and finally they draw them up in two flocks like the sheep and goats in the Gospel parable. On the one side are the robust, the handsome, the agile, those whose hands are clever in the use of tools, and whose vigorous blood is fitted to multiply upon earth a strong and healthy race: and on the other side are the weak, the lame, the maimed, the deaf, the one-eyed, all those who may be considered as the ones to be eliminated (if it were permitted to use the term in speaking of the sacred subject of human nature.)

And all this accomplished, then the public authorities assume a grave countenance, and pronounce those youths, whom they have so carefully selected, as the best to be found "good for slaughter" ("Bon pour Boucherie.") Yes, good for the slaughter of the battlefield, and for the deadly demoralization of the barracks.

And then they say to the others, to those whom they do not deem fit for the bullet or for the bayonet thrust, "You are good enough for marriage, and for labor!" Alas! that such things should be done in this nineteenth century, and amongst the "greatest nations in the world, amongst Europeans calling themselves civilized and Christians! These things show the reason why the population of France is not increasing, or, at least, why it increases so slowly. And yet we wonder at the misery and degredation of our populace, at their suffering, and their vices.—Speech by M. Pouyy, of Paris.

A Jewish Empire in Russia.

During the second half of the tenth century a Jewish empire existed in Southern Russia, known by the name of the Chasari-Empire. It was very extensive and powerful; its true history, however, has been shrouded in obscurity. The utmost that was known was, that up to the time of the victorious contests of Swjatoslaws—964-965—it comprised a large extent of territory on the Caucasus, in the Taurian peninsula on the Don and the Wolga; but its real dimensions could not be determined. Recent literary discoveries justify the hope that light may be thrown on the subject. Chisdai ibn Shabrut, who occupied a high position at the court of the Spanish Kalif Abdarrahmans III., had received information of the existence of a Jewish empire in a foreign country, and he believed that the dynasty at the head of the Jewish Empire would be successful in re-establishing the empire of the lost ten tribes. Delighted at this idea and anxious to have better information, he addressed a long communication to the Jewish king, which letter duly reached him. The letter of the Ibn Shabrut is full of interest, but of greater importance still is the reply of King Joseph. All that was known of his correspondence was an extract published in 1577, but the full text has been discovered in the manuscript collection of the late Karaite savant Abraham Firkowitsch; he had brought it from Egypt, and the scholars, who have examined it pronounce it genuine. It furnishes a valuable contribution to the knowledge of the extent and history of the Jewish Empire. Of course some of the geographical appellations occurring therein will be very difficult to explain, but scientific research will no doubt solve these problems. Russian students have already gone to work at it with zeal and assiduity. The well-known scholar, Dr. A. Harkavy, has lately published an article on the subject in the Russian Review. He produces both letters in German translation, with explanation. The same scholar is preparing a book on the subject in the Russian language, which is now being published in numbers. It will be interesting to have the light of authentic history thrown on a subject which has thus far lived mostly in the obscurity of tradition.—N. Y. Jewish Times.

The Herzegovinian War.

A little war has broken out in the westernmost province of European Turkey which may spread into a wide conflagration. Herzegovina contains a population of 200,000, of which 150,000 belong to the Greek church, 48,000 are Catholics, and 62,000 Mohammedans. The area of the province is nearly equal to that of Massachusetts. Massachusetts has 1,600,000 on her soil, which is a proof that Herzegovinam is thinly populated.

The country is mountainous, and therefore breeds a hardy and brave race. They have been under Mohammedan rule for the past 250 years, but they have always detested it, yet, of course, they had to submit to superior force.

The Christians not only detest the Mohammedan religion, but they still more detest Mohammedan taxation, which is always onerous and cruelly collected; that is, the tax-gatherer would take from the peasant almost his last bushel of grain. The Turks have had such difficulty in collecting taxes in Herzegovina that back taxes had accumulated into quite a pile. This year the sultan's necessities compelled him not only to try to collect the taxes of the present year, but the accumulative taxes of the past years. But the crops of the Herzegovinians have been poor, and they could not pay these exactions without extreme distress, perhaps starvation. So they concluded it was perhaps better to die on the battle field than to starve in their cottages; hence the rebellion.

The Herzegovinians have fought with the courage of despair, and on every occasion have defeated the Turks. This success has naturally given them warmer allies in the surrounding Slavonic races; so the Croatians, the Bosnians and the Servians are joining them.

It is estimated that the rebellion has already spread among three millions of people, most of them of the Greek faith; and if Turkey does not succeed in putting it down in 1876, it may spread to all the provinces north of the Balkan Mountains, which contain a population of 11,000,000, only one million of which are Mohammedans, the residue being Greeks and Roman Catholics. In that event it would be impossible for Turkey to put it down. Then new complications would arise. Austria, Russia, and England would become the interested parties. England desires to preserve the integrity of the Ottoman empire, not only because her capitalists hold a large amount of the Turkish bonds, but because the English believe that Turkey is the sole barrier against the progress of Russia towards British India. Austria longs to annex to her empire the Turkish provinces to the south of her, while Russia wants Bulgaria, which would bring her to the foot of the Balkan Mountains. If England should show any signs of active hostility Austria and Russia might offer Germany a slice of northern Turkey, and then England would have to keep quiet.—Rural Weekly Wisconsin.

Bottom Truths.

BY JAMES WILLIAM KIMBALL.

One of the ancients says, "Happy is he who knows the causes of things," which is much the same as to say, he is a happy man who knows bottom truths. That is what we all want; all sensible men, at any rate. In whatever department of science we are engaged, we want to get at the foundations. Everything that is anything rests on something; and we want to find that something, and know all about it.

Thus, for an example, there is such a thing as friendship and fellowship with God. It has its foundation in the will of God. This is matter of record: "And God said, let us make man in our image, after our likeness,—so God created man in His own image,"—and having thus made man, He announced to him the law of his being—"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, mind, and strength; and thy neighbor as thyself."

God laid the foundation for man's friendship with Himself in man's likeness to Himself; man could see and appreciate, love and hate, choose and refuse; in short, apportion his like and his dislike, as God Himself does, to the merit or demerit of every object. On the same scale he could and would seek the good and repel the evil. God Himself is the supreme good. Man is so made as to recognize this; and he is endowed with a will to choose according to intrinsic worth. This will of man cannot be overcome by force. So, then, if man is ever found choosing aught below the Supreme Good, we shall find irrefragable evidence that he has fallen, and by his own choice. As none can bring good out of evil, if man is ever reclaimed it must be by the Supreme will; and by and through the Supreme Benevolence imparting to man a specific for his reclamation. That specific is faith. For it is evident that man made in God's image could be swayed neither for nor from God mechanically; but by the application, the bestowal, rather, of some power that could prevail to sway the will, and that power is faith. So, then, it is written: "He that cometh to God must believe that He is; and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him."

—Dr. James Guthrie in his autobiography gives the following advice to young minister.: "Observe either to draw your pen entirely through, or alter any passage which you find it very difficult to commit to memory. A thing is easily remembered which is striking, and retained which is striking; and what does not impress your own mind in these ways, and therefore is committed with difficulty, you may be sure won't tell on the minds of young hearers. Mind the three P's. In every discourse the preacher should aim at proving, printing, and persuading; in other words, addressing the reason, the fancy, and the heart."

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.

The Gospel in Goodland.

Agreeable to our announcement, we commenced meetings in Goodland, Sunday, Sept. 19th, and continued through the week and over the following Sunday, speaking every night and twice on each Sunday. Our meetings were well attended during the week, although it was a busy season with many who came. We took up the subject of the Gospel, and tried to present the true hope set forth in promise and in prophecy, showing that Jesus Messiah is the central character of the plans and purposes of the Father; that aliens can only secure eternal life and its blessings through the name of Jesus. In all we delivered ten discourses, which resulted in much good.

On Thursday we repaired to the water and immersed five believers in the gospel of the kingdom of God; and on Sunday we again went to the water, where eleven more were baptized into Jesus Christ, making in all sixteen who made the good confession. Among the number were six young men, who have been investigating the promises since last October. The society now numbers about forty. There are many intelligent people in the community, who are deeply interested in the blessed gospel of Jesus Christ. Our meeting closed on Sunday night. It was estimated that four hundred persons listened to our discourse upon the Reason for our Hope. During the last year, we have delivered in all, fifty-four discourses upon the great questions of Life and the Kingdom of God, in Goodland. May those who have become obedient to the word of promise continue faithful unto the Perfect Day, is our earnest prayer.

The Living Way.

Under the teachings of Christ we have the assurance of life in almost every form of expression and doctrine. Indeed life seems to be the emblem used by all who have come into communion with the Gospel of Christ.

If we speak of our approach toward God, the assurance is, that it is by a new and a living way. Those who hunger and thirst after righteousness are blessed with the living bread, and the living water. When doubts cloud the sky and darkness obscures the way, it is then that we feel the preciousness of the lively hope. The great offering which we are to make to God places our bodies upon the altar as a "living sacrifice holy and acceptable unto God."

The message which brought to us the blessed news of redemption is declared to be the "word of God which liveth and abideth forever." The saints are compared to a magnificent temple shining in the brightness of God's own light. In this temple there are lively stones most precious.

Instead of being bound by the Legal ceremonies of Moses we are to be led by "the law of the spirit of life." These foretastes are to us assurances of that eternal life which is promised to all who obey the lively oracles.

When the truth has quickened our hearts we are to be buried in the likeness of Christ's death, and beyond this, there is a rising up into the newness of life.

Indeed the whole outline of inspired truth comes to us as a vitalizing power. The very words, spoken by our Lord, are declared to be "spirit" and "life;" they will impart a living faith, renew the heart, place us in the living temple and make us heirs of eternal life which shall be given when death is swallowed up in victory, and when we shall be led to living fountains of water.

The Ten Commandments a Covenant.

There are those who seem to think that the ten commandments were not a COVENANT. The object of denying this seems plain, when we consider that the seventh day Sabbath is included among those precepts which were written on stone. If it can be shown by indubitable testimony that the ten commandments were called a covenant, then it will be easy to learn whether we are under that covenant, or some other institution brought into force by the Son of God. Let us turn to the Scriptures and see what is said upon this point.

"And the Lord spake unto you out of the midst of the fire; ye heard the voice of the words, but saw no similitude; only ye heard a voice. And He declared unto you HIS COVENANT, which he commanded you to perform, EVEN TEN COMMANDMENTS; AND HE WROTE THEM UPON TWO TABLES OF STONE." Deut. iv. 12-13.

If there is any force in language, or if words are the signs of ideas, then it follows that the ten commandments were called a covenant, that it was not a mistake on the part of Moses is evident from other testimonies. In the ix. chapter of the same book, he says: "And it came to pass at the end of forty days and forty nights, that the Lord gave me the two tables of stone, EVEN THE TABLES OF THE COVENANT." Paul understood that these tables of stone contained the words of the covenant, as will appear from Heb. ix. 3-4: "And after the second veil, the tabernacle which is called the Holiest of all; which had the golden censer, and the ark of the covenant overlaid round about with gold, wherein was the golden pot that had manna, and Aaron's rod, that budded, and the TABLES OF THE COVENANT." These testimonies are sufficient to establish the proposition that the ten commandments were called or known as the covenant. No sort of reasoning or sophistry can evade the force of the language.

This covenant was made with Israel through Moses at Horeb, and was not known before as a covenant. This will appear plain to the reader from a quotation from Deut. v. 2-3. The Lord our God made a covenant with us in Horeb. The Lord made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us, even us, who are all of us here alive this day. The Lord talked to you face to face in the mount out of the midst of the fire, (I stood between the Lord and you at that time, to show you the word of the Lord; for ye were afraid by the reason of the fire, and went not up into the mount;) saying." From this point he proceeds to give the ten commandments in their order. Here then it is plain that the Decalogue is not only called the tables of the covenant, but it is called the covenant even before it is given to Israel by the hand of Moses. It is also plain that this covenant was made with that generation in Horeb and not before. These points being settled by the word of God, we shall now proceed to show that we are not under that covenant. In order to make the subject clear, we will place the testimony of Paul before the reader with a quotation from Moses to which he alludes.

PAUL'S STATEMENT. 2 Cor. iii. Forasmuch as ye are manifestly declared to be the epistle of Christ ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the spirit of the living God; NOT IN TABLES OF STONE, but in fleshly tables of the heart. v. 3. But if the ministration of death WRITTEN AND ENGRAVEN IN STONES was glorious, so that the children of Israel could not steadfastly behold the face of Moses, for the glory of his countenance; WHICH GLORY WAS TO BE DONE AWAY." How shall not the ministration of the spirit be rather glorious? For if that which is done away was glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious * * * And not as Moses which put a veil over his face, that the children of Israel could not steadfastly look to the END OF THAT WHICH IS ABOLISHED; but their minds were blinded; for until this day remaineth the same veil untaken away in the reading of the OLD TESTAMENT; (covenant) WHICH VEIL IS DONE AWAY IN CHRIST

That Paul alludes directly to the giving of the ten commandments in the language quoted, will appear plain by reading—

MOSES' ACCOUNT. Ex. xxxiv. 27-29. "And the Lord said unto Moses, write thou these words; for after the tenor of these words I have made a covenant with thee and with Israel. And he was there with the Lord forty days and forty nights; and he did neither eat bread nor drink water. And he wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant, the ten commandments. And it came to pass, when Moses came down from Mount Sinai with the two tables of testimony in Moses' hand. When he came from the mount, that Moses wist not that the skin of his face shone while he talked with him. * * * And till Moses had done speaking with them, he put a veil on his face." v. 33-35.

This makes the matter so plain that no one can be at a loss to understand it. Paul's reference is to this very quotation which we have here given. In this are all the points mentioned by the apostle. The covenant of ten commandments written on stone, the glory of Moses, the veil on his face, and the incidents of coming down from the Mount Sinai. And it is explicitly stated by the apostle these are all DONE AWAY, ABOLISHED, DONE AWAY IN CHRIST. What can be plainer? And upon what hypothesis can men undertake to enforce the keeping of the old covenant system, which has plainly ceased to be obligatory.

Many of the commands under the old covenant were outward, while the doctrines of the new are to be written upon the fleshly tables of the heart Hence says Jesus: "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, thou shalt not kill; and whosoever shall kill shall be in danger of the judgment; but I say unto you, that whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment." Matt. v. It will be seen from this that Jesus goes beyond the letter and places his law in the mind, where God said he would write the laws of the new covenant, "upon their minds will I write them." Truly the "letter killeth but the Spirit giveth life." The laws of Moses controlled men's outward conduct, but the teachings of Christ were intended to apply, more especially, to the hearts of men.

But we are told that we have no moral law, if the ten commandments are done away. We would say that the ten commandments are nowhere called a moral law. Again, it is said that we can sin and do that which is wicked if there is no law. Paul says: "What then? Shall we sin, because we are not under the law, but under grace? God forbid." Rom. vi. 15. Again, "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so FULFILL THE LAW OF CHRIST."

The Signs of the Times.

Watch, therefore: for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come.—Matt. xxiv. 42.

Definite-timests, to evade the force of this language affirm that Christ did not say that none would ever know the day or year when he would return. But that this very language had direct reference to his second coming is evident from the commandment to watch for his coming. Why watch 1800 years before an event may be expected. He had just told them that no man knew the day or the hour when he should come; also that it shall be as it was in the days of Noah and Lot when the Son of Man shall appear. And because his people living when he shall come will not know the time of his coming, he commands them to watch. If they should know the definite time they could not watch until the time appointed, because of course they would not look for him before they expected his coming, and they could not expect him before the time appointed.

The following similitude, illustrative of the relative position of his people when he comes excludes the idea of knowledge relative to the time of his advent. Christ adds: "But know this, that if the good man of the house had known in what hour of the watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up." v. 43.

The foregoing clearly teaches:

1. That the church will pass through an indefinite period of time antecedent to his coming. If they do not expect his coming until the commencement of the last watch, of course they neither could or would watch for him during the three previous watches. Just so, in reference to the watches preceding the one during which they expect the return of their absent Lord. And even though the time of his coming should be appointed for the last day of the night, they could not watch until the commencement of that day. If a wise man should apprehend the approach of a thief, on a certain night, and should not know the exact time, he would prepare before dark, and then commence watching as soon as the shades of night began to gather about him, lest coming in unawares he would find him unprepared, or off his guard, and would break into his house and take his goods.

2. If there is the least probability of Christ coming during the approaching night, it would be a wise precaution to make the entire preparation during the light of day; or if not admonished until twilight was casting his gloom around us, so much the more need of vigilance, lest being found unprepared we should be cut off with hypocrites and unbelievers.

Referring to the importance of being prepared when the bridegroom shall come, he subjoins the following commandment: "Therefore be ye also ready; for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh;" v. 44. What a sad plight his bride would exhibit, to not have on her bridal robes furnished by her royal consort, when he comes. But how much more sorry the plight to have no wedding garment in which to appear before the hymeneal altar.

A person is not ready for the cars until the preparation is complete. While there remains a thing to be done or duty to be performed we are not ready for the cars. To be ready we must be standing on the platform, our baggage checked, and ready to step on board the moment the cars stop. But in the simile before us, if not prepared for the first train the next may pick us up. The royal palace car will pass through the world but once. It will be a special train, prepared for the King's beautiful bride. Other trains may pass for subjects, but none for the royalty.

There will be no time for preparation when the voice of the archangel and the trump of God shall reverberate through earth and air, calling the redeemed millions to meet their descending Lord mid heavens. That we may be among that glorious throng, let us be sure and have on the wedding garment, lamps trimmed and brightly burning, and be prepared to meet the bridegroom.

4. Having made the requisite preparation, let us commence watching with the first watch of the night, and continue to watch, that whether our Lord shall come the first, second, third or fourth watch he may find us ready and waiting. On such he pronounces a blessing. He adds: "Blessed is that servant whom his Lord when he cometh shall find so doing." Such, too, shall share the glory and honor of Christ's royal house. Concerning such he says: "Verily, verily, I say unto you that he shall make him ruler over all his house."—46 47.

But to those who become impatient and fretful, and maltreat their fellow-servants, and choose instead of the good and virtuous of earth, pugilists, and drunkards he says: "But and if that evil servant shall say in his heart my Lord delayeth his coming; and shall begin to smite his fellow-servants, and to eat and drink with the drunken; the lord of that servant shall come in a day when he looketh not for him, and in an hour that he is not aware of, and shall cut him asunder, and appoint him his position with the hypocrites: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth."—48-51.

1. Two things are necessary to delay: first, time must be set; second, set time must pass without the hopes of those who were expecting anything being realized. If the cars should arrive in advance of the time appointed, there would be no delay. If they should arrive on time, still there would be no delay. But if they should not arrive on time, then it might be said the cars delay their coming.

2. Still the disappointed would not despair unless the cars should tarry long. But if the agent should go on selling time after time, and disappointment should succeed disappointment, he should not be astonished if some of the more restless should become impatient and curse him, and leaving lost self-control, they should curse and abuse their more patient brethren.

This is a fac simile of the real state of affairs. Time after time has been set, delay has succeeded delay, disappointment has succeeded disappointment, until many, in despair or skepticism, give up the Bible, and in their desperation fill up the description Christ has given of the foolish virgins. One extreme produces another. Credulity when often disappointed, and hopes are long deferred often ends in either despair or skepticism. Timests have fulfilled a class of prophecies that never could have been fulfilled had not the time of Christ's coming been set; and had not the time appointed run out without the hopes of the timests being realized. But this does not prove these time moves to have been of God. Papacy and the great Catholic church fulfilled more prophecies than any other power of earth, and were they therefore of God? Christ having given the history of the wisdom and folly of two classes of expectants of his coming, one timests, and the other patiently waiting till he comes, then introduces the parable to illustrate the wisdom of one and the folly of the other. When parables are not interpreted, the only clue to their meaning must be gleaned from the context. Two facts appear upon the face of this parable: Two classes will be looking for the coming of Christ —that one of these classes will be wise and the other foolish. The wisdom of one will consist in being constantly watching and constantly ready. The folly of the other, in neglecting these precautions. And Christ will find the latter unprepared. Relying upon human calculation and times, will have had much to do with their disappointment. Of all who are looking for the coming of Christ, only about half will be ready when he shall come. May we be wise unto salvation.

Immortality.

Human consciousness gives an emphatic testimony to the souls inherent immortality. Observation confirms our consciousness in this affirmation. How exquisitely the soul is revealed. in the attitude, guilelessness and beaming features of happy childhood. Thoughts, playing upon lovely faces, speak of a living immortal principal within, what is this that so skilfully touches the material structure, and produces the marvelous modulations of articulated sounds, that lingers upon the face in each picture of passion and hope; or when thought is intense, that starts the life blood through each vein, or when we sail over tranquil seas, that diffuses a sweet serenity upon the external features? The soul! The soul awakes the "music beaming from the face." The soul is the intricate framework of these bodies, but it is not of that material structure. What is the painter's skill? Is it not to catch the evanescent play of light from the soul, and produce it upon the speaking canvas? What is the fascination of the gifted orator, but the revelation in that illuminated face, of a soul moved by its deep convictions.

But we do not stand, like the philosopher of distant centuries, amid doubtful speculations. God has spoken. Light, soft and delicious as the breath of heaven, has lifted the clouds of human folly. How conclusive is Scripture. What mean these soul yearnings woven in the texture of Holy Writ. the heart and flesh failing, but God the the portion forever; absent from the body and present with the Lord; fearing them which kill the soul; the celestial visit of Moses and Elias in the Mount—what mean all these, if the soul be a mere attenuated form of matter, or only "an effect of several molecules endowed with force." Not No! Out of the depth of human nature, is the voice, which perverted reason may never hush; along the pages of Revelation are sublime teaching, which human pride may never challenge.

The soul is immortal; it is thus gifted by the infinite will; no accumulation of guilt can extirpate this original endowment. Fearful, then, is the condition of sinners. Two worlds are weighed in a balance of immortal souls. An atom, a thought, a prejudice may sink the scale, and plunge them into hell; a prayer, a penitential cry, may lift them to eternal bliss.—Cowman's Herald. Sept. 1, 1875.

The writer of the above, evidently presents it as an argument on the soul's immortality. Taking a negative view, we will weigh his evidence.

He says, "Human consciousness gives an emphatic testimony to the soul's inherent immortality." This is a broad assertion in the affirmative; the writer evidently understands the weakness of his structure, and endeavors to lay broad foundations for it. As it is a mere affirmation, we need but urge a denial of its truth, and appeal to every unbiased mind, if mere consciousness (apart from prejudice engendered by the teachers of the popular doctrine) would impress our minds with a belief of the soul's immortality.

"Observation confirms our consciousness in this affirmation. How exquisitely the soul is revealed in the attitude, guilessness and beaming features, of happy childhood." Here the writer drops the subject of the soul's immortality, and presents an argument on the soul's existence; as we do not deny the soul's existence, we cannot see that "observation confirms the affirmation of the soul's immortality." The phrases "attitude, guilessness and beaming features;" "thoughts playing upon lovely faces;" "the marvelous modulations of articulated sounds;" "that diffuses a sweet serenity upon the external features;" "music beaming from the face;" "evanescent play of light," and "revelation in that illuminated face," are all very pretty expressions, but they do not contain a particle of evidence of the soul's immortality.

"But we do not stand, like the philosopher of distant centuries, amid doubtful speculations; God has spoken." Our friend (unintentionally perhaps) designates all his foregoing evidence as doubtful speculation, and proposes, now, to introduce Scriptural evidence. Yea! God has spoken, and we will see what He says; the teachings of the Spirit are not contradictory; a direct affirmation from Him is worth all the doubtful speculation and inferential testimony that can be produced.

Now unto the king eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honor and glory forever and ever. Amen. Who hath immortality, dwelling in the light, which no man can approach unto; whom no man hath seen, nor can see; to whom be honor and praise everlasting. Amen. 1 Tim. i. 17, and vi. 16.

"How conclusive is Scripture. What mean these soul yearnings woven in the texture of Holy Writ, the heart and flesh failing, but God the portion forever." It was not presumption on the part of David to say, "God is my portion forever;" as he was assured of God's favor, and relied on his promises of a future Savior, and a glorious resurrection; but it would be presumptive if not worse in us, to ignore the life-giving Savior and say, Lord by virtue of my inherent immortality, thou art my portion forever.

"Absent from the body and present with the Lord." Our friend evidently forgets that he is presenting Scriptural evidence of the soul's inherent immortality, and not evidence of the soul's existence; because a thing can exist and not be immortal. By a double assumption and an inference, added to the text he forms a compound, from which he extracts weak inferential evidence. He assumes,

1. That the pronoun we represents an abstract entity (the so-called immortal soul) considered apart from the body.

2. He assumes that the Spirit through Paul, asserts the existence of this abstract relation, this entity; and then infers that if the Spirit through Paul acknowledges the entity's existence, then it must necessarily be immortal.

Paul in the subject under consideration, as seen in the context, is contrasting mortal existence with immortality or life eternal, and "groans being burdened," desiring that mortality might be swallowed up of life—the eternal life derived from Christ the life giver, and not from inherent immortality.

Our friend goes on with his conclusive Scripture "fearing them which kill the soul."

We congratulate our friend, on the amount of proof of the soul's immortality, that is contained in this quotation: we have always been taught that immortality meant deathlessness, incapability of dying, and yet an affirmation, that the soul may be killed, is offered as a proof of its immortality! Our friend should not misquote Scriptures; he should say, "And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul;" (Greek Psuche rendered life forty times in the New Testament) "but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell (Gehenna) Matt. x. 28.

Our friend evidently construes the terms, kill and destroy, to mean to preserve alive in torment; but such construction violates the laws of language, and is inadmissable.

Our Savior evidently was endeavoring to impress the minds of his apostles, that they should not fear men that could kill them, but not affect the preeminent life that was given them, and which entitled them to a resurrection, through faith in Jesus Christ; but they should fear God who could destroy them and their hopes of future existance, if they neglected their duty.

One more conclusive proof of the soul's inherent immortality: — "The celestial visit of Moses and Elias in the mount—what means all these if the soul be a mere attenuated form of matter, or only an effect of several molecules endowed with force."

We feel a little disposed to demur, to the careless use of the term celestial; it betrays a reprehensible carelessness, in one engaged in theological discussion. If the visit was made it was a terrestial and not a celestial visit.

We must regard the evidence here presented as inferential and not direct; built upon a bundle of assumption and inferences, added to the text, upon which is erected the inferential proof. It is assumed first, that Moses and Elias actually visited the mount.

2. It is assumed that as they had been dead, so many years, they could not have made the visit, except as disembodied spirits.

3. It is inferred that as these spirits must have existed several hundred years, therefore, they are immortal.

4. If these disembodied spirits are immortal, all disembodied spirits are immortal.

5. As Moses and Elias were men, and had immortal spirits or souls, then all men have immortal souls.

As the whole structure of our friends evidence rests on the first assumption, that the spirits or souls of Moses and Elias actually visited the mount, and literally stood and conversed with Jesus. We will show that the assumption is false; and the evidence we present is the words of our Savior Matt. xvii. 9.

As they came down from the mountain, Jesus charged them, saying, tell the vision (opama) to no man, until the Son of Man be risen from the dead.

Here our Savior expressly denominates the occurrence as a vision. We place His word in opposition to man's assumption. Which is true? Let our friend present as strong evidence as our Savior's word, that the soul is immortal and we will believe it.

As corroborative testimony, we offer the many instances of Scripture, in which God communicates his revealed will to his chosen ones by visions,—Cornelieus' and Peter's visions for instance. Acts x

As this is a vision, and not a reality it follows that Moses and Elias were not present corporeally nor spiritually, in the sense our friend assumes, and all his inferential testimony fades in the light of revelation and truth.

We can join our friend in saying, "How conclusive is Scripture;" and in conclusion will also say, that the belief of the soul's mortality, may be held without embracing or holding that, the soul be a mere attenuated form of matter, or only, "an effect of several molecules endowed with force;" such so-called philosophical deductions are the mere outgrowth of the gnostic heresy of the soul's inherent immortality.

Rama and Calvary.

BY S. A. C.

Detested King! thy cruel hand
In infant blood deep bathed its brand,
The chill of days in death lies low,
Felled by the slaughtering soldier's blow.

Soft woe, by warm affection spread,
Where innocence reposed its head,—
Which mothers' forms in love bent o'er,
Were crimsoned with the sleepers' gore.

Like lovely buds of vernal mee,
By frosted breath in spring time froze,
These fairer blooms did ne'er unfold,
Chilled by a fiercer frost-night's cold.

As drops the clouds' last-falling rain,
Fell Rachel's tears o'er Rama's plain;
When mother-grief for those that died,—
"My child is not!"—in frenzy cried.

But he whom Herod sought to slay
In Egypt's land was far away;
O noble Rod, of Jesse's stem,
Thy death was not in Bethlehem.

Thy mother mourned o'er thee her loss
O Man of Sorrows, on the cross;
Where Spear that drained Christ's crimson tide
Pierced through the heart in Mary's side.

'Tis nature's self affection feels,
When Mother's heart it's love reveals;
'Tis nature's self that mourns when fate
The mother's heart makes desolate.

From that rock-grave that Joseph built,
Where Christ was laid for human guilt,
Has life-light dawned upon the gloom
Of that black night that palls the tomb.

O Bethlehem, thy children slain
To their own border once again—
From the foes' land released shall come
And Paradise shall be their home.

PLYMOUTH, Sept. 23, 1875.

Correspondence.

BRETHREN:

'This morning our dear brother, B. B. Glover leaves us for his father's, at Ava, Noble county, Ohio, where he expects to make his home. He and his sister, who also accompanies him, heard the truth last January, and united with the Rosehill congregation, of which they remain faithful members up to the present time. We hate to give them up, and shall miss them from our circle. Bro. Glover gives me $2 to pay for the RESTITUTION.

He says there are none of our faith and hope in that section. May they continue to grow in grace and increase in the knowledge of the truth; and may the RESTITUTION be blessed in its weekly visits to that county—may it be the means of bringing others to see the true light, as it is revealed in Christ.

I am truly glad to see the RESTITUTION in such a prosperous condition; it seems to grow better and better.

The cause in this section is looking up; new laborers are entering the field. Bros. H. J. Miller and A. E. Estlack, who also united with the Rosehill congregation last January, are now both in the field preaching the Word with a zeal which is according to knowledge. Just four years ago there was not one of our faith to be found in this section of the country; we now have two churches and three preachers. Opposition is giving way, which at first was strong; people are beginning to read and think for themselves, and the claims of sectarianism are being cut loose, to some extent, yet we have some who, like Ephraim, are bound to their idols, and have more faith in dreams and visions than in the Word of God.

A. F. DUCKER.

INDEPENDENCE GROVE, Iowa.

BRETHREN:

The RESTITUTION is worthy of a good support. Believers in the Gospel, the coming of Christ and the kingdom to come, are fed with strong meat, as well as with milk also. For one I am fond of the apostles' controversy, for without it we become dull and rusty, and those apparent mysteries are left covered and hid from us and our children. The criticisms we often find in the RESTITUTION are profitable. They sharpen our minds, and cause us to search more carefully the Word of God; and besides this, the letters we read from our old, tried friends are like water from the clear, cool fountain, invigorating the thirsty soul. Many of our old veterans of the true Gospel have passed from this vale of tears to their silent rest, waiting for the redemption of their bodies to that inheritance which is incorruptible, and the restitution of all thing. But here and there is one left to tell the story of him crucified, concerning his return again in his kingdom and glory.

We are nearing the haven of our final rest, and while our beacon light shines brighter and brighter, we are stumbling along over the rugged path of life, sustained in our hope and faith only by the living word of God's promises. O how precious the truth is! God's covenant with Abraham and his seed, "if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to promise,"—O how precious! believing in him of whom Moses and the prophets did write, and tell us concerning his coming again; his dominion and glory and kingdom; that he shall take to himself his great power, and reign as it is written of him that "all people nations and languages shall serve him." "His dominion is an everlasting dominion which shall not pass away and his king that which shall not be destroyed."

To become an inheritor of this kingdom is our great desire; for if we fail of this inheritance the Abrahamic promise is lost to us; and if we fail of an inheritance with Abraham and his seed in the kingdom to come, where is our hope for the rest that remains to the people of God?

E. R. SUTHERLIN.

Gleanings.

Bro. Malone, of Palestine, Illinois, lately has visited Russellville, in that state, and delivered four discourses on the kingdom and name, and immersed at the close of his meeting one who became a believer.

He says: I met there with a very intelligent believer lately from Kansas, where he had lost all, or about all his worldly goods.

Through the solicitations of Bro. D. P. Allison, as well as that of Dr. Broyls who belongs to the Christian (by derision Campbellite) church, I visited the place. Bro. Allison's wife is a very intelligent believer, though as yet she has never been immersed into the Christ, and therefore does not by law—the law of Christ—belong to the royal family, to whom all the promises are made. Though she promised that if I could come back again she would be immersed.

There are others also there, who, I am sure, at the next opportunity, will become obedient to the faith.

I am in the practice of medicine; for months past I have been riding almost day and night, and cannot tell, when I make an appointment, whether I can fill it or not. Latterly I have to disappoint the brethren near Paris, Ill., and at West Lebanon, (I think it is called), Ind. This meeting their eye will be a solid excuse to them.

If I live and can, I will visit them soon.

I am doing all I can gratuitously in the way of preaching, anywhere in reach where it costs me nothing but loss of time, and that time to me is worth from $5 to $15 per day. I have lost so much money within the past year or so, having a family to support, that I cannot afford to do more. When I go a distance from home I only ask that my expenses be paid.

Yours, in the hope of the bright dawning.

ALFRED MALONE, M. D.

Bro. Chapman, of Newtonia, Newton county, Missouri, writes:

Our little band of workers at this place (all subscribers to the RESTITUTION) are at work for the truth wherever we can find fit subjects for the kingdom. Several are interested, and good is being done.

Bro. Servis, of Pierce City, preaches for us some times. I regard him as a very able worker, who should have a more extended field for work. We are so much scattered in this part of the state that we do not have conferences. Bro. E. D. Adams battles for the truth and is ever at work with pen, tongue, and tracts, in spreading a gospel that is good news in reality.

Ever yours in Gospel hope,

E. A. CHAPMAN.

Bro. Amos Sanford, of Anna, Ills., writes:

The meeting at Brother Cocker's closed on Sunday night, 10th inst. Sickness in the country prevented a large attendance.

The Adventists refused to meet with us in conference or general meeting. One of them had said he would give me a mule if I would join the Advent conference, and I gave him a chance to "come and let us reason together" to see if it would be right for me to accept the mule on those conditions.

The brethren of the "one faith," few in numbers, had a good meeting.

A letter of recent date from Brother John Foore, of Galesburg, Kansas, speaks of the illness of his family; four sick at one time. He says:

On Tuesday, 22d inst., I expect to begin a public discussion with J. W. Randall, to be held in Crawford county, near Walnut Station, on the Mo. Kan. & T. R. R.

The propositions for discussion are:

1. Do the Scriptures teach that man has an immortal soul or spirit that lives in a conscious state between death and the resurrection either in happiness or misery?

2. Do the Scriptures teach that the kingdom of Christ was set up on the day of Pentecost, and that the church is that kingdom?

J. W. Randall affirms both propositions.

Br. H. M. Coke, of Sulphur Springs, Southern Illinois, writes:

Bro. Sanford is with us, (Sept. 20). We have had a small but very interesting meeting. Bro. Sanford will begin to lecture this evening at sulphur Springs, and will remain with us this week.

It is unreasonable to believe that with the great zeal and knowledge he possesses he can fail to do much good. I believe if the brethren knew his real worth they would keep him in the field. And could they but keep him there a short time, I believe he would build up congregations which would give him a support.

We are alone here in this country. Only a small household of faith; and should we lose Bro. Sanford's labors it would be a sad misfortune to us.

Pleasantville Conference.

Notice was given that the conference would commence on Thursday, Sept. 9th, 1875. But owing to high waters and bad roads, the brethren did not arrive until late Friday night, therefore, our meeting did not begin until Saturday at 11 o'clock a. m. There being but few brethren from other localities present, the business was waived until the "annual conference." It was moved by Brother J. T. Prime, that said conference be held at West Irving, Tama county, Iowa, beginning Thursday evening before the third Sunday in December; carried.

There being no further business before the conference, Brother Hipsher announced the arrangements of the day, which was as follows: Brother T. W. Woodrow was to deliver a discourse in the forenoon, and Brother J. T. Prime, spoke in the evening, concerning the "Restoration of Israel;" after further arrangements conference adjourned till Sunday, half past 10 o'clock.

On Sunday conference convened per agreement. A sermon was delivered by T. W. Woodrow, on the "relation of the Gospel to the kingdom." After which meeting adjourned until half past two, when Brother Woodrow delivered a lecture on the "Four Universal Kingdoms." At 7 p. m. Brother Prime delivered a discourse on the "Birth of the Spirit," giving it a thorough explanation, after which meeting adjourned until Monday evening.

On Monday evening conference convened per agreement, Brother T. W. Woodrow read a proposition to the brethren, and requested that it should be published in this report. The proposition reads as follows: "I do most positively challenge this conference to furnish a man to support in public debate the following very unequivocal proposition, viz: 'The Holy Scriptures teach endless punishment.' Time and place of said discussion, whether oral or written, to be arranged according to the best convenience of all concerned."

After reading the above proposition, he gave an able discourse on "the world to come." We had large and attentive audiences throughout the meetings. Quite an interest was manifested. Several brethren were expected that did not come.

The Catholic Church in the United States probably numbers eight million communicants. The Catholics occupy 6,020 stations, chapels and churches; they have the service of 4,874 priests 6 apostolic vicars, 49 bishops, 9 archbishops, and 1 cardinal. They have 18 theological seminaries with nearly 1,500 students; over 2,000 schools of all grades, and more than 300 asylums and hospitals. There are more than 7 different orders of monks and friars, 12 of nuns, 8 different institutions such as Jesuits and Redemptorists, 12 congregations of priests and brothers, and 30 sisterhoods.

We are emphatically in the age of profanity, and it seems to us that we are on the topmost current. One cannot go on the streets anywhere without having his ears offended with the vilest words, and his reverence shocked by the most profane use of sacred names. Nor does it come from the old or middle-aged alone, for it is a fact, as alarming as true, that the younger portion of the community are most proficient in degrading language.

Boys have an idea it is smart to swear, that it makes them manly; but there never was a greater mistake in the world. Men, even those who swear themselves, are disgusted with profanity in a young man, because they know how, of all bad habits, this clings the most closely, and increases with years. It is the most insidious of habits, growing on so invisibly that almost before one is aware he becomes an accomplished cursor.

It is a notable fact that while not one ex-president of the United States is living, the wives of five of them survive—Mrs. Polk, Mrs. Fillmore, Mrs. Tyler, Mrs. Lincoln, and Mrs. Johnson.

Ladies are decking their bonnets with scarlet, though it is summer. What strange impulse has seized them? Red is for winter, when bright, warm colors are becoming, but it has suddenly appeared in summer. What does it mean? Simply this: we have a Cardinal in the land. Is he not a sprig of royalty? Is his cap not red like fire? Are not ladies always sensitive to the glitter and show of aristocracy? Is there not a subtle power in these tides of fashion which they find it difficult to resist? The Cardinal wears a red cap, and Catholic ladies, of course, will have red upon their bonnets. Will Protestant ladies follow in the wake? Ribbons are of small account, but this sensitiveness to regal influences sent us from Rome, is symptomatic, a sign of undercurrents, the beginning of a power which will make us trouble in the future.—Baptist Union.

Spoiling Ministers.

The tendency is in some quarters to make the minister namby pamby. He gets an idea that he is to be nursed and softly handled, as though he were not able to take care of himself and be a man as well as a minister. As a result of this treatment we have known ministers who could not preach until they had a lump of white sugar melt in their mouth, nor close a service till they had first sucked a lozenge. They are led to feel themselves so feeble of structure that they must be wrapped in furs and dippets, and overshoes, and have hot bricks made for their feet, and warming pans in their beds; and by fifty years of age they become ecclesiastical grannies.

We want a robust and manly ministry. Give us plenty of healthy food to eat, and treat us as though we were soldiers of Jesus Christ, made for long marches and heavy fighting. We know in the ministry of the Presbyterian church a clergyman who carries his cat with him when he goes off to spend his summer vacation. He can not bear to leave the poor creature behind. His overfond congregation have stroked all the vigor out of him, and now he strokes a cat. There is nothing more revolting to us than religious namby-pambyism.—Christian at Work.

OBITUARY.

SYPHER—Jacob Sypher, of Twin Grove, Green Co. Wisconsin, Sept. 18, 1875.

Bro. Sypher was born in Union Co, Pa., June 14, 1830, and was therefore rising of 46 years old. He moved into Green county about 20 years ago, sick with the consumption. For this long period he has been a great sufferer, till at last his fine constitution gave way and he fell a victim to this terrible disease. He was baptized by Elder Henry Collins 18 years ago, and has been a steadfast Christian till the hour of his death. The community lose a valuable citizen, the truth a faithful witness and the family a loving husband and a tender father.

He was greatly prized, and will be sadly missed.

He leaves a wife and two grown daughters to mourn his loss.

Words of comfort and instruction were spoken by the writer, from, John xi. 11: "Our friend Lazarus sleepeth."

J. F. WILLCOX.

HERN—Bessie Hern, son of Bro. and Sister Allison Hern, fell asleep at Lot's Grove, Mo., March 6, 1875, aged 8 years and one month.

Bessie was an exception to most boys. He seemed to take great delight in the Scriptures. He could quote quite a number of texts on life, death and the resurrection, and give book, chapter, and verse. He was a promising boy, and his parents and those who knew him set great store by him, but, alas! the cruel enemy, death, has taken him from our embrace.

The writer addressed a large audience from John v. 28, which was Bessie's favorite text while living.

May the Lord of life and glory soon return to earth again, restore to us our jewel, wipe out the serpent's trail, and reign King over all the earth.

THE RESTITUTION.

All, All is Known to Thee.

My God, whose gracious pity I may claim,
Calling thee Father, sweet, endearing name!
The sufferings of this weak and weary frame,
All, all are known to Thee.

From human eye 'tis better to conceal
Much that I suffer—much I hourly feel;
But oh, the thought does tranquillize and heal;
All, all is known to Thee.

When in the morning unrefreshed I wake,
Or, in the night, but little sleep can take,
This brief appeal, unbidden I make;
All, all is known to thee.

Nay, all by Thee is ordered, chosen, planned;
Each drop that fills my daily cup; Thy hand
Prescribes for ills none else can understand.
All, all is known to Thee.

And this continued feebleness, this state
Which seems to unnerve and incapacitate,
Will work the cure my hopes and prayers await,
That can I leave to Thee.

And welcome—precious can His Spirit make
My little drop of suffering—for His sake.
Father, the cup I drink, the path I take,
All, all is known to Thee.

Christian Sins.

In one sense—and that a very important sense—there cannot be a Christian sin. Sin is most thoroughly anti-Christian. It is against the example and against the command of Christ. It contradicts the fundamental idea of discipleship, and one of the mottoes which, according to Paul, is on the seal of God: "Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity." It sets at naught the whole conception of the mission of Christ to this world; for John says: "He that committeth sin is of the devil. . . . For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil. Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin." The two words, then, which one might last think of connecting, would be Christian and sin. The Bible definition of a Christian would seem to be, one who does not sin. And the least that this can mean must be, one who does not practice it, one who hates it in himself and in others, one who repents of it, one who gains the victory over it by the grace of Christ. Hence the phrase Christian sin is much like that of light darkness, or bitter sweetness.

And yet we may descriptively or historically allude to the sins which are seen in professed and in real Christians as Christian sins. And the expression gains in appropriateness when allusion is had to forms of sin which particularly taught professors of religion, which take them on their weak side. It is a noticeable fact, that sinful tendencies are like running water, which, stopped from flowing in one direction turns in another, and finds an outlet somewhere; dam it up at one level, and it rises till it pours over at a higher level. We see this in cases of outward moralities and proprieties. There are men who need to drink to excess, or who depended more or less on the excitement of alcohol to carry them through their labors of the body and mind. They have ceased from that habit, but they satisfy the craving of their nervous system in another way; they use a large amount of tobacco. Indeed, there are a multitude of temperance men who have never been addicted to strong drink, and who from principle will not touch a drop of anything which intoxicates, but who are notorious chewers and smokers. They find in tobacco a substitute for alcohol; the artificial stimulus which others gain from the latter they derive from the former. In their case, one might say that tobacco using was a temperance sin. They do not like to drink, and so they smoke; it answers the same purpose as to nervous excitement, and as to sociability with men, whom they meet. So also physicians (and boarding house keepers) testify that many total abstinence advocates make up in eating for what they lose by not drinking. They avoid drunkenness, to fall into gluttony! They do not die of delirium tremens, but of dyspepsia! A temperance sin again! It sounds contradictory, but is quite real.

And so, in more spiritual matters, the Christian, in avoiding certain gross sins which characterize the wicked, is in danger of slipping into others which he is tempted to think venial, though they are quite as inconsistent with the spirit of the Gospel, and are even condemned by name in the New Testament. Thus, a professed Christian who would shrink from vice, and who conscientiously avoids what he has been taught to consider worldly forms of pleasure, will indulge in covetousness, or an inordinate and selfish love of money, without scruple. He shows no spirit of consecration in the matter of property. A benevolent use of wealth, as of an instrumentality placed in his hands for the good of the world and future advancement of the cause of Christ, is an idea quite foreign to his mind. He no more lives under its influence than does the man who is in the next store or office, and who makes no profession of religion. He gives a trifle, the tithe of a tithe (or less), of his income, and dies, leaving behind an estate which astonishes his Christian friends and makes his pastor fear for the account which he will have to render of his stewardship. Yet there is the plain inculcation of liberality in the Bible, and the equally plain denunciation of covetousness as idolatry. One might say that covetousness was the sin which the man, deemed it safe for him, as a Christian, to commit, though theft, or drunkenness, or adultery would damn him! We fear the conclusion is not safe.

And so a lady who, as a church member, thinks she must not attend the theatre, or go to balls, or even dance in the parlor, to say nothing of doing criminal acts, sometimes falls into habits of temper which make an entire household unhappy, or into a carping, or backbiting, or slanderous use of the tongue, in the way of gossip, which works incalculable mischief in the community. The evil of the sins which she avoids, and in which some irreligious ladies indulge, she clearly sees and often reprobates; the deformity of the sins in which she allows herself she scarcely suspects, and is ever ready to palliate. But the world perceives her inconsistency, and is ready to say that her talking is quite as unchristian as other people's dancing and theatre going.

It is desirable that no form of selfishness shall be thought to be compatible with Christian character. Let us settle it that love is the essence of religion. And love is a very positive thing, intent on doing all the good it can, and on preventing all the evil. It provides no place for any sin, but rather says with Paul, "Reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God, through Jesus Christ our Lord."—Chicago Advance.

Our Resurrection.

A little girl died. The sister, five years old, was exceedingly unhappy, and would go to the grave and weep there. She said to her mother:

"Mamma, I am so unhappy; sister is gone. Shall I ever see her again?"

"Yes, my child, she will rise from the grave, and you will see her again, by-and-by."

"It can't be so," the little girl answered.

Her mother opened her hand. In it was a little seed. She said, "Now, my dear, take that little seed and go out and put it in the ground, and go every day and see what happens."

The child sowed the seed, and every day went to look, but for awhile there was nothing to be seen. At length, one morning, after a rainy night, she went to the place and saw the tips of two little leaves just coming out of the ground. The little girl saw it and said, "That is just like sister. She has been sown in the ground, and she will come up again like these two leaves." She kept the leaves to remind her of her sister's resurrection, and they comforted her, and led her to be a Christian.

Would to God, my dear brother, more had the faith of the little girl, and placed their faith just where God has put it, not when we die, but when Christ, who is our life, shall appear; how much of the glory of Christ is taken away by substituting death for the glorious appearance of the Son of God, whose manifestation the groaning creation waits for, that it may receive the promised deliverance. I heartily rejoice in the declared truths, "Because I live ye shall live always;" "I am the resurrection and the life;" "I give unto my sheep eternal life, and they shall never perish;" "I will raise him up at the last day," and many other blessed promises, which to the way-worn and tempest-tossed pilgrim act as true beacon-lights, lighting up the world to come with a solid radiance ending in glory, honor, and immortality.

Paul, on a certain occasion said, "Thou art inexcusable, oh, man." And it seems to me the same may be said to those who read the blessed Bible, and heed not its clear language on the subject of the resurrection, taking and appropriating for doctrine the teachings of uninspired man in seeming preference.

Only think of it! Not one solitary text within the lids of the Bible that affirms, or even hints at, the immortality of a part of man called soul, or spirit, or mind; but from beginning to end does in the most emphatic manner affirm the mortality of the entire man; and the resurrection from the dead the only possible chance of his living again. Job did propound an important inquiry, "If a man die, shall he live again?" and with the light he then had, he answers his own question. "All the days of my appointed time will I wait till my change come; thou shalt call, and I will answer thee."

Oh what a solemn call will that be when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live; yes, live, not for a day or any number of days, but raised with the power of endless life, like him who raises them, they live forever and ever. They are made conquerors through him that loved them, and gave himself for them.

Would to God, I repeat, that men would cease from man, and learn to put their whole trust in Him who hath given to the Son to have life in himself, with all power to give the same, to as many as the Father gave, or shall give him; and instead of looking to death as the deliverer, they would look to Christ as the Great Emancipator of all who are his, by resurrection from the dead. Thank God for the soul-cheering words of Paul, "We shall not all sleep;" "The dead in Christ shall rise first;" "We shall not prevent (anticipate, go before) them which are asleep." The gathering of the sheaves it is hoped, is near at hand. The breaking of every yoke, and the letting of all oppressed go free, is nearer than when we first believed. Who is there that can idly and dumbly sit and feel no concern in the coming of our Lord Christ with all his saints? Who is there, who are undesirous of seeing the revealed majesty of the new creation? Who is there that cannot feel the heart throb with the joy of anticipation in view of the coming of "the holy one?" To me it's a veritable reality! "He that shall come, will come, and will not tarry." In Pauls' day it was "a little while," surely in our days it is emphatically less time than then. "Now" as then, "the just shall live by faith," and the soul that draws back, surely never knew what it was to have that "full assurance of faith" which alone can enable the believer to hope to the end for the grace to be brought to us at the revelation of Jesus Christ, whom not having seen, we love; and surely, if we love Him, we will not only keep his commandments, but with the lovely John cry with the prayer of the importunate, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

I am sure we can better settle this question, now agitating many minds,—whether man is mortal or immortal, by an appeal to the word of the Lord, allowing God to be true, and every man a liar; if once the Bible has—does—sanction the current view, viz.: The inherent immortality of the soul, then spiritualism may be true, and the entire outgrowth of this latter day system of fraud and deceit. May all truth lovers find the pearl of great price, and find life from the dead through Jesus Christ our Lord. G. W. YOUNG.

Wm. Tyndale on the Resurrection.

A declaration made by Wm. Tyndale touching the resurrection of the bodies and the state of the soul after this life, abstracted out of a preface of his that he made to the New Testament, which he translated and set forth in the year 1534. He says: "Concerning the resurrection, I declare before the world, God and our Savior Jesus Christ, and universal congregation that believeth on Him. That I believe according to the open and manifest Scriptures and Catholic faith, that Christ is risen again in the flesh which He received of his mother, the blessed Virgin Mary and body wherein He died, and that we shall all, both good and bad, rise flesh and body, and appear together before the judgment seat of Christ to receive every man according to his deeds. And that the bodies of all that believe, and continue in the true faith of Christ, shall be endued with like immortality and glory as is the body of Christ. And I declare before the world, God and our Savior Christ, and all that believe in Him, that I hold of the souls that are departed as may be proved by manifest and open Scripture, and think the souls departed in the faith of Christ and love of the law of God to be in no worse case than the soul of Christ was from the time that He delivered his spirit into the hands of his Father, until the resurrection of his body in glory and immortality."

Nevertheless, I confess openly that I cannot be persuaded that they be all rewy in the full glory that Christ is in; or the elect angels of God are in. Neither is it any article of my faith, for, if it was, I see not; but then the preaching of the resurrection of the flesh were a thing in vain. Notwithstanding, yet, I am ready to believe it if it may be proved with open Scripture.

Prof. Paine on Immersion.

The recent examination at the Congregational Theological Seminary in Bangor, Me., took a new departure in ecclesiastical history, as the following questions and answers give full proof:

"What was the apostolic and primitive mode of baptism?" "By immersion." "Under what circumstances only was sprinkling allowed?" "In cases of sickness." "When was the practice of sprinkling or pouring generally introduced?" "Not until the fourteenth century." For what reason was the change adopted?" "As Christianity advanced and spread in colder latitudes the severity of the climate made it impracticable to immerse."

Such an examination very naturally called forth some criticism in the denominational papers as well as in private circles. The Vermont "Chronicle" expressed its surprise, though without attempting to controvert the doctrine taught. This criticism called out Prof. Paine in defense of his teachings, in which he frankly says:

"But why 'surprised?' Either because the answers are not true, or because, if true, they are allowed to go for truth in a Congregational seminary. Now it happens that they are true, and we cannot yet believe, even with the exclamation point before our eyes, that the "Chronicle" doubts it. But what then shall be said of the other horn of the dilemma? We do not know how the Congregationalists of Vermont would run a theological seminary, but we can assure the "Chronicle" that we in Maine are not afraid of historical truth."

Professor Paine goes on to say:

"It may be honestly asked by some, was immersion the primitive form of baptism, and, if so, what then? As to the question of fact, the testimony is ample and decisive. No matter of Church history is clearer. The evidence is all one way; and all church historians of any repute agree in accepting it. We cannot claim even originality in teaching it in a Congregational Seminary. And we really feel guilty of a kind of anachronism in writing an article to insist upon it. It is a point on which ancient, mediæval, and modern historians alike, Catholic and Protestant, Lutheran and Calvinist, have no controversy. And the simple reason for this unanimity is that the statements of the early Fathers are so clear, and the light shed upon these statements from the early customs of the church is so conclusive, that no historian who cares for his reputation would dare to deny it, and no historian who is worthy of that name would wish to. There are some historical questions concerning the early church on which the most learned writers disagree, for example, the question of infant baptism, but on this one of the early practice of immersion the most distinguished antiquarians, hold a common language. The following extract from Coleman's antiquities, very accurately expresses what all agree to.

"'In the primitive church, immersion was undeniably the common mode of baptism. The utmost that can be said of sprinkling in that early period is that it was, in case of necessity, permitted as an exception to the general rule. This fact is so well established that it were needless to adduce authorities in proof of it.' As one further illustration we quote from Shaff's 'Apostolic Church;' 'As to the outward mode of administering this ordinance, immersion, and not sprinkling, was unquestionably the original, normal form.' But while immersion was the universal custom, an abridgment of the rite was freely allowed and defended in cases of urgent necessity, such as sickness and approaching death, and the peculiar form of sprinkling thus came to be known as 'clinical' baptism, or baptism of the sick. It is somewhat significant that no controversy of any account ever arose in the church on this question or the form of baptism, down to the Reformation. And hence it is difficult to determine with complete accuracy just when immersion gave way to sprinkling as the common church practice. The two forms were employed, one as the rule, the other as the exception, until as Christianity traveled northward into a colder climate, the exception silently grew to be the rule.

"As late as the thirteenth century immersion still held its ground, as is shown by a passage in the Summa Theologica of St. Thomas Aquinas, where the arguments in favor of the two modes of baptism are compared, and the conclusion is drawn that immersion is the safer because the more common form (quia hoc habet communior usus). Three centuries later, in the time of the reformers, sprinkling had become common, and even quite universal; though Calvin speaks of the different forms of baptism in a way which seems to imply that immersion was by no means obsolete. So that Dr. Shaff puts the date quite early enough, we think, when he says that 'not until the end of the thirteenth century did sprinkling become the rule and immersion the exception.' It is to be remarked also that this change occurred only in the Western or Latin church. In the Greek church immersion has remained the rule to the present day."

Extract from the Misunderstood Prayer.

It is melancholy to reflect on the amount of error that has been promulgated thus in the name of Jesus and his illustrious prophets and apostles. The holy oracles have been made more enigmatical than those of ancient Greece. The true sayings of God have been reduced to inexplicable riddles by the perverse ingenuity of professed expositors. The verities of heaven have been removed from the statute roll to make room for the whims of a reinless imagination. The plainest book in human language has been turned into a mountain of mystery by the capricious annotations of scholastic theorists. The light of heaven has been compelled to reach us through the colored media of theological artists instead of falling upon our understandings in its own native brilliancy. Hence we have been perplexed and bewildered, instead of walking erect with cheerfulness in our eye, and a song upon our lips. The food of heaven, which should sustain us, and the water of life, which was intended to refresh us in our journey, have been presented us in vessels of such construction, that we cannot get enough, and are consequently compelled to cry out, Alas! our leanness, our leanness! The sun of light has been shorn of his beams, and we plod along with miserable lantern in our hands, which any passing breeze may extinguish. In proportion to our convictions of the necessity of faith, is the depth of our perplexity what to believe. The dim old formula, "Thus saith the Lord," with its positive certainty and Divine grandeur, has been exchanged for the shrill cry of "Thus saith the sect," with its palpable uncertainties and human littleness.

The sure word of prophecy was sent down from heaven with the sacred injunction, "Take heed to it;" but instead of walking in its serene light, the multitude are either climbing the mountains of vain speculation, or exhuming the dust of the fathers in the search for ecclesiastic relics.

And when an earnest man here and there throws himself in the breach, and cries to the wanderers to reassemble around the Son of David, and to take the Lord of life at his word in unquestioning faith and childlike simplicity leaving it to him to conquer all difficulties, and to realize his own magnificent purposes in his own perfectly wise manner, men stare, and say with the sons of Jacob, "Behold this dreamer cometh."

Let who has resolved at all risks that his faith shall not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God, will act wisely to lay his account with side glances, instead of the direct look of open confidence which greeted him on the day when he walked with the multitude. If he says that all seats are too narrow to hold him, and that the Bible alone is the platform of his theology, he may expect for awhile to work single-handed; but let him take courage, for the cause is that of God and humanity, of truth and eternity, and though he fall in the struggle, he shall not have struggled in vain.

The rectification of one error is a great thing; the redemption of one forgotten truth from beneath the pile of human tradition is greater still; and the successful appeal to men to rally around Christ the Savior-king, is the greatest of all.

May this loftiest of honors wreath the brow of every man who is holding out the Bible to poor wandering humanity, and crying, "Lo! it is the proclamation of God that he intends setting up a glorious kingdom upon this long-distracted and bleeding planet.—Wm. Leask, D. D.

Bogus Confession.

The ministers tell us the way of salvation is very easy; and we have only to confess our sins, and Christ is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. The truth is, however, that nothing is so hard as to confess sin. A real, genuine confession is about the rarest utterance one ever hears. We know some excellent people who never in their lives, never, at all events, since their maturity, have gone frankly to the public, the church, or their own most intimate friend, and said: "I was wrong; I am sorry; forgive me." As a matter of curiosity, we wish the reader would stop right here, and see if he can recall one instance in which he has done this.

There is plenty of bogus confession; but of real, honest confession, very little.

There is the confession commendatory. "I tell you," says Mr. A., "I have got an awful temper. It flames up mighty quick; don't last long; but its hot while it burns. There is considerable lion in me, and I suppose there always will be. I often say things I am sorry for afterwards. But I cannot help it. It's in me, and it's got to come out." He thinks he has made a confession. Not at all. He has been patting himself on his back, and pluming himself on his sin. The peacock is not prouder of his tail than this man of his pet passion.

There is the confession general. The man catches up the general confessions of public prayer, and repeats it over and over in prayer meeting, in family prayers, and at his own bedside: "I have done the things I ought not to have done, and I have left undone the things I ought to have done, and there is no health in me." Now, the confession of a congregation must be in general terms, but the confession of an individual to his own conscience and his God ought to be particular. If Harry were to come to me Monday night with, "I have done the things I ought not to have done, have left undone the things I ought to have done, and there is no health in me,—good night, Father," and again on on Tuesday night with the same, and on Wednesday night I should stop him and say, "Hold here a minute; tell me what are some of the things you have done you ought not to have done, some of the things you have left undone you ought to have done." I should ask him, in the language of the lawyers, to give me a bill of particulars. Confession in mere general terms of general sinfulness is no confession at all.

It is very easy to brag of our sins, or to roll off by rote formal confession of sins, or to incorporate in our creed a general recognition of the sinfulness of mankind. But these are all bogus confessions.

To go to God and say, "In that business transaction I was mean; in that one I lied; in that word to my wife I was cruel and barbarous, and might better have struck her a cruel blow with my hand than with my tongue; in that punishment of my child I was tyrannical and unjust; I have been selfish, proud, vain, false, mean"—that may be a simple matter, but it is just the hardest thing any man is ever called on to do. No penance imposed by pope or priest, no pilgrimage by Mohammedan devotee, but would be easier to average humanity. And it is only this sort of confession that means anything.

The Old Scotchwoman's Faith.

An English paper brings this anecdote:

By the side of a rippling brook in one of the secluded glens of Scotland, there stands a low, mud-thatched cottage, with its neat honey-suckled porch facing the south. Beneath its humble roof, on a snow white bed, lay, not long ago, old Nancy, the Scotchwoman, patiently awaiting the moment when she should fall asleep in Jesus; experiencing, with holy Paul, "We know that if our early house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." By her bedside, on a small table, lay her spectacles, and her well-thumbed Bible—her "barrel meal and her cruse," as she used to call it—from which she daily, yea, hourly, spiritually fed on the "Bread of Life." A young minister frequently called to see her. He loved to listen to her simple expression of Bible truths; for when she spoke of her "inheritance, incorruptible, undefiled, and that faileth not away," it seemed but a little way off, and the listner almost fancied he heard the redeemed saying, "Unto him, that loved us, and washed us from our sins in His own blood."

One day the young minister put to the happy saint the following startling question: "Now Nannie," said he, "what if, after all your prayers, and watching and waiting, God should suffer your soul to be eternally lost?" Pious Nannie raised herself on her elbow, and turning to him a wistful look, laid her right hand on that "precious Bible," which laid open before her, and quietly replied, "Ae, dearie me! Is that a' the length ye has got yet, mon?" and then continued, her eyes sparkling with almost heavenly brightness, "God would hae the greatest loss. Poor Nannie would but lose her soule, and that would be a great loss indeed, but God would loss his honor and his character. Haven't I hung my soul upon His 'exceeding great and precious promises?' and if He break His word, He would make Himself a liar, and a' the universe would rush into confusion!"

By faith the old Scotchwoman had cast her soul's salvation upon God's promise in Christ by the gospel. In every sorrow she had found him a "very present help in trouble;" and now, about to leave the weary wilderness for her everlasting home, could she think that he would prove unfaithful to his word? No. Sooner than poor old Nannie's soul would be lost, God's honor, God's character, God himself must be overturned, and "a' the universe would rush into confusion!" Dear old pilgrim!

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Observations.—The Editor must not be understood as endorsing all the sentiments expressed by correspondents whose articles are inserted under this head. Each writer is alone responsible for the article bearing his own signature. If the teaching of any writer is not endorsed, an article setting forth the views of the party differing may be forwarded. Free discussion of Bible doctrine on all sides will be allowed, but the Editor reserves the privilege of criticising these communications which antagonize a belief and obedience of the Gospel as a means of salvation, or which undermine its principles.

Perverted Science and the Second Advent.

[The Rainbow.]

"There shall come in the last days scoffers, saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation." 2 Peter iii. 3, 4.

In modern times there has arisen a school of thought which turns the reasoning of the scoffer into an axiom of pretended science, and makes the constancy of the laws of nature its plea for setting aside the great hope of the Christian church, and denying the solemn certainties of the second coming of Christ, the resurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment.

The creed of the scoffer implies that the laws of nature exist of themselves, without the fact of a supreme Lawgiver, and that all things continue and must continue as they have been from the creation, because there is no power capable of suspending or reversing the firm and settled course of things. Ungodly science will clothe its icy creed with the icy flowers of fancy, and speak elegantly of a power which

"Warms in the sun; refreshes in the breeze;
Glows in the stars, and blossoms in the trees;
Lives through all life, extends through all extent;
Spreads undivided; operates unspent."

But belief in a living God is rejected. Now, it is plain that the scientific theory, that the course of nature admits of no disturbance, is fatal to the reception of those great doctrines which Scripture prophecy proclaims. ..... The maxims of pretended science, and the lively hope of the Lord's coming, cannot dwell together in the same heart.

But since perverted science will dare to set itself up against the revealed warnings of Jehovah, the apostle ventures boldly into her domain, wrests her own weapons from her puny grasp, and turns them into arrows to pierce the conscience, and alarm the stout-hearted sinner into repentance and godly fear. The heavens and the earth which now are, are stored with fire, he tells us, against a day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men. The agencies do not require to be created which the Almighty will employ, to clear the earth from the dominion of evil, and introduce the promised kingdom of righteousness and peace. From Adam to Noah the waters were already in existence by which the flood was brought on the world of the ungodly, and when once the signal was given, and the windows of heaven were opened, and the fountains of the great deep broken up, they came forth spontaneously to do the bidding of him who had treasured them against the time of the judgment.

And so also, from Noah until now, the heavens and the earth are already stored with treasures of fire, which are ready to execute the threatenings, and to fulfill the counsel of the Almighty.

"What is creation else
But a capacious reservoir of means,
Wrought by his will, and ready for his use?"

What is the secret of the two main discoveries which have stamped their character on the present age of advanced science and eager enterprise? LATENT HEAT AND LATENT ELECTRICITY.

But these watchwords of science, the talisman of her power, by which she has wrought wonders, suggest a deeper meaning to thoughtful ears. All creation, yes, every drop of water, as science in her triumphs is compelled to bear witness, is stored with treasures of secret fire, and one of her latest confessions, after full research, is that this hidden electricity of each single drop of rain is equal to the production of a violent thunderstorm.

All creation, then, down to each dew drop and blade of grass, is stored with the hidden fire of electricity; and it needs but one touch from the finger of the Almighty, one secret, imperceptible change of its laws, or even, perhaps, without a change of law, some unforeseen and foreappointed accumulation of its hidden powers, to produce a tempest of fire that would consume the whole human race, and completely change all the physical features of the planet on which we live. It is a childish science which treats such a catastrophe as impossible and incredible. It is a proud and stouthearted folly, which, having merely wetted its feet in the spray of the great ocean of natural laws, pretends to have sounded their unfathomable depths, and dares, in the confidence of its own foresight, to reject the solemn warnings of a judgment to come.

But perhaps some may urge that the long period which has elapsed since these warnings were given, and given as of an event near at hand, may well abate our confidence in their truth, and justify the doubting inquiry—"Where is the promise of his coming?" Have not sixty generations passed away with no trace of the Messiah's return, though the first generation of believers were taught to expect it in their own lifetime? Here, too, the apostle supplies us with an answer. The length of the delay confirms, instead of weakening, the certainty of the judgment.

This is the time of God's long suffering. And just as, in the history of Joseph, seven years of plenty were purposely given, because the famine that would follow would be intense and severe, so also it is a part of the wisdom of God that a judgment, solemn beyond all example, should be introduced by the richest, fullest, and most enduring display of grace and forbearance towards sinners. This is the true secret of generations of the calm constancy of the laws of nature, and the silent course of sixty generations of mankind since the Son of God returned to the bosom of the Father from which he came.

This long-suffering of God is our salvation. It is by this long delay that his elect are gathered in, and the message of his gospel is sent to the utmost bounds of the human family. But the time will come when the voice will go forth from the throne in heaven, saying, "It is done," and the mysterious delays of grace be followed by the hour of open judgment.—Revelations xvi.

We have many signs around us which may well lead us to the conclusion that this judgment, so long delayed, is near at hand. The Gospel is once more being preached in all the world, for a witness to all nations. The fig tree begins to blossom, in the new awakening among the Jewish people, and the numerous converts who have been gathered from among them into the fold of Christ.—Matthew xxiv. 14, 32, 33.

The moral conflict which has been carried on for ages, first between Christianity and heathen idolatry, Popery and Mohammedanism—enemies without and secret corruption within—is passing over into the East again. And if the evil passions of mankind become again unchained after a long peace, by the sounds of war, who can tell what bitter fruits of a rejected gospel may reveal themselves in these last days of Gentile dominion? In our own favored nation we hear almost daily the sorrowful report of hateful crimes that should make us blush with shame, and tremble with fear, lest Sodom itself should rise against us in judgment, to condemn our more aggravated abuse of mercy.

And if once the baleful infection of infidelity should spread more widely through all Christian lands, so that the Gospel be rejected with scorn by sensual profligates and covetous oppressors or philosophical unbelievers, and Christianity itself be regarded as a worn-out and worthless thing, a secret voice will then be addressed to the Son of holiness to his waiting people, "Come, my people, enter into thy chambers, and shut thy doors about thee; hide thyself for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast. For behold, the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the world for their iniquity; the earth also shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain.—Isaiah xxvi. 20, 21.

How solemn is this certainty of a judgment to come, when once we realize the true force of the Divine warning! The laws of nature, though sure and constant, are not so sure and unchangeable as that perfection of the Almighty Lord of providence which involves the moral necessity of a coming day of retribution. The stars in their silent course are measuring out, one by one, the appointed hours of merciful delay. The heavens and the earth which are now, are stored with treasures of fire, against the season when the Lord shall come out of his secret hiding place, and call to the heavens and to the earth, that he may judge his people.

Beyond it there is a vista of eternal bliss and glory to all the children of God, and ages of recovered beauty and holiness to our fallen world. But before that glory can dawn, there is a day of darkness and gloominess, a day of clouds and thick darkness, and strange and fearful judgment to the workers of iniquity. O how needful to be sheltered in that hour, and to have the blood of the true Passover sprinkled upon the lintels of our hearts, that the destroying angel may pass by. Prophets, long ago, have trembled in themselves, that they might find rest in the day of trouble.

But an ark of mercy is now open before us. In Christ there is safety and full deliverance. Whosoever believeth in him shall not be confounded. Whoever builds on this foundation is securely sheltered and safe for eternity. The rain may descend, the winds may blow, the floods may rise and beat on that house, but it cannot fall, for it is founded on a rock.

May we build on this Rock of Ages, instead of relying on the vain, delusive promises of science, falsely so-called, the presumptuous ignorance of the scorner, which sets itself in array against the truth of God, and tells us that all things must continue as they were from the beginning of the creation. May we listen for the approach of the true King and Judge, and catch the distant sound of his returning chariot wheels.

Amidst wars and rumors of wars, and the fermenting changes of a sinful world that is never at rest, but wearies itself for very vanity, may we catch the dawning beams of the day-spring that will soon visit the earth once more, and when these things begin to come to pass, "look up and lift up our heads, because our redemption is drawing nigh."—Prof. Birks, Trin. Col. Cambridge.

Eminent Testimonies In Behalf of the Bible.

I have examined all, as well as my narrow sphere, my straitened means and my busy life would allow me; and the result is, that the Bible is the best book in the world.—Hon. John Adams, second President of the United States.

The first and almost the only book deserving universal attention, is the Bible. For pathos of narrative; for the selection of incidents that go directly to the heart; for the picturesque of character and manner; for copiousness, grandeur, and sublimity of imagery; for unanswerable cogency and closeness of reasoning; and for irresistible force of persuasion, no book in the world deserves to be so unceasingly studied and so profoundly meditated upon, as the Bible.—Hon. John Quincy Adams.

The pure and noble, the graceful and dignified simplicity of language, is nowhere in such perfection as in the Scriptures and Homer. The whole book of Job, with regard to simplicity of thought and morality, exceeds, beyond all comparison, the most noble parts of Homer.—Alexander Pope, the Poet.

The most learned, acute, and diligent student cannot, in the longest life, obtain a knowledge of this one volume. The more deeply he works the mine, the richer and more abundant he finds the ore. New light continually beams from this source of heavenly knowledge to direct the conduct, and illustrate the works of God and the ways of men.—Sir Walter Scott.

I have regularly and attentively read the Holy Scriptures, and am of the opinion that this volume, independently of its divine origin, contains more true sublimity, more exquisite beauty, more pure morality, more important history, and finer strains both of poetry and eloquence, than could be collected from all other books.—Sir Wm. Jones, the Linguist.

The most wonderful volume in existence is, beyond a doubt, the Bible. It is wonderful for its daring chronology, its positive history, its prophetic declarations. It is wonderful on account of its sublime philosophy, its magnificent figures, its overwhelming language of description.—Prof. O. M. Mitchell, the Astronomer.

Let others dread and shun the Scriptures for their darkness; I shall wish I may deserve to be reckoned among those who admire and dwell upon them for their clearness. There are no songs comparable to the songs of Zion, no orations equal to those of prophets, and no politics like those which the Scriptures teach.—John Milton, Poet and Statesman.

That the Holy Scriptures are one of the greatest blessings which God bestows upon the sons of men, is generally acknowledged by all who know anything of the value and worth of them.—John Locke, the Philosopher.

I have read it (the Bible) through many times. I now make a practice of going through it once a year. It is the book of all others for lawyers as well as divines; and I pity the man who can not find in it a rich supply of thought, and rules for conduct.—Daniel Webster.

I have always said, and always will say, that the studious perusal of the Sacred Volume, will make better citizens, better fathers, and better husbands.—Thomas Jefferson.

I find more sure marks of authenticity in the Bible than in any profane history whatever.—Sir Isaac Newton.

Let this precious volume have its proper influence on the hearts of men, and our liberties are safe, our country blessed, and the world happy. There is not a tie that unites us to our families, not a virtue that endears us to our country, nor a hope that thrills our bosoms in the prospect of future happiness, that has not its foundation in this Bible. It is the charter of charters, the palladium of liberty, the standard of righteousness.—Hon. Jos. C. Hornblower, late Chief Justice of New Jersey.

Characteristics of the Kingdom of God.

"For the kingdom of God is not meat and drink; but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." Rom. xiv. 17.

This text is often quoted to prove that the kingdom of God is already set up and is purely spiritual in its nature, and that those do greatly err who look for it as a visible kingdom yet to come, and to be established on the regenerated earth in connection with the second coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Those who thus quote it fail, however, to observe that if "righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Ghost" do of themselves constitute the kingdom of God, then that kingdom instead of being "set up" at the first advent of Christ was set up nearly six thousand years ago, and has existed in our world from the days of "righteous Abel" (Matt. xxiii. 35) until now; and moreover that "righteousness, peace and joy," as present possession, have been the theme of patriarchs and prophets, as well as of apostles. See Job xxix. 14; Psa. xxiii. 2; Isa. xxiv. 3; lxi. 10

As these gracious elements have existed so long and been the portion, to a greater or lesser extent, of every child of God, when the God of heaven promises to set up a kingdom after four universal worldly kingdoms have been brought into existence (Dan. ii. and vii.), it is obvious that something else is intended than the introduction among men of "righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Ghost." There is no good reason to conclude that the fifth kingdom will be any less real than those which have preceded it, though it will be of an entirely different character.

Never lose sight of the fact that "the kingdom of God" is explicitly and repeatedly declared in the Scriptures to be the everlasting inheritance of the saints—the final home of the saved. Read Dan. vii. 17-18-27; Matt. xxv. 34; Luke xii. 32; xiii. 28-29; 1 Cor. vi 9-11; xv. 50-54; Eph. v. 5; James ii. 5; Pet. i. 10-11.

The metonomy is a common figure of speech both in the Bible and out of it. It is that figure by which the thing containing is put for what is contained in it, or where the proper name is used for a place, cause, effect, source or scene with which it is intimately connected: as when we say of a person "he has a clear head," meaning a clear mind, or "he sets a good table," referring to the food that is laid on it; and so in Scripture, eating "the vineyard" is put for eating its fruits (Isa. iii. 14); the name of a place stands for its inhabitants (Isa x. 29), a house for the family or descendants (Isa. ii. 3), and a cup for its contents. 1 Cor. xi. 26.

The kingdom of God, then, in the text before us is put by metonomy for the characteristics of the kingdom—the moral qualifications which every one must possess in order to enter the kingdom when it shall come. That qualification does not consist in a careful observance of the rules pertaining to "meat and drink" which existed under the law, but in "righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Ghost; for he that in these things serveth Christ is acceptable to God and approved of men." Dr. Gill thus expresses the idea: "The kingdom of glory—which is the kingdom of God because of his preparing, giving, calling to, and putting into the possession of—is attained unto by righteousness; not the righteousness of men, but the righteousness of Christ imputed by God and received by faith; and through peace made by the blood of Christ, and rejoicing in him, without having any confidence in the flesh, which is a branch of the Spirit's grace in regeneration.

An English writer a few years ago gave a forcible illustration of the passage, which we introduce here: "Some months ago the French empire was lying in tranquility. Her commercial relations with the other nations of the earth seemed nearly perfect. Her political situation wore a most serene aspect. No inward troubles convulsed her; she was free from complications with her neighbors. Not a war-cloud, or the vestige of one, darkened the sky of her national and imperial prosperity. All was peace and quiet; all was calm. Then the French emperor opened his mouth, and his significant words were, 'The empire is peace!' Wires flashed it hither and thither. Journalists iked the volatile announcement, and sent it in print to their subscribers. But did Napoleon III. mean by this that the real empire, the literal France, the soil of the Franks, had changed from its substantiality into the mere immaterial abstract quality of 'peace?' Did he mean that the soil had lost its solidity and had become a condition. No editor said so. No man thinks so now. All understood the emperor to mean that the element that ruled the national life was peace, and that France desired amicable and friendly feelings with all, in order to 'keep the peace.' So the apostle must be understood. He does not deny the real kingdom of God; but tells us its main characteristics and prominent principles. He does not reduce it to a kingdom of condition, but speaks in the text of the moral and social conditions of the kingdom.—Messiah's Herald.

Remarkable Shower of Ice.

At Potter station, on the Union Pacific Railroad, recently, a train was just pulling out from the station when a storm commenced, and in ten seconds there was such a fury of hail and wind that the engineer deemed it best to stop the locomotive. The hailstones were simply great chunks of ice, many of them three and four inches in diameter, and of all shapes—squares, cones, cubes, etc. The first stone that struck the train broke a window, and the flying glass severely injured a lady on the face, making a deep cut. Five minutes afterward there was not a whole light of glass on the south side of the train, the whole length of it. The windows in the Pullman cars from a hammer. During the continuance of this terrific fusillade, which lasted fully twenty minutes, the excitement and fear among the passengers ran very high. Several ladies fainted, and one lady, Mrs. Earle, wife of the superintendent of the Mountain division of the road, went into spasms, from which she did not recover for over an hour after the cessation of the storm. Several persons sitting on the south side of the cars were more or less injured about the head and face.

As soon as the storm abated a little, the matting in the cars was hung up in front of the windows, and the train moved ahead, the drifted hailstones proving an obstacle for some miles. At the next station, strips of tin were procured and fastened over the windows the entire length of the train. The cars have been run into shop for repairs, and the damage will amount it is estimated, to several thousand dollars.—Denver News.

Drones.

We cannot go back far enough with records of bee history to get the biography of the first "drone" that inflicted its laziness on the sweet industry of a stinging community. What amazement, what earnest protests, what buzzing indignation meetings, marked the first attempt to act the character of a drone in a bee-hive, who can tell? This much we know, that from the first droning act until now, some degenerate bee has been able to keep up the line of succession, and it will probably continue to the end.

If drones were confined to bee-hives, we would be content to let the matter rest with them, leaving them to sting their way through the difficulty as best they can; but they have gotten into the church, which is a much more serious matter. If the church is a community of believers organized for Christian work and culture, then there is no seat prepared in the original plan for the drone. Then the church has no place within that can be lawfully given up to the drone. Do you know what plan has been adopted by the bees? Throwing them out! If the church is a ship, the Christian is not a lazy passenger riding to glory on a paid ticket, but a sailor with work to do. The church is not a parlor to lounge in, but a vineyard to work out the Master's great plan for the coming harvest day. Paul says, "If a man will not work, neither shall he eat." As far as this applies to labor in the Lord's vineyard, we render it: "neither can he eat." If any will not work, he will have but poor appetite for spiritual food, and will go, groaning with dyspeptic pangs, from table to table, finding nothing to suit his taste. The rewards of glory are for those who labored to enter into the blessed rest, and whose "works follow them." The cry of Him whose pitying eye sweeps the wide harvest field of the world, is evermore: "Go, work!" To the weary, the faint, the despondent, He says: "Occupy till I come."

Ho! ye toilers on the sea of life, bend to your oars, for the Master is coming through the shadows to cheer your tired hearts. And see! there lies the beautiful shore that sweeps up to the green hills of the Eternal Beulah.

"Work, for the night is coming
Under the sunset skies;
While their bright tints are glowing,
Work, for the daylight flies.
Work, till the last beam fadeth,
Fadeth to shine no more;
Work, while the night is darkening,
When man's work is o'er."

Our daily bread, the sunshine, the rain, and indeed every good and perfect gift is from above, from the Father of lights with whom there is no variableness, neither shadow of turning. Some men even claiming to be led by the word of truth seem to show a spirit of utter indifference toward God and treat him merely as a law-giver. But the whole drift of divine teaching is to the effect that God is a Father, that He is in sympathy with his children, and that even the hairs of our head are all numbered. We must not think that God has gone …n journey and left the world to run itself. "All things are of God," says the apostle, his free spirit pervades the entire universe, and we are the creatures of his handiwork. With these assurances there must be on the part of man an earnest faith which ever lives on the blessed promises of Him who sustains us.

Out of his storehouse of God there is to be brought things new and old. The old things are the promises made, the new things are the promises fulfilled. The old is the basis of the new. After the old covenant there comes the new. We have the old way and "the new and living way," the "old man" and the "new man," and the "new name" in place of the old, the old Jerusalem and the new, the old heaven and the old earth, beyond which rises in eternal splendor the new heavens and the new earth. The old songs gave way to the new song which shall gladden the world: "We are made unto our God kings and priests, and shall reign upon the earth." When the old shall cease the new will come. Then, peace and victory.

The Truth of God.

It is indeed interesting to contemplate the various methods employed by the Divine Father, in communicating his word and purposes to man. We have only to examine the Mosaic, Prophetic and Christian Scriptures to learn how wonderfully this great truth has been exemplified.

God has spoken to man through all the senses. His truth has been seen in symbols; heard in songs, prayers and earnest pleadings; tasted in the bread and water of life; revealed in the fragrant incense upon the golden altar, and felt in all pure hearts by the indwelling spirit of love and faith.

The truth has been written on parchments, in books, and on stones. It has been spoken by men and angels, it has been proclaimed from the altar and the throne, from the valley and the mountains, from temples and from prisons. The sun, the moon, and the stars have been clothed as symbols of its glory and beauty. Clouds have borne it on their wings: rivers and seas have lifted up their voices in its praise. The children of the needy have talked of its goodness, and kings have won the sceptre by its power. It is written in blood upon the cross, and will shine victorious upon the crown.

Trust in God.

It is one of the most common sayings that "man is a dependent creature" and yet most men act as though they were independent of all outside power or influence. If we accept the Bible as a revelation from God, we must admit that we live, move and have our being in God; that He is not very far from "every one of us." Indeed, the whole tenor of divine teaching is to the effect that man not only owes his origin, but his continuance in life, to the will of our heavenly Father. It is then in the nature of things incumbent on man to look toward a higher power for aid. Even Jesus, a personage possessing more grace and living in closer relations to the Father than any other man, declares to us, "without thee I can do nothing." If our Lord and Master was so much dependent upon the Father, how can we become indifferent to that life of trust everywhere enforced by precept and example? "Trust in the Lord and do good," is the language of the Psalmist. And again: "Blessed are they who put their trust in Him." To suppose that God is indifferent toward his children, and that He will not shield them under his pavilion is to undeify Him and render worthless his Fatherhood. God can be trusted; his truthfulness, his goodness and love make him the object of our highest praise and trust. "I will not forsake thee" is as true to-day as when spoken to Israel. The ears of the Lord are open unto the prayers of the righteous, and He will attend unto their cry. "Ask and ye shall receive, knock and it shall be opened unto you, seek and ye shall find." "Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, how much more shall He clothe you, …e of little faith." "We trust in the … God."

A Question Answered.

Is the resurrection the new birth? If so, what class will experience this birth?

J.

The mere act of raising a man from the dead is not the new birth. If this were so, then Lazarus was born again when raised. The new birth implies a new life and a new nature. To be "born of spirit," and becoming spirit, are terms which carry along the idea of a change in the nature of that which is born. Those who are not in harmony with the incorruptible word, by which we are begotten, cannot expect a birth of spirit. "That which is born of flesh is flesh, and that which is born of spirit is spirit." Living saints are to be born of spirit without seeing death. They will be changed from the mortal, dying state, to the immortal, undying state. This will take place at the time of the resurrection. The word "birth" means "the act of coming into life," and when the immortal life is communicated to those now dead, and to the living, it will change them from flesh to spirit. This great event will take place when the holy dead come forth in the immortal life, or are raised incorruptible. The act of rising, alone, is not the birth, but the emergence into the incorruptible nature, which takes place "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye," will constitute spirit-borns. Christ was the "first-born from the dead," and all who are in him will also be born from the dead in an incorruptible spirit life. In order to be ready for this birth of spirit we must experience the spirit's begetting in this life by the Gospel of Christ.

Immanuel's Land.

What associations, historical and prophetical, are connected with Palestine. Scripture testimony is not wanting to prove that Eden in its wider acceptation occupied the identical territory since known as the land of promise covenanted to Abraham and his royal heir. In Ezek. xxviii. 16, the King of Tyrus is said to have been in Eden the garden of God. In chap. xxxi. 9, the same is said of the Assyrian monarch. Eden was a large province of most beautiful country, the holy land of creation, of which Paradise, the garden abode of our first parents, was the hallowed, or most holy place, for the manifestation of the divine presence. Paradise was really a temple place of lovely trees, and flowery beauties, where unfallen man might have direct intercourse with the great Creator. Within this narrower inclosure the Shekinal presence of the God of heaven and earth revealed itself to Adam and Eve, the sinless worshippers who needed to bring no sacrifice but the tribute of grateful hearts. When man had fallen, and was expelled from the sacred bowers of this garden temple, the Shekinal presence was not withdrawn. Cain and Able erected their altars in the outer sanctuary of the Edenic holy places and received oracular responses from the Divinity inhabiting the interdicted Most Holy inclosure guarded by cherubim and flaming sword.

So in reality "the groves were God's first temples." Thus this land was constituted the grand center of the world's worship at the very beginning. Since the flood the Nature-Temple no longer exists; but the land remains a divinely marked locality. To this land Abraham was directed to remove from distant Mesopotamia, and, with Isaac and Jacob his immediate descendants, worship therein. On this consecrated soil that solemn covenant, that was ratified by the contracting parties, passing between the severed halves of the sacrificial victims,—Abraham in person, and the Shekinal presence in the similitude of a burning lamp,—was made, whose stipulations, in their unfoldings, embrace the whole economy of human redemption as including Israel and all the nations of the earth.

In this land Melchisedec the Priest King worshiped, after whose official dignities in their typical order, the Messiah is to reign a priest upon his throne, and bear the glory of an unchangeable priesthood during the endless succession of ages. In this grand center of religion, and land of the altar, devotion was put to its severest test in requiring the Father of the faithful to place his only son, the heir of promise, upon the sacrificial wood, ready to be drenched with his blood, and then consumed to ashes with the loved victim: and only when the unwavering fidelity of the friend of God was demonstrated, was a less worthy victim substituted by the divine direction and providence. Here Isaac held communication with the Lord, who renewed with him the covenant made with his father, and here he built his altar and called upon the name of Jehovah. Here Jacob in mystic night visions learned that from this land, as its earth termination, the pathway, traveled by celestial visitants, led to the gate of heaven. To this consecrated territory were the descendants of these honored patriarchs conducted by divinely appointed leaders from their Egyptian bondage and sojournings.

To these consecrated regions the tabernacle of witness, made after the heavenly pattern, was brought, and a moving tent became the abode of the presence of the Most High during the times of the judges and while Saul and David reigned over God's chosen nation. Finally, on the most sacred spot of sanctuary ground, Solomon built him a house, that temple, which, for magnificence of conception, richness and costliness of material, and beauty of design and finish, was the wonder of the world in its times, and, though destroyed, has, from its descriptions, remained the admiration of all succeeding ages. In its most select and hallowed court, on the mercy-seat, between the cherubim, was enthroned the only manifestation of Israel's God. To this land, his own inheritance, Christ came. Here he lived, taught, suffered and died. From one of its sacred mountains he ascended into heaven. As Immanuel's land extends from the sea to the great river Euphrates, and includes the land of the south, it embraces the entire district in which the divinely appointed altar-worship has been observed. In its southern districts Job erected his altar. No divinely authorized sacrifices were elsewhere offered.

It was the land where God made his revelations to mankind. The holy prophets received their communications from heaven only in this land and its border districts. No door to heaven has opened over any other place on earth. God talked with our first parents in the holy garden. To Jacob he showed the stair-way to the heavenly gate ascending from the earthly Bethel to the Father's house of many mansions. To communicate his laws to Moses, and, through him, to Israel, the Lord descended to Sinai, an out-post mountain of the holy land. To Isaiah he revealed himself on his heavenly throne through the opening heavens over the land of promise, and from these portals of the sky the captive prophet Ezekiel, on the out-skirts of the old Edenic land, saw the wonderful visions of that chariot of the Almighty that traveled on clouds of fiery hue through a firmament of terrible crystal.

To the beloved John, in a later age, the door into heaven was opened, and the throne, seen by Isaiah and Ezekiel, revealed itself to the Seer banished to Patmos, an out-post isle in the great sea on the west. From the heavens above this land Messiah will descend in power and great glory to earth, and bring about the promised restitution of all things. Then the abominations of desolation that have defiled the sanctuary dwelling-places of the Most High shall be swept off with the besom of wrath, and the holy places shall be cleansed, and the place of the Lord's sanctuary shall once more be beautified. The Heavenly Jerusalem shall finally be located in this land. The nations shall go up from year to year, in millennial times, to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, and, finally, when the New Jerusalem shall be located on ancient Eden's sacred soil, in Immanuel's land, the nations of the saved shall walk in its light, and bring their glory and honor into it. This land of worship, of the altar, of prophecy,—of the tabernacle, temples, and the holy books, shall ever more become the land of sacred dwellings. God's most holy temple will once more lift its glittering spires heavenward from these holy grounds.

Apostate Rome claims to be the center of worship, but, during this Gentile Interregnum, the only manifestation from heaven is a spiritual one, in living believers of the truth. Where two or more meet in his name, who believe and obey his requirements, the divine Jesus has promised his presence. The Son of Man walked among the golden candlesticks in holy vision. Those candlesticks were separate churches in Asia, that never knew anything about Rome, or her usurped supremacy. These churches are, to some certain extent, representative. The churches of the entire dispensation are addressed through these revelations. "I, Jesus, have sent mine angel to testify to you these things in the churches." Rev. xxii. 16.

These Revelations concern the church general, composed of golden candlesticks set out in the darkness of this world. They hold forth the word of life. The light of God's word shines forth from every true church. But although the gates of glory have been closed from the times of the Seer of Patmos, they will ere long open over Immanuel's land. The church of God will be gathered to Zion, and the city of the Living God. Immanuel will be with them in person, the Great High Priest of the heavenly worship. His people shall share his priestly honors. The center of worship will once more be in Immanuel's land—in Paradise restored.

The Miscellaneous Signs of Christ's Coming.

"Ye can discern the face of the sky, but can ye not discern the signs of the times." Matt. xvi. 3. "But as the days of Noe were, so also shall the coming of the Son of Man be. For as in the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and given in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark. And knew not until the flood came and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be." Matt. xvi. 3: xxiv. 37, 38, 39. "Likewise also as it was in the days of Lot; they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded; but the same day that Lot went out of Sodom it rained fire and brimstone from heaven and destroyed them all. Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of Man is revealed." Luke xvii. 28, 29, 30. If the generation living contemporaneously with Noah and the flood, had understood the signs of the times in which they lived, many would, in all probability, have heeded the note of warning from Noah, and thus have escaped destruction by the flood. But they were borne on and on by the eddying tide of excitement and had no time for reflection. Their minds were filled with love of sensual pleasures, leaving no room for sober thought. Not that there was sin in eating and drinking to satisfy hunger and thirst. Not that marrying and being given in marriage were necessarily sinful. But to eat to gluttony and drink to drunkenness, and to marry for the gratification of lustful passions were sinful. And doubly so to have their time wholly occupied, and their thoughts wholly absorbed in sensual pleasures to the neglect of that preparation which was absolutely necessary to avert overwhelming destruction. What would we think of a family who should be engaged in amusements and hilarity when their house was on fire, and the roof might at any moment fall in and bury them in its burning ruins? It would evince no more insanity than for men and women to be whiling away their precious time with vain amusements or sensual pleasures on the trembling crater of destruction.

The same is true of the people of Sodom and Gomorrah. There was no sin in buying and selling for honest gain; but to be engaged in these pursuits for dishonest gain, and eating and drinking for carnal pleasures, while the heavens above were lurid with flames which would soon reduce them to ashes, was the acme of folly. But we may be told that the old world and the inhabitants of the doomed cities of the plain, were in utter ignorance of these impending judgments. True; but they might have known had they only heeded the warning of the messengers of God. Had they then as much concern about their future well being as they were in reference to present gratification, they would have understood the signs of the times. It is just so to-day. Men seem to understand everything except that which should concern them most. They understand the laws of trade and commerce. They can navigate all rivers, seas, and oceans, and circumnavigate the earth. They can weigh the stars in scales and tell their relative positions and distances. They can harness steam and lightning, and traverse earth, air and sea. They can delve far down into the solid earth and bring up gems of knowledge, rich and rare. They can analyze the elements of earth, air and water, and tell their component parts. They can read the natural signs which are hung out in heaven and upon earth, indicative of fair or foul weather; but they cannot understand the signs of the times. And without time, attention, and investigation, they will not understand until sudden destruction shall come, with its thunders, lightnings and earthquakes. Had the Jews understood the times in which they lived, they would not have crucified the Lord of life and glory. Nor would their city and commonwealth have been desolated with judgments. That people will never realize what they have lost until the great truth flashes upon their minds that He whom they rejected and crucified, is their long expected Messiah. Referring to the times in which we live Gabriel declared that the wise should understand.

We are living in an age of so many grand and startling events, that the most astounding wonders cease to be wonderful. All thinking men apprehend that some great event is just upon us. But what is coming they have no definite idea. None understand the signs of the times except those who give heed to the sure word of prophecy as to a light shining in a dark place. Those are able to read with some degree of certainty our latitude and longitude upon the great ocean of time. Such can see clearly in the present social and moral status of the world the perfect counterpart of the old world and the cities of the plain. The dark picture drawn by the Apostle Paul representing the social and moral status of the churches—the professed conservators of the morality and religion of the world—demonstrate that we are living in the last days.

Surely the professed churches of Christ are fair exponents of the condition of the world socially and morally.

The following crimes so graphically portrayed by the apostle are patent to all men with their eyes half open.

"This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, trucebreakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good. Traitors, heady, highminded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God; having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof. From such turn away. For of this sort are they which creep into houses, and lead captive silly women laden with sins, led away with divers lusts. Ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth. Now as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, so do these also resist the truth; men of corrupt minds, reprobate concerning the faith. But they shall proceed no further; for their folly shall be manifest unto all men, as theirs also was." 2 Tim. iii. 1-9.

The foregoing needs no comment. The word of all is that there is no hopes of reformation, or a better state of society during the present age; for the great, the popular, and influential churches, which mould to a great extent the social and moral sentiments of the civilized world, are ever learning, but never able to come to the knowledge of the truth. They are both deceiving and being deceived. The life and power of godliness are gone. Nothing but the form or carcass remains. If the seventeen charges alleged by the apostle do not belong to this generation, the Lord have mercy upon the generation to which they do belong. They never can be more perfectly fulfilled. This being true, the evidence is clear and unquestionable that we are living in the last days of the present dispensation. The following inspired picture of the latter days is drawn to the life. Paul says:

"Now the Spirit speaketh expressly that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils; speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their conscience seared with a hot iron; forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth." 1 Tim. iv. 1-3.

The Spirit speaks the foregoing expressly for the benefit of the people living in the latter time. The charges in the first and second verses are not confined to avowed spiritualists. They embrace the immortality of the soul by whomsoever taught. There never has been a time when the falsity of this dogma has been brought more prominently and forcibly before the churches and clergy than to-day. Twenty millions of spiritualists are forbidding to marry and teach abstinence from meat.

Human Physiology—No. 4.

The thought is pretty generally entertained that the marked difference between the animal kingdom and man, is, that man possesses a soul, while the animal kingdom does not. But unfortunately for those who are wedded to this view, we fail to find any evidence in its support, either in the Bible or general physiology.

Then, to the Bible first we turn for its teachings upon this subject; and we read in Genesis i. 20; "And God said, let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life (for life, in the Hebrew we have nephsh—Greek psuchen, in English, literally soul,) and fowl that may fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven."

Again in the same chapter and verse 30, we have, "And to every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to every thing that creepeth upon the earth, wherein there is life, (literally soul) I have given every green herb for meat; and it was so."

We might multiply quotations upon this particular point, but these are sufficient.

Next, we notice in reading the Bible closely, that the same principle (element) put into man (the breath of life) in his creation likewise is possessed by the animal kingdom. Read Gen. vii. 15, 21, 22. "And they went in unto Noah into the ark, two and two of all flesh, wherein is the breath of life."

"And all flesh died that moved upon the earth, both of fowl, and of cattle, and of beast, and of every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth, and every man; all in whose nostrils was the breath of life, of all that was in the dry land died."

With these Scriptures before us, then most significant indeed is Solomon's assertion in Eccl. iii. 19, 20. "Man hath no pre-eminence above a beast; for all is vanity. All go unto one place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again."

Again in the same book, and chapter, verse 21, Solomon asks the question, according to the Douay rendering, "Who knoweth if the spirit of man goeth upward and that the spirit of the beast goeth downward to the earth?" Gesenius in his Hebrew Lexicon defining the word ruach, (rendered in King James, spirit) says: "That the principle—spirit—in this verse, Eccl. viii. 8; xii. 7, is the principle possessed in common by both man and beast; that which was received from God in the beginning, and which at death is given back to him."

Since then we find that in common with man the animal kingdom possessed souls—were made living souls, received the same breath of life, and had the same spirit in kind, the question arises, wherein consists man's pre-eminence?

For an answer to the above question we turn to general physiology. We quote from our author, Mr. Brown, pp. 138-9.

He says; "To suppose that the power of thought belongs alone to the human race is perhaps, the most common mistake of the subject, (mental functions). There is unmistakable evidence that the inferior animals think, and that in them the power of thought is more or less perfect according to the degree of brain development.

In the vertebrate animals, as we ascend the scale from fishes to reptiles, from reptiles to birds, from birds to mammals, and finally to man, we find at every step an advance in the perfection of the nervous system; but this advance effects chiefly the cerebrum. Fishes have a very perfect spinal cord, the rudiments of a cerebellum, but nothing that deserves to be called a cerebrum. With them, thought is little more than an instinct of self-preservation. In reptiles, the cerebrum, though very small, can be clearly distinguished; and as the advance continues, intelligence keeping pace with it, till it culminates in man."

"But even in the mammalia, the class to which man, as an animal, belongs, the proportion of the cerebrum to the cerebellum varies very much. In the lower orders of this class, such as the sloth, the ant-eater, and the opossum, the cerebrum is but little larger than the cerebellum; but, in man, it is from seven to ten times as large. This fact has led physiologists to infer that the cerebrum is the proper organ of thought, and the inference is probably well founded."

"There is another feature in which the human brain differs from that organ in inferior animals. The proportion of gray matter is much greater in the brain of man than in that of any of the lower animals. But here, again, we find an ascending scale corresponding to the degree of intelligence in the animal. This is so uniform, that it may be regarded as establishing a general rule, that the proportion of gray, as compared with the white matter in the cerebrum, measures the sagacity of the animal."

However humiliating to many persons this view may be, yet, it is the lesson taught us by physiology and the Bible, save that the Bible brings to view a resurrection and a future life through Jesus Christ for the man who is worthy to obtain that world, while there is no promise of such to the animal.

Bethlehem.

BY S. A. C.

The flocks were all gathered and lay on the green,
And the shepherds were lost in the r dreat :;
When a far-away glory, disclosing its sheen,
Shoots through the star-splendors its beams.

O what can it be that in Palestine's night
Grows brighter o'er shepherd and fold?
'Tis the glory of God,—that ineffable light.—
That shines from the city of gold.

On that ladder of brightness the angels come down
And sing their sweet hymnals to earth;
For Bethlehem city, prophetical town.
Has given Immanuel birth.

O fear not nor tremble; glad tidings I bring
Which shall be to all nations around;
In a manger lies cradled a Heavenly King,
The babe is in swaddling clothes bound.

Thus sang the tone herald,—when sudden there came
The morning-star songsters that sang
In the choirs at creation to Elohim's name
When sweetly their golden harps rang.

All glory to God each musical voice
In melody hymns the Most High;
Henceth peace to men, be ye glad and rejoice,
Sing the multitude bands of the sky.

To the city of David, the infant to view,
The shepherds repair with delight;
To their dwellings in heaven the angels withdrew,
And again fell the curtains of night.

Conference Report.

According to notice the annual conference of Northern Illinois and Southern Wisconsin, met at the Union Church in Durand township, Winnebago county, Illinois, September 10th, at 7 o'clock p. m.

After singing and prayer, Bro. J. M. Stephenson delivered an able discourse on Faith.

On the following morning a goodly number of brethren met for business.

On motion Bro. J. S. Arnold was chosen chairman, the writer as secretary, and Bro. Elliott for the arrangement of business.

A report of the congregations represented was called for. Many were represented as being in a prosperous condition.

Bro. Stephenson gave us quite a lengthy report of his labors in the vineyard since he left the Pacific coast. He says he never saw the people so willing to hear the truth as at the present.

On motion the meeting adjourned till half past 2 o'clock p. m.

At the appointed time the meeting assembled, and was called to order by the chairman. The subject of the fellowship was taken up and freely discussed, but no plan for collecting means was adopted save the following recommendations, viz: We do recommend that each congregation shall constitute an independent evangelical association, and that they appoint a treasurer, whose duty it shall be to solicit subscriptions for the purpose of sounding out the truth.

On motion J. S. Arnold was chosen chairman, and Isaac Bridge secretary of the conference for the ensuing year.

On motion it was made the duty of the chairman to appoint the next conference and give due notice of the same through the RESTITUTION.

On motion conference adjourned to meet again upon the call of the chairman.

At the usual hour in the evening, Bro. J. M. Stephenson preached a discourse, to a large audience, upon the promises made to the fathers.

Sunday morning we met on the margin of Rock Run, where we beheld three humble souls put on Christ by baptism. We then repaired to the church, where Bro. Stephenson discoursed to us upon the Savior's conversation with Nicodemus. This discourse he followed with another at 3 p. m. upon the same subject, and in the evening with another upon the Lord's (or Disciple's) prayer, Matt. vii. 9–16. After the discourse, we attended to the breaking of bread, sang a hymn and went out; and thus ended our meeting, which was a pleasant one, and one long to be remembered by all present.

Gleanings.

Intelligence from Brother Foore, of Galesburg, Neosha county, from brethren of Columbus, Cherokee county, and Brother Vermillion, Fort Scott, Kansas, shows that notwithstanding the abundant crop, and the absence of the grasshoppers, that the people of southeastern Kansas are still afflicted—not well persons enough in many families to care for the sick. This lovely land with the balance of earth rests under the curse pronounced upon it in the days of Adam, and will thus rest until He comes who is to restore all things. We hope that bright day is nigh at hand.

The following letter from sister Messmore will be of interest to many readers as it gives an account of the faith and steadfastness of the brethren in Kosciusko county, Ind:

BRETHREN:

Owing to the blessed meeting held in our school house, in Jackson township, Kosciusko county last Saturday evening, also Sunday forenoon and afternoon, I am inspired to write a few words to the RESTITUTION; that its readers may know we are still in hope of the soon appearing of our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ.

Saturday evening we were addressed by Brother Wince. His theme was "The Misinterpretation of the Scriptures," in which he contrasted the true mode with the popular mode. It is a very interesting subject—one that should occupy the mind of every true believer.

Oh, brethren and sisters, God forbid that Christ should speak to us at his coming as He did to Cleopas and his friend at the time of his resurrection; "O fools, and slow of heart, to believe all that the prophets have spoken." For, "all things must be fulfilled, which are written in the law of Moses and in the prophets, and in the Psalms concerning me."

On Sunday forenoon Brother Wince again spoke to the people. His subject was the first and second coming of Christ; he considered both the same; that is literal. His remarks were followed by a few from father Andrews, of Michigan; also by some very encouraging thoughts from Brother Gutlin. In the afternoon we had a social meeting which was exceedingly interesting. Almost all the brethren and sisters took part by telling each other their hopes and fears, singing songs, and encouraging one another in the faith once delivered to the saints.

The meeting closed and all went to their separate homes, rejoicing in the soon appearing of our Savior.

"Saints, lift up your heads, that day is near,
When your Redeemer shall appear,
To take the kingdom and the crown,
And make his ransomed bride his own."

Yours for the kingdom,

CYNTHIA MESSMORE.

The following letter from Brother Fike may prove interesting to many, hence we transcribe the entire letter:

BRETHREN:

I love to read the RESTITUTION, for therein I find food that is wholesome to all classes if they would only try it. Yes, it is strengthening to the weak—it will bear us up to become a full grown man or woman in the Christ. It will heal our infirmities. Brethren, let us be up and doing while it is called to-day; let us not harden our hearts as in the days of the provocation. For soon the Judge will stand at the door to sever the sheep from the goats; the sheep He will place on the right hand that they may enter into the joys of our Lord, but the goats will be banished into eternal death or destruction.

Brethren let us strive to be among the sheep, that we may have a right to the tree of life in the everlasting kingdom of God, for Christ will reign on David's throne and over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there will be no end. Let us study God's word more that we may become workmen, rightly dividing the word of truth.

I would also say that I have so far only received two dollars toward relieving my wants; will not some more of the brethren assist a brother that standeth in need? Oh, may the Lord soon come to gather his saints to reign with Him in the everlasting kingdom over the nations of earth. I am a thousand times obliged to these two brethren that have aided me in my distress. May we meet together on the plains of Eden at the revelation of Christ, to part no more from life's beautiful river and our fair Eden home with God as our Father, and Jesus our brother and king of saints, is the prayer of your unworthy brother. Looking for that speedy coming of Christ. Amen. D. W. FIKE.

GARRISON, Iowa, Benton County.

The Name of Jesus Christ.

This name I do love. And I love the RESTITUTION, because it puts sinners into the sweet saving name of Jesus.

By repentance from dead works, and of faith toward God, of the doctrine of baptisms, and of laying on of hands, and of the resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment. And this will we do if God Permit.—Hebrews vi. 1-3.

The name of Jesus Christ comprehends all that is affirmed of him, and is therefore the summary of his character as a prophet, sacrifice, priest, and king. Hence, in order to understand his name, we must know what is testified of him in the Abrahamic covenant—of the promises to Abraham and to his seed after him, which Paul says is Christ. We must search the Law and the Prophets to know who Shiloh's name is, and also the name of the Branch.

And the name Emmanuel, which is God with us.—Matt. i. 23.

God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name. That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth.—Phil. ii. 9, 10.

My friends, do you not know that fornicators, idolators, adulterers, effeminate abusers of themselves with mankind, thieves, covetous, drunkards, revilers, extortioners. Let all such sinners stop and think, and be in a hurry to repent, and be "washed, be sanctified, be justified, all in the name the Lord Jesus, and by the spirit or truth of our God."—1 Cor. vi. 8–11. Oh, sinner, be in earnest to get out of the old Adam by getting into the new Adam, by faith, repentance, and baptism into the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit.

"Keep the ordinances as I (Paul) have delivered them unto you.—1 Cor. xi. 2. How did Paul baptize his converts? He buried them in the name of the Lord Jesus. See Acts xix., Rom. vi. Christ preached in parables so that they who are without should not understand. See Matt. xiii. 33; Mark iv. 34. But after he ascended to the Father after that he through the Holy Spirit had given commandments unto the apostles whom he had chosen. See Acts i. 2. The Comforter, which is the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance whatsoever I have said to you. So we see that the Holy Spirit has taught the apostles how to minister the commandments unto unto their brethren; but, says one, how are we to administer the ordinances to our brethren? Well, I will tell you. Who were to be Christ's witnesses to all nations? The apostles. See Luke xxiv. 47; Acts v. 32. They gave us the Gospel, which is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth. Now let us read that Gospel, and obey it, and keep the commandments as Paul delivered them unto us. For if an angel from heaven preach any other let him be accursed.

To the Young.

It is well for the young to pause frequently and exercise that prudent forethought so necessary to insure a safe and happy voyage over the sea of human life. The inexperienced pilot will often cast a forward glance upon the sea to catch the first appearance of danger, in order to avoid what might otherwise cause his ruin. So the young, standing in the vestibule of this busy world, just ready to launch off upon the sea of life, should look forward to catch the sound of the distant breakers and avoid the rocks and quicksands that lie in their way. However bright the morning of life may appear, yet as the ocean at times is swept by the wing of the tempest and its waters plowed into mountain waves, so the sea of human life, must be disturbed by the tempests of disappointment, and the storms of misfortune will roll over it, making shipwreck of the unwise and improvident, and, to some extent, blasting the hopes and anticipations of the wisest and best. There is a work to be accomplished in the morning of life—a work of paramount importance. The season of youth is too generally regarded as a sort of play-day, having but little responsibility, care and labor. The young live in the future, and are thoughtless of the present. In my judgment, there is no period in human existence so important and so full of interest as the season of youth. In the first place, it is important because it is the starting-point in life, and in every human enterprise it is essential that we begin right. The first step controls the second, and the second the succeeding one, and so on through life.

An error at the beginning of life may pave the way for greater sins to follow; may be the beginning of a great comedy of errors, while mistakes at the close of life will lead to but few succeeding ones. In solving a long and complicated mathematical problem, a mistake of one figure at the beginning, and that of the least relative value, may prove a serious error at the close. The blunder, slight at first, runs through the entire work, increasing at every step and leading to other and greater errors, and in the result its magnitude is truly fearful. Had that mistake occurred near the close of the process, the result would have been much less. So the errors of our youth, though trivial in themselves, may run through the whole problem of life, increasing in magnitude all the while and that which in the morning of life seemed like a little cloud no larger than the hand, may multiply and spread until it darkens the whole heavens. Let the young, then, beware of the smallest sins, and shun all error and wrong, so shall their future years be bright and peaceful, and blessings follow them to the grave. Happy, thrice happy is that young man who stands firmly on the rock of virtue, resisting successfully the syren influences of all worldly temptation. Woman is sheltered by fond arms and loving counsel, old age is protected by its experience, and manhood by its strength, but the young man stands amid the temptations of the world like a self-balanced tower. Happy he who seeks and gains the prop and shelter of morality. Let no one, then, regard the season of youth with indifference. Let the young improve it well, and lay up treasures for coming years. "In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thy hand."—Phrenological Journal.

Buddhism and Romanism.

The Abbe Huc, a most devout Catholic, in his "Travels in Thibet," points out so naively the parallel existing between Buddhism and Catholicism that his work was rewarded by being placed on the "Index Expurgatorius." He says:

The cross, the mitre, the dalmatics, long white gown, with sleeves worn over the alb, the pluvial that the grand lamas wear during ceremonies outside the temple, the service of two choirs, psalmody, exorcism, and the censer swung by five chains, and opening and closing benedictions given by the lamas, who extend their right hand over the heads of the faithful, the rosary of beads, ecclesiastical celibacy, spiritual retreats or convents, the worship of saints, fastings, processions, litanies, holy water,—are so many things that the Buddhists have in common use with us."

The Abbe might also have added the chanting of the religious services in Sanscrit—a dead language—relics, the tonsure, the confessional, the pope or grand lama, vicegerent of Buddha on earth, and the burning of incense before the image of "the queen of heaven." Father Grebillon was so dumbfounded by these facts that he lost his scholarly wits, and committed an anachronism of more than five hundred years! He declared that Buddhism was an outgrowth of Nestorianism. Father Gremaire was more logical in ascribing the whole thing to the devil himself.

Buddhism, as it exists to-day, dates from Sakya, called in Sanscrit, Gautema. He died B. C. 648. It prevails in Thibet, Ceylon, China, Siam, Burmah, all the countries between China and India, several trans-Gangetic countries, part of Russia, and Chinese Tartary. It numbers nearly or quite four hundred million devotees, and with Brahminism, which it greatly resembles, it may be fairly called the religion of half the world.—Appleton's Journal.

The Proposed Railway Tunnel Under the English Channel.

The preliminary arrangements for the commencement of this great work are progressing favorably, and there appear to be good prospects for its execution under the combined auspices of the English and French governments. Preliminary surveys of the best routes have been made by eminent engineers, who have become satisfied thereupon that no especial difficulties are likely to be encountered. The length of the tunnel will be about 23 miles.

The subject came up for discussion recently before the British Association when Sir John Hawkshaw, who is one of the engineers of the work proposed, gave a variety of interesting particulars:

The channel waters, he said, were a mere fish-pond. They were only 180 feet deep. Borings have been made to a depth of 600 feet on each side of the Channel, and also in the Channel bottom at many points on the line, and it has been experimentally ascertained that the tunnel would pass through a chalk formation for nearly the whole distance. The tunnel would be 220 feet below the bottom of the Channel. And with this large amount or material existing between the bed of the tunnel and the ocean above, there was little danger of any trouble from the ingress of water.

A very instructive and valuable number is that of THE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL AND LIFE ILLUSTRATED for October. It discusses Dwight L. Moody and his work in England, and gives a good portrait of the evangelist; presents an elaborate exposition of the Nature of the Will, at once very clear and convincing; contains a series of admirable character sketches in Men, Women, and Dogs, and offers much practical instruction in the Temperaments, illustrated. Among the other subjects worthy our readers' attention in this excellent magazine are: Wou Again, a social sketch; House and Window Gardens, illustrated; Comfort for Diffident Young People; Francis E. Spinner, late U. S. Treasurer; A Lesson in English Finance; Some of the Institutions of San Francisco; Emanuel Kant; Not all Gold that Glitters; Business Mismanagement; The Lesson of the Great Floods; Accidental Hints, besides the well stocked Menterial Department is well worth a careful reading. BUSINESS DEPARTMENT.

Will the readers of the RESTITUTION be kind enough to examine the labels on their papers this week. These labels mark the year, the month and the day to which you have paid for your paper. We have been on account of short crops in many localities the last year, hard times and disasters carrying many names long beyond the date of expiration. These we will now have to drop; not because we desire to part with them, but in order to the future life and usefulness of our paper we must guard its interests peculiarly. This will be the last number we shall send out to those whose time expired preceding July 1. About the middle of October numbers will be sent to those whose dates expired up to August. And soon we must erase our list and keep it pruned up to within thirty days of date.

"There Remaineth a Rest."

LORAN BYAM.

There remaineth a rest for the people of God,
When time shall be no more;
A rest beyond this world of strife,
On Canaan's peaceful shore.

There, 'mid the beauties of Eden so bright,
The Paradise restored,
The saints of God will dwell in delight,
Forever with their Lord.

In that ever bright and happy land,
No sickness ever comes;
No breaking hearts, no death-bed sighs,
Among God's chosen ones.

But all is joy and gladness there,
No bitter tears are shed;
No parting from the loved ones more,
No weeping for the dead.

The eye of faith sees just ahead,
A bright and shining shore;
And we long for that bright and heavenly land,
Sought for by saints of yore.

We long for the sinless, peaceful home,
And that glorious city bright;
The city that hath foundations pure,
The city of golden light.

DAVENPORT, Iowa.

What Shall We Believe.

As without faith it is impossible to please God, and as whatsoever is not of faith is sin, it follows that all acceptable obedience must come from an acceptable faith. As faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God, an acceptable faith must be a faith which is according to the Word of God. As the value of our faith depends on what we believe being true, so a faith in what is not true is of no value, it is vain.

The Scriptures enjoin upon us to believe the Gospel, the Gospel of the kingdom, the Gospel of God, the Gospel of Christ, the Gospel of our salvation, and the faith of the Gospel, and yet the Apostle Paul assures us that there is but one Gospel. Then all these different designations of the Gospel must mean the same one Gospel. A belief in this Gospel is made the condition of our salvation. "He that believeth the Gospel and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned." "Though we or an angel from heaven preach any other Gospel than this let him be accursed."

Our question then assumes an importance equal to that of our salvation. Can we attain unto a knowledge of what we must believe in order to please God and be saved? or must we be ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth? Where is it to be found? In the Old Testament or in the New? or is it all there is in both? Is it plainly revealed so that men of common minds may understand? Is it a system which is in harmony with itself, and with the whole Bible, and which can be distinguished from everything else? How may we know that we are of and that we have the truth? Where shall we begin our investigations?

In answering these questions we will take the New Testament as our guide. We will follow its pointings until we arrive at the truth.

The Apostle Jude exhorts us to contend earnestly for the faith which was once delivered to the saints. Jude 3. He describes the faith as being once, at some particular time, delivered to the saints. The Apostle Paul said, There is but one faith, and exhorts us to stand fast in one spirit, with one mind, striving together for the faith of the Gospel. Eph. iv, 5; Phil. i. 27. As there is but one faith, this faith of the Gospel, and the faith mentioned by Jude must be the same.

He said further, "I now stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God to the fathers. Acts xxvi. 6. As there is but one hope, Paul's hope must be the same as the one mentioned in connection with the one faith. Eph. iv. 4. Peter calls Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob the fathers. Acts iii. 13. The promise for which Paul hoped was made to the fathers who were Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. Gal. iii. 16.

And when God made promise to Abraham, because He could sware by no greater, He swear by himself, saying, Surely blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee. And so, after he had patiently endured he obtained the promise. For men verily sware by the greater; and an oath for confirmation is to them an end of all strife. Wherein God, willing more abundantly to show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath; that by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold of the hope set before us. Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast. Heb. vi. 13, 19.

In this passage the apostle refers us to the promise made of God unto Abraham, and confirmed to him and his seed by an oath, that he might show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, and that we might have a strong consolation who have fled for refuge to lay hold of the hope set before us in this promise. This promise is not only the hope of Paul, but it is the hope of all Christians.

This promise of God to Abraham and his seed Paul said, was the Gospel preached to Abraham. Again, In the first verse of the New Testament it is said, that Jesus Christ is the Son of David, the son of Abraham, thus securing all the promises which were made to Abraham and to his seed, to David's son, which is Jesus Christ. Therefore, if we would know what is the mission of Christ into the world, we must learn what is said concerning the seed of Abraham, and the seed of David.

The angel said to Mary, the mother of Jesus, that her Son would be great, and should be called the Son of the Highest, and the Lord God should give unto him the throne of his father David. And Zechariah said, that God had raised up a horn of salvation in the house of his servant David, to perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant, the oath which he sware to our father Abraham. Luke i. 32, 69, 73. In these passages the child was born to fulfill the covenant made with Abraham and with David.

After Christ was raised from the dead, Peter said that God had sworn with an oath unto David, that of the fruit of his loins he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne. Acts ii. 30: xiii. 32, 33. In these passages Christ was raised from the dead in fulfillment of God's covenant with Abraham and with David. If Christ was born for this purpose, and if he was raised from the dead for this same purpose, his whole mission must be to fulfill the promises concerning the seed of Abraham and the seed of David.

Thus, the whole New Testament agrees in pointing us to the covenant which God made with Abraham and his seed, as being the faith which was once delivered to the saints, and as being the promise which God made to the fathers, which was Paul's hope, and as being the immutable counsel, which God confirmed by an oath, for the hope and consolation of all his people who are the heirs of the promise, and as being the one faith of the Gospel which was preached to Abraham, and which must be believed, as Abraham believed, in order that we become the children of Abraham and heirs according to the promise. And as revealing God's immutable purpose concerning the world, which Christ came to accomplish.

What then must we believe? We must believe

THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM, AS PREACHED TO ABRAHAM.

What are the leading points of this wonderful covenant?

The leading points are the following:

1. All the nations of the earth shall be blessed as a final result.

2. The seed of Abraham will be the instrumentality by which this work will be accomplished.

3. This work will be done, when the seed of Abraham shall possess the gate of his enemies, and when the seed of David shall be established upon his throne, and when all the land of Canaan shall be given to Abraham, and to his seed for an everlasting possession, and God shall be their God.

4. Under this dominion and reign of the seed of Abraham and the seed of David, over the nations of the earth, those that bless Abraham will be blessed, and those that curse Abraham will be cursed, and as a final result, all the nations of the earth will be blessed instead of being cursed as now.

5. Abraham believed God and it was accounted to him for righteousness. The conditions upon which his seed we be counted righteous are the same. The children of Abraham must do the works of Abraham, they must walk in his steps, they must believe God and obey him as Abraham did. They must not withhold from him their son, their only son, their son whom they love.

These are the leading points in this covenant. There may be others, but I think they will be found subordinate ones. This covenant furnishes us a rule by which we may come to the knowledge of the truth, and not be of those who are ever learning, but never able to come to a knowledge of the truth.

LET US APPLY THIS RULE.

1. When we read that all nations shall serve him, that unto him every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father, that the whole earth shall be filled with the knowledge and the glory of God, that the will of God will be done in earth as it is done in heaven, and that the nations which are saved, and which have been healed by the leaves of the tree of life, will be so blessed that there shall be no more curse upon them, we know that all these and such like promises are in fulfillment of God's promise and oath to Abraham, that all the nations of the earth shall be blessed.

2. When we read that thy seed will I establish forever, and build up thy throne to all generations, and that he shall judge the poor of the people, and shall save the children of the needy, and shall break in pieces the oppressor, that in his days the righteous shall flourish, and abundance of peace so long as the sun and moon endure, that men shall be blessed in him, and all nations shall call him blessed, that Christ was born to sit on the throne of his father David, and to perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant the oath which he sware to our father Abraham, that he was raised from the dead for the same purpose, that he went to heaven to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return, that when he returns he will sit upon the throne of his glory. And when we read that the saints also are the seed of Abraham, and joint heirs with Christ of the promise made to Abraham, that they will be raised from the dead to sit down with him in his throne, and have power over the nations, I say, when we read these and similar promises, we know that they are for the fulfillment of the promise made to Abraham, that his seed shall take possession of his enemies, and bless all the nations of the earth. We know that this seed is the only name mentioned in this covenant by which we can be saved, and all nations be blessed.

3. When we read that the Lord will come with strong hand, and his arm shall rule for him, that his reward is with him, and his work before him, that when the Son of Man comes in the clouds of heaven, there will be given to him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that when he comes and all the saints with him, and his feet shall stand upon the Mount of Olives, and the Lord shall be King over all the earth, that when he comes in his glory, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory, that the heavens must retain him until the times of restitution, that when he comes the second time he comes to save those that look for him, to give crowns unto all them that love his appearing, to judge the living and the dead, to reward every man as his work shall be, to raise the righteous dead, and to gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, When we read such promises as these, we know that they are given to reveal the time when the promise that the seed of Abraham shall possess the gate of his enemies shall be fulfilled.

4. When we read that he will judge the people righteously, and govern the nations upon earth, that he will execute judgment and justice in the earth, that of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end upon the throne of David, that he will gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, that he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet, and subdued all things unto God, that the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord, and he shall reign over them forever and ever. I say, when we read such promises, we know that they are to fulfill the promise which God made to Abraham, saying: Thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies, and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse them that curseth thee, and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed. That this work of subjugation of the nations will take place after the seed of Abraham shall take possession of his enemies, and under the reign of Christ and the saints.

5. When we read that he that believeth shall be saved, that without faith it is impossible to please God, that the just shall live by faith, that being justified by faith we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ, that they which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham, and heirs with him of the same promise, that except a man forsake all that he hath he cannot be my disciple, that he that loveth father or mother, wife or children, houses or lands more than me, is not worthy of me, we know that these are the same conditions that were enjoined upon Abraham. Abraham believed God and it was accounted unto him for righteousness. And the Lord said, by myself I have sworn, because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine ONLY SON, WHOM THOU LOVEST from me, that in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thee. He confirmed the promise he had made to Abraham by his oath. Because Abraham believed God and obeyed his voice.

Thus I have shown that it is not necessary to be ever learning and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth. But

1. We may know that the covenant which God made with Abraham, and confirmed to him by his oath, is the one faith of the Gospel which is enjoined upon us by the authority of the whole of the New Testament.

2. We may know that God's purpose as stated in that covenant is to bless all the nations of the earth, by the seed of Abraham, when this seed shall possess the gate of his enemies, and that under the reign of this seed those that bless Abraham will be blessed, and those that curse Abraham will be cursed, until all the nations of the earth shall be blessed. And that this covenant was made with Abraham, because he believed God and obeyed his voice, and this same covenant will be made on the same conditions with all who shall be counted for the seed, or for the children of promise.

We may know that this plan will never be changed, for God is immutable, that this covenant is the framework of God's purpose concerning the world.

CONCLUSION.

From our brief examination of this subject we learn, that it is not the whole Bible that we are to believe as a condition of salvation, but that it is a particular faith contained in the Bible.

That this faith consists in God's covenant with Abraham and his seed, and which he confirms to him by an oath.

That this brief covenant comprehends the whole Gospel system.

That all the promises in the Bible are for the accomplishment of the purpose of this covenant.

That Christ was born to fulfill the same purpose, and that the apostles preached the same promise and oath, as the consolation and hope of all the people of God.

Interesting Paragraphs.

One of the more prominent English Ritualistic clergymen, Dr. F. G. Lee, of All Saints', Lambeth, has lately published two big volumes, entitled "Glimpses of the Supernatural," in which a large number of stories are told in a very credulous manner. The "Spectator" reviews the book severely and somewhat wittily. Dr. Lee has, it says, "collected with great industry and recorded in a lively and interesting way two volumes [of anecdotes, of which the vast majority assume that the dead are still animated by those lower passions which must needs be extinct in the grave, and yet have somehow lost those nobler and purer affections which—if anything in us can survive dissolution—must surely live forever." The review closes with this inquiry: "Regarding the remainder of Dr. Lee's volumes, which are filled with wildest histories of magic and witchcraft, we can really make no remark beyond asking the question: Is the respected vicar himself an instance of the return of departed spirits? Surely, the man who penned many of these pages must have been born, at the very latest, in the seventeenth century."

An Englishman, Mr. James Heywood, has been offering prizes for the best essays in favor of the disuse of the Athanasian Creed. The "Examiner," which is not very orthodox, says:

"The prize offered by Mr. James Heywood for the best essay on the disuse of the damnatory clause of the Athanasian Creed would seem to have drawn a host of competitors. As many as one hundred and sixty-seven essays were sent in, and the judges report that, with a few exceptions, they were well-written papers. The prize of £60 was awarded to Mr. Charles Pebody, of Bristol; and a second prize of £25 to Mr. C. S. Kenny, Fellow of Downing College, Cambridge. The prize essays are to be published shortly and we shall be curious to see whether the stimulus of competition has produced any new reasons why we should not damn everlastingly everybody who differs from us."

"There is a prospect," says the 'World,' "of a large central library at Rome, under the active efforts of the Italian minister, Signor Bonghi. The Jesuit College confiscated by the government, with its ground, has been appropriated to the new library, which is to be called 'Biblioteca Vittorio Emanuele.' Sixty-three thousand printed volumes and 3,000 manuscripts belonging to the college are the nucleus of the library, besides 350,000 volumes and a large number of manuscripts taken from the now defunct monasteries and nunneries of Italy. The new additions are to be of a different character and will supply Rome with works on modern science and literature."

The Rev. Isaac Hillman thinks himself commissioned to give the following invitation through the "California Christian Advocate."

"The Lord's dinner table is spread. Come, for all things are now ready. Come, says the Lord, and I will sup with thee, and thou shalt sup with me!"

That can be nothing less than heaven and salvation, we should think; but two lines further down we find that it is nothing but a speculation in lots in a camp meeting ground. He proceeds from the tone of the mad exhorter to that of the auctioneer with startling suddenness:

"Buy a lot on the grounds, 30x60 feet in size, for the sum of $50, $75, or $100. I have been upon forty or fifty camp grounds; but this excels them all for beauty, health and comfort. If you ever see it you will say, like the Queen of Sheba, 'the half had not been told me!' Don't wait, friends; but purchase at once."

The editor adds his endorsement: "The auction takes place to-day, but purchases can be made after the public sale," etc., etc. And this auction sale is blasphemously announced as the "Lord's dinner table!" "Come, says the Lord, and I will sup with thee!" etc. It is such disgusting exhibitions as this that make religion distasteful to hard-headed business men in California.—Independent.

The value of religion was illustrated by a woman returning from church recently, who declared that "when she saw the shawls on those Smiths, and then thought of the things her own poor girls had to wear, if it wasn't for the consolation of religion she did not know what she should do."

The title of "reverend," now in litigation in the English courts, is likely to cause much poking for precedent amongst the ashes of antiquity. "Learned counsel" cited the following from the churchyard of St. Leonard's, Foster Lane, Cheapside, bearing date 1750:

"Beneath this sable stone is laid
A sorry, antiquated maid,
Who from her cradle toil'ed till death.
And ne'er before was out of breath."

But the learned judge said that the existence of such epitaphs as that only went to show the laxity of those who were the guardians of the churchyards. Our legal adviser suggests that the learned judge has still left it in doubt whether the charge of laxity referred to the epitaph or to that particular sort of candidate for burial therein mentioned.

Thus, when a barber and a collier fight,
The barber beats the luckless collier white;
The dusty collier heaves his ponderous sack,
And, fily with vengeance, beats the barber black;
In comes the brickdust-man, with grime o'erspread,
And beats the collier and the barber red.
Black, red, and white in various clouds are lost;
And in the dust they raise the combatants are tost!

In the winter of 1838 a fire broke out in a seminary for girls at Limoges, France, and spread with alarming rapidity. Suddenly there was a cry that one little girl had been left in her room. While the excited spectators were beginning to pray for the unfortunate child, a tall girl, with dishevelled hair and flowing night-gown, rushed through the crowd, crying, "I'll save her," and dashed into the burning building. Presently a loud shout, and the pale-faced girl was seen bringing the terrified child through the flames. A few days afterward King Louis Philippi sent the heroine a gold medal for her bravery, and a captain of the French army, who had witnessed the girl's pluck, begged an introduction. The captain is now president of France and the brave girl Madame M'Mahon.

A gathering of the descendants of John Eliot, the apostle to the Indians, recently took place at Guilford, Conn. The town of Guilford is one of the oldest in the state, and there Joseph Elliot, second son of the apostle, settled, and preached to his little colony. John Eliot landed in Boston in November, 1631, and he was the original ancestor to all who bear the names of Elyett, Elyot, Elyotte, Eliot, Elliot, and Elliott. Having a strong desire to improve the condition of the Indians, he commenced his labors among them in 1646, and continued until his death, in 1690. His great work was his translation of the Bible into the Indian language—an immense labor. There are now only sixty specimens of the work in existence, the last one sold bringing the extraordinary price of $1150. Of this Bible it has been well said that money may buy it, but no one can read it, the only man alive capable of doing so, being Mr. J. Hammond Trumbull, of Hartford, Conn. At the recent reunion there about 200 people. There was a variety of interesting exercises, and many quaint and curious relics of olden times were brought for examination.

The most ancient known bound volume of the Old Testament was written some time earlier that B. C. 285; the sheets pressed smooth and strongly bound together into a volume nearly four inches thick. The cords across the back are stout and firmly fastened: additional strength is imparted by wooden frames at either end. The outside cover, which does not go across the back, is simply papyrus, precisely similar to that on which the book is written, except that it is a little thicker. It was certainly bound B. C. 241, for it was found in that year just as it is now (except that handling has worn the sides, and they are somewhat torn, though the inside is intact), and has since been guarded with jealous care by the successive Samaritan chief priests. It was shown in 1868 by its custodian, Selameh to Mrs. Eliza Rogers, by whom it is minutely described.—Potter's American Monthly.

The early reports of the destruction of life and property by the Texas cyclone are fully confirmed by later advices. A New Orleans dispatch to Cincinnati "Times" says that out of 300 houses at Indianola, only five remain standing. During the night of Thursday, Sept. 20th, while the storm was at its height, the water in the city rose over six feet in two hours, the wind blowing eighty-eight miles an hour, driving the water and breakers through the city at the rate of fifteen miles an hour, sweeping everything in its way, and covering the plain in the rear of the city for ten miles to a depth of several feet. Several small settlements, numbering a total population of 150, were also swept out of existence, making with the 250 lost at Indianola, a total of 400 lives lost. The gentleman conveying this information gave a most harrowing account of the destitution of the survivors. When he left Indianola, Monday afternoon, ninety bodies had been recovered. The stench in the city from the putrefaction of these bodies, and with the stench from dead animals, was almost intolerable. It is also stated that a party of Mexicans, Sunday, began robbing the dead bodies washed to the plain, four to six miles back of the city. The scoundrels chopped fingers, hands and ears from men and women to obtain jewelry. As soon as this was heard of in the city, a party of citizens went out and killed five Mexicans whom they found engaged in the work.

The India Rubber Tree.

The India rubber tree is found in parts of Mexico, Central and South America, and in the East Indies, and is one of the noblest and most picturesque of all the trees of the forest. In Assam beyond the Ganges, it is found in inexhaustible abundance. It is either solitary, or in two or three fold groups; is large and umbrageous, and may be distinguished from other trees at a distance of several miles by the striking beauty of its dense and lofty crown. The main trunk of one of the Assam trees measured 74 feet in circumference and the area covered by its expanded branches had a circumference of 610 feet. The height of the central tree was 100 feet. It has been estimated that there are over 43,000 such trees in one district within an area of thirty eight. It grows on the slopes of the mountains from the valleys up to an elevation of 29,000 feet. The raw seeds are poisonous to man and quadrupeds, but macaws eat them, and they are used as bait for fish. Long boiling deprives them of their poison.

A large proportion of the quantity of rubber or caoutchouc furnished to commerce comes from Brazil. The process of gathering the juice is very simple. The tree is tapped in the morning, and during the day a gill of fluid is scalved in a clay cup placed at each incision in the trunk. This when full is turned into a jar, and is ready at once to be poured over any pattern of clay, the form of which it takes as successive layers are thus applied. It comes from the tree purely colorless, like milk, but when dried by the sun it is white within and a yellowish-brown without. Its drying and hardening are hastened by exposure to the smoke and heat of fire, and it thus acquires its ordinary black color. Complete drying by the sun requires several days' exposure; during this time the substance is soft enough to receive impressions from a stick, and is thus ornamented with various designs. The natives collect it upon balls of clay in the forms of bottles and various fanciful figures, in which shape it is often exported. The clay mold over which the bottles are formed, being broken up, is extracted through the open neck Usually it has been brought to this country in flat cakes: but a method has been devised by which the liquid is shipped in air-tight vessels of tin or glass just as it comes from the tree.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.
THE RESTITUTION advocates the Bible restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christian Elect as kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief in the Gospel, repentance, and consecration as a prerequisite to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Communications.—The Editor must not be understood as endorsing all the sentiments expressed by correspondents whose articles are inserted under this head. Each writer is alone responsible for the article bearing his own signature. If the teaching of any writer is not endorsed, an article setting forth the views of the party differing may be forwarded. Free discussion of Bible doctrine on all sides will be allowed, but the Editor reserves the privilege of criticising those communications which misrepresent a belief and obedience of the Gospel as a means of salvation, or which undermine its principles.

The God of the Bible.

"The fool hath said in his heart there is no God."

If all the men at this present stage of the world's history who say there is no God are fools, then there are a great many fools in the world, and they are becoming more numerous every day. Those who believe there is no God and consequently no rewards and Punishments in the future, are by no means few, and a more numerous, still are those who, while believing in a God of some kind, or a higher order of being than man, reject the Bible as a revelation from him.

Seeing these things are so—and every true, watchful Christian knows that they are, and has been looking for just such a time, for the prophets have foretold it, it becomes us as good Christian soldiers to sharpen up the weapons of our mind, or as the apostle says, clothe ourselves with the breastplate of righteousness, and take the shield of faith and that sharp two-edged sword, "the Word of God," and be ready to meet this old enemy becoming now so formidible.

That there is a God every Christian believes, and also that the Bible is a revelation from him, containing his will toward us, and what he would have us do and what he is going to do for us. That he has a reason for this belief, not founded on mere credulity and blind faith, but on sound reasoning and true logic, I will endeavor to prove.

The strongest evidence that there is a God who is the great architect and creator of all things, is found in his visible works. All things in nature show the handiwork of intelligence. Nature is an intelligent effect, and must have been produced by an intelligent cause. We know that the ancient Egyptians were an intelligent people, because we can read it in the works which they have left us; the ruins of their great cities and various relics which have been found which experience teaches us no savage could produce, therefore we reason, and correctly too, that they were produced by an intelligent and educated people. We say the same of the Assyrians and Babylonians, all these nations have left us works which show that they were enlightened beyond the attainments of the savage. The statuary and literature left us by the Grecians prove beyond a doubt that they were a highly educated and refined people. Writers say that this country has been inhabited by a race of people of greater intelligence than the natives found here at its discovery. They arrive at this conclusion from the fact that works have been found of greater intelligence than those produced by the natives. Thus we always reason from the effect to the cause. If the effect is intelligent the cause must be.

To carry the reasoning a little further let us take some of the effects of man's handiwork—a watch for example. In this little work we find what at first sight appears to be a complicated machine, and yet on looking close we find that these little intricate parts each have an office to perform, for which they were designed and made by intelligence. We find the key exactly fits the little pivot, and when we turn it winds the watch and sets it in motion. We say that the key was designed to wind the watch. Both the hands come together at the figure twelve. We say that is designed to tell us the time when the sun is in mid heavens, and so throughout the watch every part was designed by an intelligent designer for the work it performs. In this we see an intelligent effect which could not have been produced otherwise than by an intelligent cause. Now let us carry this same reasoning a little higher—to man himself, who is capable of producing such an intelligent effect as this watch.

In man we behold the greatest work that has ever been produced upon this earth, yet every part of him is designed. There is not the minutest part of our body but what has its use, and was designed for the purpose for which it is used. Our eyes—what a wonderful work they are, and what a blessing to us! are designed for us to see; our legs and feet that we may travel about, and how well they perform their office. Our ears that we may hear; our tongue and vocal organs that we may communicate with each other; our teeth that we may masticate our food, and how wonderful and perfect our digestive organs; our hands that we may gather our food and perform the thousand and one other uses for which we find them adapted, and so throughout the details of the body. But above all the action of the brain in producing thought, and enabling us to design and produce works of intelligence.

You would laugh the man to scorn, and call him a fool indeed, who should say that a watch came together of itself, without designer or maker. Then how much greater fool must he be who says man came together of himself without designer or maker. Surely then the wise man was right: "The fool hath said in his heart there is no God."

The question comes home to us very emphatically then, who was the maker of so wonderful a work? Who was the cause, for the cause must have been of greater intelligence than the effect. Man cannot make man, he cannot make anything that can begin to compare with man, he cannot create the minutest thing that has life. Therefore we reason there must be a higher order of being, who is man's designer and maker.

Like causes produce like effects. We have an intelligent effect, it must have had an intelligent cause. Who is this cause? The Christian responds, The God of the Bible, and reason, says Amen.

Man is not the only work which teaches us of this being. We find his works on every hand. The animal the vegetable and mineral kingdoms of nature all show the work of an intelligent creator. The trees the grass the flowers, who can begin to make any thing to compare to them. If we take one of the paintings of a great master and place beside it a daub by an amateur we say at once, the man who produced the master piece is of greater intelligence than he who produced the other. So take one of the beautiful gems of nature in all its morning freshness, and place beside it one of the best imitations that art can produce, and how great the contrast! Is not he who produced the beauty of nature of greater intelligence than he who produced the miserable imitation?

When we consider that this earth, with all its seeming vastness, is but a mere speck in the universe, the work of his hands. When we think of the sun and the planatory system revolving around it, and know that this system with all its immensity is but one of thousands, we are lost in the contemplation of the magnitude of the creation, our finite minds cannot begin to grasp it. If then the effect is so great, what must be the cause? If the work is so great what must be the Almighty Maker, for maker and designer there must be, for such stupendous works, with such perfect systems and regularity in their workings, could never have come together by chance. Surely none but a fool, a man devoid of the first principles of sound reasoning only could say in his heart "There is no God."

This great intelligence, this almighty maker and controller of all these wondrous works is whom the Christian worships as his God, and if there is any reason in anything, surely he has a reason for so doing. Praise be to his holy name for condescending to exercise his lovingkindness upon such insignificant worms of the dust as man must be in his sight.

Mind and Matter.

It is pretty generally admitted that heat, light, force, electricity, magnetism, and even life force, are the same in essence, only differing in form.

Bonaparte was among the first to suggest that the spinal column constituted a galvanic battery; as a consequence of this theory the nervous system is a system of telegraphy, so as the Frenchman says, when a whale is struck by a harpoon, the nerves telegraph to the head, and the head telegraphs back, "hoist full, and smash the boat."

Here is the difficulty with the great thinkers, such as Huxly, Tyndal and others. Their situation is painful, even pitiable. They know without a peradventure that mind, which is simply thought, depends absolutely on certain physical developments properly cultivated. They know in exact proportion to these developments and their culture, is exhibited the mind force. Per contrary, in the same proportion as these are deranged, so is the mind disturbed.

Now the difficulty rests in the fact that this leads to materialism, and if at materialism is put down as rank infidelity. This may not be so painful to a cool speculative mind like that of Herbert Spencer, but is felt most keenly by such cultured and warm-hearted minds as Tyndal. For he sees with vision clear the inseparable connection between mind and certain forms or conditions of matter. And he sees with vision equally clear, clear as the prophet's vision, that there is a Mind not only governing but absolutely directing not only worlds but each microscopic atom in the vast universe, forming worlds, cubes and crystals in amusing beauty. In spite of this, according to the religious teaching of the day he is obliged to rank himself on the side of infidelity, or go directly contrary to his own positive convictions, and play the role of a hypocrite.

What is the matter? Why this terrible howl within the past year? Darwin is almost out of sight, lost in the dust kicked up about Tyndal. The truth is, so-called religious teachers of the day have out-Heroded Herod; with the grasp more tenacious than Socrates with the bowl of hemlock in his hand, the false teachers of religion promulgate the dogma of man's immortality, with all the assumed confidence of the gods—a doctrine which their own Bible denies, from Genesis, where it is declared "thou shalt die," to the declaration concerning the wicked, "they shall be as though they had not been." The writer of this would be safe in offering ten dollars for each text of Scripture proving the immortality of the soul, when an orthodox minister of Chicago offers $50,000 for one such text.

"'Tis passing strange" that Bible teachers will stick to a doctrine, and make it the most prominent of all, when not one direct text can be found in the Bible for it, and so to speak it is crammed full of direct texts against it. But stop, I call to mind one, the serpent said, "thou shalt not surely die." Our opponents may take that and make the most of it.

This subject does not exclusively belong to the dry bones of dogmatic theology, but grasps the great fundamental principle of mental philosophy; and what is of vastly more importance it asks the question what it has pleased God to reveal to man in his Word about his present condition and future prospects.

God says we are dust, and Job was no mean philosopher when he said, "all flesh is grass." My father and mother partook of the ordinary elements to sustain life, furnished by the soil, I have continued to do the same, hence my existence. My parents, who are dead and returned to dust, have no more existence than they had before they were formed from dust, in the universe of God.

Man being formed from dust, "Dust thou art, and to dust shalt thou return," is the inevitable decree. Recollect, not one direct Scripture have we to authorize us to say that it is a part of us, the shell, the adobe house that tumbles back to earth, but the language is as positive as language can be, "thou."

One of the apostles spoke of Christ who "endured such contradiction of sinners," It is the false teaching of religionists who take up with pure pagan philosophy, disregarding, yea, denying the positive philosophy of the Bible, and teaching for doctrine the Egyptian and Grecian tradition: for with the Greek it was all uncertainty.

It is the old, old story or scientific thought standing in opposition to the false teaching of religion, or, as in the case of Tom Paine uniting against the corruption of the church.

Let philosophic thought come to the rescue and emancipate from the Bible the false teachings of its confessed friends, and all will be right.

How is it? Is the God who reveals himself in the formation of a crystal, in direct conflict with the God who reveals himself in the "Law of the Lord?"

So much for man in this "present evil world." What of the future?

Philosophy pretended to know nothing, could only at its most sanguine estate, "hope." Aristotle positively denied future existence.

But listen to that old sheik of the desert: "O that my words were now written, * * * that they were graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock forever. For I know that my redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth. And though after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God."

Listen again to that prime minister of Babylon, who had a clear vision of the history of the world to the end of time:

"And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth, shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt."

The great apostle of the New Testament sets the matter of future existence forever at rest. "Who will render to every man according to his deeds. To them who by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory, honor and immortality, eternal life; but unto them who do not obey, indignation and wrath." The Great Teacher says: "All that are in the graves shall hear his voice and come forth, they that have done good to the resurrection of life, they that have done evil to the resurrection of damnation."

Man was once made of dust; Will that be done again? Yes, all the millions of earth are being made of dust now. But when returned to dust, can it be brought back to life? Grant the power, will it be done? There's the rub. Just here comes in the grand sublimity of faith. Will he remember each clod of the valley? Has the Christianity of these latter days that much faith?

In view of the monstrous error of the religious teaching of these latter days, how melancholy sounds the question of the one soon to return. "When the Son of Man cometh, shall he find faith in the earth?"

We conclude by saying that the Bible and the most advanced stages of science perfectly agree that man is formed of dust, and had no existence before thus formed. Man returns to dust, therefore can have no existence after returning to his mother dust, until called by the voice and trump of God, from the earth and the greedy sea

Questions Concerning Church Organization.

Is it the duty of believers to organize themselves into churches at all? Should they have their names enrolled as members of the church? Is it right for them to pledge to each other, that they will take the whole Bible as the rule of faith and practice, or that they will take a particular faith that is revealed in the Bible as their guide and define that faith? Is it right for them to pledge to each other, that they will work together for a definite faith? Is it right for them to insist on a test of membership? Is it right to main ain discipline [illegible] extent of excluding a member? Does the Lord add members to the church without action of the members, and of the elders? Or does he do it through the action of both? Does he exclude members without the action of the church? Or does he do it through or by the action of the same? Does he join the saints together perfectly in the same mind, and in the same judgment, in some mysterious or invisible way; or, does he do it through their own instrumentality, in the use of the means he has appointed?

Is the church as now organized as efficient as it ought to be? Is its strength as available as it should be? Are the complaints made by editors, by Evangelists, by ministers generally, and by all who have to do with the raising of funds, well founded? Is it so? If it is, is it right for individuals to feel seriously grieved over this state of things? Is it right for them to make earnest individual efforts for improvement? Is it right to make associated effort for the same object? Is it not time, that reforms always begin with the few, and never with the many? Then, is it wrong for a few believers in any given place, (if all cannot be induced to do it,) to agree to work together on some plan which would seem to promise the needed improvement? If this is not right, how is it possible to correct existing evils? If a reform measure must not be adopted by any, until all consent to it, when will the first step be taken?

When it is deemed necessary to unite together for the accomplishment of an object, is it wrong to make a statement of that object so that it can be understood by all? Is it wrong to state the conditions of membership, the officers, the rules by which they will work, to agree upon a plan of finance, and to pledge the members to a faithful performance of their duty as members of the body?

If the Bible is to be made the text book, and if to proclaim the faith of the Gospel as taught in the Bible, is the object of being joined together; is it wrong to state and define this faith, so that it can be understood by all? Is it enough to say that we take the whole Bible, or the Scriptures, as the object of our union? Can we show what our object is, by reading the Bible alone? Can we show what our plan of operation is, or how we will work together, or how we will arrange our meetings, or how we will come at a righteous equality in our contributions, or what we will do with our funds, by simply reading the Bible? Is it wrong or unscriptural to use the same judgment, the same wisdom and understanding, the same tact or skill, in working out the objects of the Gospel, that we have been accustomed to exercise in the accomplishment of other objects?

The above questions are presented for the consideration of the brethren, and in hope that some one, who thoroughly understands the subject, will answer them, and give us a correct Scriptural view of church organization. Such a reply to the above would be read with great interest by many readers of the RESTITUTION.

Indian Spiritualism.

There seems to be no end to the mischief which the doctrine of the conscious existence of man after death is capable of working, and does work throughout the world; in civilized and in barbarous lands.

Heathen and Christian alike are the willing victims of this superstition; and it would exhaust the power of all the writers and printers on earth for a decade to recount a tithe of the abominable and mischievous doctrines, and practices which grow out of it.

One of the least known, yet, by our frontiersmen most severely felt, is the desire to appease the restless spirits of the deceased ancestors of some "Indian Braves" by the propitiatory offering of the scalp of a white man. The natural desire for revenge is, by them interpreted to be the continuous promptings of the spirits of their dead for vengeance on the pale face. A young Indian, a family or a whole tribe, sometimes becomes stricken with this idea, starting out under its inspiration, woe be to the unlucky white, old or young, who first crosses their path. Religious enthusiasm says he must die, and be he friend or foe, his blood must pay the forfeit of the superstition.

Not five years since this superstitious call came to a tribe on one of the Nebraska Indian reservations—a tribe as nearly civilized as Indians ever become under the fostering care of American civilization, having been the recipients of religious instruction for twenty years. How the revelation came from the spirit world to a squad of young braves demanding a white man's scalp that the troubled spirits of their dead whose bones lie buried on the hills about might be put at rest. Five in number, they sallied forth one day, and killed the first white man they met—a Nebraska farmer—who was peacefully following his plow, but a few miles from the reservation. His scalp was taken back to the tribe, and when in a few days the murderers were arrested and the scalp demanded by the Indian agent, it was brought into his headquarters from every part of the reservation, in pieces no larger than a sixpence. Each family lodge, so far as possible, had secured a piece to keep away the evil spirits from their wigwams, and give rest to the souls of their forefathers. "Regular preaching, Sabbath schools and training in day schools could not uproot this superstition from among them." Says the Chicago Evening Journal: The murderers now lie in the Nebraska state prison sentenced for life, punished as they feel, for fulfilling a religious duty while nearly every member of the tribe was accessory.

But, why has American civilization and its religious instructions been unable to extinguish this superstition? Why must the frontiersman and his family every little while be offered up unwilling sacrifices upon its horrid altar? Why should the Hon. Commissioners, who the other day met in council with the chiefs of the Sioux, for the purchase of the Black Hills, run such a terrible risk of losing their lives through the treachery of Little Bad Man; the Indian chief who has declared from the first that he must have the scalp of at least one commissioner with which to appease the spirits of his ancestors? Why? Because the superstition is intrenched in the very civilization which seeks to overthrow it. Why? Because the religion taught them has for its chief corner-stone this doctrine of the continued existence of the dead and their interest, and acting in the affairs of the living. Let the Indian be taught the Bible truth, that "The dead know not anything," but that all future life comes by faith in Christ Jesus through a future resurrection of the dead, and it will not take two decades of preaching and Sabbath school instruction to root out effectively and forever this bloody superstition, founded on the doctrine of the immortality of the soul which work so disastrously to those brave men and their families, who are striving to make "the wilderness rejoice and blossom as the rose." When will the eyes of the professedly Christian world be opened to the fact that paganism is paganism, whether believed and practiced by the Chinese, Hindoo, American Indian, Modern Spiritualist, or orthodox Christian.

Character.

No two leaves in the forest are exactly the same form and texture. No two grains of sand from the seashore or the great African desert are identical in bulk and outline. Even the two drops of water most alike in the universe will exhibit some marks of distinction when submitted to a powerful microscope. The law that excludes duplicates from the visible kingdoms of nature is also a law of the moral world. From Adam to the last man, no two faces will be found exactly alike; and variety in trait and lineament of human character is as inexhaustible as in man's outward appearance. The power which in one man's moral composition is ardent, demonstrative, predominant, in another lies dormant or dead. The cravings which in one breast concentrate upon itself the whole mind and will, before its voice can be silenced or its yearnings appeased, is never felt, scarcely understood, by a being of different organization. The weakness of the weak man is laughed at, in scorn, by the strength of the strong; moral pulp and steel travel side by side, and souls of fine porcelain and delicate crystal [illegible] in the near appearance of granite.—Dr. Cumming.

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.

☞Joseph Barker, who was for many years a bold defiant skeptic, and afterward returned to Christianity, is dead. He died in Omaha, Neb., Sept. 13th, in the 63th year of his age. He was chairman at the great Infidel Convention, at Hartford, Conn., in 1853. A number of works against the Bible were written by him. But for a number of years past, Mr. Barker has been an earnest advocate of the Holy Scriptures, and has done all in his power to counteract the cold, heartless system of Infidelity. Among its closing and beautiful incidents of his life, he called his children to his bedside and bore witness to the precious truths of the Word of God, and the blessedness of the Christian hope. Infidelity bears no fruit but gloom and death.

☞From a number of our exchanges we notice that the Universalists, East, are on the eve of a new departure. It is proposed that a series of "revival meetings" be held in all their churches for the conversion of sinners to Christ. It has been demonstrated that merely believing in universal salvation is not enough. Men must not only confess Christ, but obey his commands. This practically removes the theoretical part of the system and enjoins on men the necessity of a new life, in order to be saved in Christ. A revival meeting in a universalist church is something almost unheard of, but its importance and necessity will not be questioned. A good text to begin with would be: "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish."

Our Bodies.

How often we hear it said that "the body is a tenement of clay," "the house we live in," and many other phrases of similar import. One poet has gone so far as to say that when the body, with its "stammering tongue, lies mouldering in the grave," that he will praise God with "nobler powers." All this may do for poetry and it may fill the mind with emotions of joy, but, it in point of fact, is most pernicious, inasmuch as it leads men to place no value on the body. People are prone to ignore the claims of the physical nature and spend their whole time in cultivating what is called the spirit. The spirit is to get religion; the spirit is to live on without the body; the spirit is to have all the joy and the body is to bear all the pain. Everything is for the spirit. Poets, philosophers and theologians seem to unite in clothing the human spirit with excellencies. Certain ancient philosophers went so far as to say that the body was made by the devil while the spirit was of Divine creation. Others equally zealous tormented the body in order to better the condition of the spirit in the next life. Gregory Nyssen calls the body "a fuliginous ill-savored shop, a prison, an ill-savored sink." And many well-meaning people in our day desire to "bait this house of clay." But the Bible nowhere teaches such inconsistent theories. The body is represented as of the greatest importance. Paul teaches that our bodies are to be made "living sacrifices, holy and acceptable unto God." It is represented as a temple for the indwelling of the Father. We are to glorify God in our bodies as well as in our spirits. The body is to be changed and made like unto the GLORIOUS BODY of our Lord. The natural body is to be raised a spiritual body. Indeed, the whole drift of Divine teaching is to the effect that man shall receive for the things done in body. When we contemplate the wonderful mechanism of the human frame, its fibres and nerves, its possibilities and endurance, we must assign it a higher place in the order of creation than a mere prison-house for an invisible force called spirit. Had it not been for the disloyalty of man, his physical nature would have reached the highest nature, through the medium of the life-tree, which would, by a natural law have imparted immortal vigor and placed him beyond the reach of death. We must not now undertake to evade the consequences of sin and argue that death is a gate through which the real man is to escape all the calamities incident to the first transgression. If death is the "gate to endless joy," then indeed, God inflicted no penalty on man for his transgression. The effect of the modern view of the spirit's destiny independent of the body is, to do away not only with the death penalty, but to deny the resurrection of the dead. Bible men want to stand on Bible ground and claim the full salvation of what was lost in Eden. Death must give up our dead and the body must live again. "Thy dead men shall live, together with my DEAD BODY shall they arise." The Apostle Paul includes it all in his grand argument in Romans: "For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the first fruits of the spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to-wit: THE REDEMPTION OF OUR BODY." Rom. viii. 22, 23.

There is no promise of life, of joy, of rest, of peace to a bodiless spirit in the world to come. The whole man was involved in the terrible penalties which denied him access to the immortal tree in Eden, and which remanded him back to dust, the redemptive scheme contemplates saving the whole man in that coming life where the curse shall be no more.

Responsibility.

Every one of us shall give account of himself to God. Rom. xiv. 12.

The Bible teaches the doctrine of human accountability. Man is in possession of moral faculties; and responsibility is not only a doctrine of Revelation, but it enters into the very feelings of ourself-consciousness. All the propitiations of every false system of worship are demonstrations of how deeply engraven upon the human heart is the persuasion of the truth of the apostle's declaration. We give the sentiments and conclusions of some minds of no ordinary standard.

Says John Pye Smith: "God has written the lesson of responsibility and retribution upon the large scale of affinity and sequence, through the whole empire of nature. The felicities of holiness and the punishments of sin are not arbitrary inflictions, but grow out of the necessary constitutions which the All-wise Sovereign has fixed for the good order of his universe. Hence, it is not less an inevitable certainty, from physical truths and rational evidences, than it is a primary doctrine of the Bible, that 'they who hate knowledge and choose not the fear of the Lord, who reject his counsels and despise his reproofs, shall eat the fruit of their own way.' Prov. i. 26-31.

Revelation also informs us that our whole course of conduct is a matter of record. Nothing is more calculated to appal the guilty conscience, than the fact of one day meeting a full and perfect display of all the enormities of a sinful career in the presence of an omniscient Judge of perfect purity and rectitude. Let us attend to some of the deductions of philosophers on this point.

Says Mr. Babbage, in his chapter "On the Permanent Impressions of our Words and Actions on the Globe We Inhabit:" Laplace has observed "that the curve described by (the motion of) a single molecule of air or any fluid is subjected to laws as certain as those of the planetary orbits; there is no difference between them, but that which arises from our ignorance."

Mr. Babbage pursues the idea, and shows "that those aerial pulses, unseen by the keenest eye, unheard by the acutest ear, are yet demonstrated to exist by human reason.——If man enjoyed a larger command over mathematical analysis, his knowledge of these motions would be more extensive: but a being possessed of unbounded knowledge of that science, could trace every minutest consequence of that primary impulse. Such a being, however far exalted above our race, would still be immeasurably below even our conception of INFINITE Intelligence.—— Whilst the atmosphere we breathe is the ever-living witness of the sentiments we have uttered, the waters and the more solid materials of the globe bear equally enduring testimony of the acts we have committed. If the Almighty stamped on the brow of the first murderer the indelible and visible mark of his guilt; he has also established laws by which every succeeding criminal is not less irrevocably chained to the testimony of his crime; for every atom of his mortal frame, through whatever changes its several particles may migrate, will still retain, adhering to it through every combination, some movement derived from that very muscular effort by which the crime itself was perpetrated. The negro—whose fettered body, from the living charnel-house of his infected prison, was thrown into the sea to lighten the ship, that his Christian master might escape the limited justice at length assigned by civilized man to crimes whose profits had long gilded their atrocity, will need, at the last great day of human account, no living witness of his earthly agony. When man and all his race shall have disappeared from the face of our planet, ask every particle of air still floating over the unpeopled earth, and it will record the cruel mandate of the tyrant. Interrogate every wave which breaks unimpeded on ten thousand desolate shores, and it will give evidence of the last gurgle of the waters which closed over the head of his dying victim, confront the murderer with every corporeal atom of his immolated slave, and in its still quivering movements he will read the prophet's denunciation of the prophet king, "Thou art the man."—Ninth Bridgewater Treat., chap. ix.

But the arm, the tongue, the brain, are but the organists of the mind; and for the mind with all its machinations God has made equally effective registers; "and the Books WILL BE OPENED."—The Holy Scriptures and Geological Science, pp. 361, 362.

Is this deduction of philosophical reasoning indeed true? Are all our deeds, both good and evil, daguerreotyped upon the ever-during pages of the great book of nature. Are revelations and nature one in their assurances of a future judgment and retribution? Reasoning upon a "judgment to come" might well make Felix tremble. Redemption alone provides the remedy for guilt. Miserable will be the doom of the unpardoned sinner. Let us flee for the covert of atoning blood.

The deductions of science that our conduct is self-registering may seem impossible; let us add what we have seen in human achievements. When in the city of New York two years ago, we visited the room containing the instruments for ascertaining the data for prognosticating the probabilities of the variations in the weather in advance of its changes. The delicate machinery there registered the force, velocity, direction, and fitful changes of the wind for all the passing minutes of the 24 hours. No one had to be present. The superintendent was not present at the time of our being there witnessing the automatic movements of the unconscious recorders of the inconstant winds. Whether the fierce tempest traveled by in fury, or the gentle zephyr scarcely fanned the earth, the records told all in the morning. God is infinitely wiser than man. Our wickedness will confront us unless pardoned. Be careful of the records.

The Bible Use of the Words Forever, Everlasting and Eternal.

This is not only a question of the duration of the punishment of the finally impenitent, but of the endless life of God, and of his saints—also whether the everlasting covenant, inheritance and kingdom will be limited to an age. From Genesis to Revelation forever, eternal, and everlasting, are used to express the duration of the reward of the righteous. In hundreds of occurrences they denote the life of God, the immortalized saints, the promised inheritance, and the kingdom. If these words do not express endless duration, there are no words in the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, or English, which can convey such an idea to the mind. The mind cannot conceive of time without an end, any more than an ocean without a shore. The mind can have no conception of a straight line without an end. Nor can it comprehend the idea of an endless succession of events, or measured periods. The very idea of measurement supposes limitations. The singular form of the word age is used more emphatically to express the idea of unmeasured, or endless duration than the plural form ages. Many examples may be given to demonstrate the truthfulness of this declaration. The singular word man, denotes all men, whereas, the plural noun men, denotes only a limited number of men. The singular noun tree, denotes all of the class or species referred to, while the plural noun trees, denote only a part of the whole. The definite word sea, in the following language is unlimited, whereas the indefinite word seas may be limited to two of the smallest seas upon earth. We read, "And the sea gave up the dead which were in it. In this passage we find a singular noun and pronoun. The word sea is used in an unlimited sense to denote all water in which the dead are slumbering. See Rev. xx. 13. The phrase "the grave," in the margin of the same verse stands for every grave upon the broad earth. That the singular noun age, is more unlimited than all ages, is demonstrable from the language of that classical scholar, the Apostle Paul. He says, "Unto him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus throughout all ages, (aionios) age without end. Amen." Eph. iii. 21. 1. The foregoing clearly proves (1) that the singular noun age is unlimited, or without end, or endless. 2. All ages are so many small circles within a large circle, or all ages included in one age, the same as the whole embraces all its parts. The position that the noun age is limited, because singular, dashes to pieces the hope of the people of God in all ages of the world. It also limits the existence of God, and all the promised rewards of his faithful servants. Inasmuch as forever, everlasting and eternal are from the same roots, we will not discriminate between them. Let us take the first example of the word forever in the Bible. "And now, lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and eat and live for an age." "Why limit his life to an age if he should live through endless ages had he obeyed?" If a man gives his note for a thousand dollars, the man to whom the note is given has no claims for a penny more as principal. If a man leases his farm for ten years the tenant has no claims for a day beyond the term of years for which he had leased the estate. If the promised life to Adam, or which was cut off for transgression, was limited to an age, then he would have died when the limited period had run out whether obedient or disobedient. The life associated with eating of the tree of life was either limited or unlimited. Which? There is no avoiding this issue. Is God's covenant with Abraham and his seed limited to an age? We will read in age wherever forever, everlasting and eternal occur, and we will see how it looks and sounds. God says, "And I will establish my covenant between me and thee and thy seed after thee in their generations for an age lasting possession." Gen. xvii. 8. Thus an age measures the duration of Christ's and saint's title to the land of Canaan, just as much as a lease of ten years would limit the title of a tenant to the tenure of the grant or premises. God may intend the grant, but an age is the utmost limit of the title. Is the adjective everlasting in this covenant limited or unlimited? This everlasting covenant was repeated by Jacob on his dying bed. "And Jacob said unto Joseph, God Almighty appeared unto me at Luz in the land of Canaan, and blessed me, and said unto me, behold I will make thee fruitful, and multiply thee, and I will make of thee a multitude of people; and will give this land to thy seed after thee for an age lasting possession." Gen. xlviii. 34. We must conclude from the foregoing translation that Jacob's seed possessed the land of Canaan for an age, and therefore, have no further claims upon God in the future. But let us try another example. We read, "And Abraham planted a grove in Beersheba, and called there on the name of the Lord the age lasting God." Gen. xxi 33. The prophet Isaiah exclaims: "Hast thou not known? Hast thou not heard, that the age-lasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth, fainteth not, neither is weary?" Isa. xl. 28. Of the same import is the following language of Paul. He exclaims in the convulsion of his letter to the Romans, "Now to him that is of power to establish you according to my Gospel, and the preaching of Jesus Christ, according to revelation of the mystery which was kept secret since the world began, but now is made manifest, and by the Scriptures of the prophets, according to the commandment of the age-lasting God." Rom. xvi. 25, 26. Were we not exposing views which we believe to be as false as they are pernicious, we would be forced to the conclusion that a rendering of the strongest words in the Bible on the immortality of God, his kingdom, and redeemed ones, is blasphemous in the extreme. We purpose in future articles to trace the words which stand at the head of this article through the Bible, that we may have the sense in which Bible writers use them.

The Tabernacle of David.

About seven hundred and sixty-seven years before the birth of Jesus, the Lord by his spirit moved upon his servant Amos, causing him to write: "Behold, the eyes of the Lord God are upon the sinful kingdom (Israel) and I will destroy it from off the face of the earth; saving that I will not utterly destroy the house of Jacob, saith the Lord. For lo, I will command, and I will sift the house of Israel among all nations, like as corn is sifted in a sieve, yet shall not the least grain fall upon the earth. All the sinners of my people shall die by the sword, which say, the evil shall not overtake nor prevent us."

"In that day (when God pleads with them and purges out the rebels,) will I raise up the tabernacle of David that is fallen, and close up the breaches thereof; and I will build it as in the days of old: that they may possess the remnant of Edom, and of all the heathen, which are called by my name, saith the Lord that doeth this." Amos ix. 8-12.

That this promise to rebuild the tabernacle of David was not fulfilled in the return of the forty-two thousand Jews from Babylon, is very evident from the language of the apostle James, in his address to the apostles when consulting in reference to the call of the Gentiles, in the year A. D. 51. He says:

"Men and brethren, hearken unto me. Simeon (Peter) hath declared how God at the first did visit the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for his name. And to this agree the words of the prophets; (the above prophecy written by Amos) as it is written, After this I will return, and will build again the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down; and I will build again the ruins thereof, and I will set it up; that the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles upon whom my name is called, saith the Lord, who doeth all these things." Acts xv. 13-17.

And further, that the fulfillment of this promise to rebuild the tabernacle of David is yet future, is evident from the language in the last quotation: "After this I will return," &c. But question, after what? Answer, after he takes out of the gentiles "a people for his name."

This then places the erection of the tabernacle of David, which is an act chronologically parallel with the establishment of Christ's Kingdom, this side of the notable day of Pentecost, (for even Peter's preaching to Cornelius and his house was subsequent to Pentecost,) yet future, and at the close of the Gentile age. Then when a sufficiency from among the Gentiles is taken out to fill the vacant places made by the fall of the Jews the blindness which in part is happened unto the Jews will be removed, the deliverer will descend upon Mount Olivet, Zech. xiv., march from there into Jerusalem to Mount Zion, Psa. xxiv. 3, 7-10; and from Mount Zion in his decrees move forward and turn away ungodliness from Jacob. Rom. xi. 25, 26; and then re-establish the tabernacle of David.

Now a word or two further in reference to the tabernacle of David. Are we to expect the re-erection of a literal tabernacle? I confess that I see no difficulty in a literal interpretation of the language. The question then arises, What became of the tabernacle of David? For an answer to this question, we will call your attention to the Apocrypha of the Bible, the second book of Maccabees ii. 1-8, which is as follows:

"It is also found in the records, that Jeremy the prophet commanded them that were carried away to take of the fire, as it hath been signified; and how that the prophet, having given them the law, charged them not to forget the commandments of the Lord, and that they should not err in their minds, when they see images of silver and gold, with their ornaments. And with other such speeches exhorted he them, that the law should not depart from their hearts."

It was also contained in the same writing, that the prophet being warned of God, commanded the tabernacle and the ark to go with him, as he went into the mountain, where Moses climbed up, and saw the heritage of God. And when Jeremy came hither he found an hollow cave, wherein he laid the tabernacle, and the ark, and the altar of incense, and so stopped the door. And some of those that followed him came to mark the way, but they could not find it. Which when Jeremy perceived, he blamed them, saying, as for that place it shall be unknown until the time that God gather his people again together, and receive them unto mercy. Then shall the Lord shew them these things, and the glory of the Lord shall appear and the cloud also, as it was showed unto Moses, and as when Solomon desired that the place might be honorably sanctified."

With this history of the tabernacle before us, there seems to be but one other objection to its literal re-erection, and that is the preservation of its timbers of which it was composed. Aside from the miraculous power of God in its preservation, this objection is removed by reference to the following scrap of history pertaining to the preservation of the same kind of timber of which the tabernacle was composed, (the chiltim wood.)

ANCIENT TIMBER.

Probably the oldest timber in the world which has been subjected to the use of man is that which is found in the ancient temples of Egypt. It is found in connection with the stone work which is known to be at least 4,000 years old. This wood, and the only wood used in the construction of the temple, is in the form of ties, holding the end of the stone with another in its upper surface. When two blocks were laid in place, then it appears that an excavation about an inch deep was made in each block, into which an hour-glass shaped tie was driven. It is, therefore, very difficult to force any stone from its position. The ties appear to have been the tamarisk or shittim wood, of which the ark was constructed, a sacred tree of ancient Egypt, and now rarely found in the valley of the Nile. Those dovetailed ties are just as sound now as on the day of their insertion. Although fuel is extremely scarce in that country, these bits of wood are not large enough to make it an object with the Arabs to heave off layer after layer of heavy stone for so small a prize. Had they been of bronze, half of the old temples would have been destroyed years ago, so precious would they have been for various purposes.

With these facts before us, then, we see no difficulty whatever in the literal re-erection of the tabernacle and the restoration of the ark of the covenant, and the golden altar of incense, to their proper places. And as the Jews anciently kept the passover, and the disciples of Christ now keep the breaking of the loaf, as monumental institutions so will the feast of tabernacles be observed by the obedient mortal ones of earth; Zech. xiv. 16-19. May the Lord hasten that glad day. G. M. M.

Conference Report.

According to appointment the conference met at the Fairview church, Warren county, Ind., on Friday, Oct. 15, 1875.

On motion, John C. Lincoln was chosen chairman, and Wm. T. Evans secretary.

But few being present, we engaged in social exercises, Brothers Miller, Pugh, Smith and others making remarks of encouragement. At night bro. J. M. Stephenson delivered a discourse.

On Saturday, 16th, the meeting was called to order and proceeded to business. In addition to our former numbers, bros. Reed, Halstead, Tabor, Richardson, Gardner and others were in attendance.

On motion bros. Halstead, Smith, Pugh, Frame and Tabor were appointed a committee of business.

After consultation they reported the following resolutions for adoption:

Resolved, That the action of certain brethren in the formation of what is known as the Christian Publishing Association, have our most hearty approval as a conference.

Resolved, That we are mutually interested in the object and maintenance of the same; therefore be it further

Resolved, That we earnestly recommend each individual member of the body of Christ to co-operate with the same by influence and means, as ability will permit.

An effort being made, $170 in stock to the association was subscribed.

The preaching on Saturday and Sunday, by bros. Reed, Halstead and Stephens was of a practical nature and highly interesting.

On motion the meeting adjourned.

JOHN C. LINCOLN, Chairman.
W. T. EVANS, Secretary.

ED. RESTITUTION:

For the encouragement of the brotherhood, please say through our paper that the meeting at Antioch, Ills., Oct. 8-10, was a success. The rain prevented many from attending who would otherwise have been present; yet there was a fine attendance.

Among those who were at the meeting we mention brethren Dewey, Lovens, Richard Appleyard, Dr. Jacobs and J. M. Stephenson.

Faith, works, singing, prayer, church order, signs of the times, Christian love, and what are we doing for the Master? are the subjects upon which we conversed, and the brethren generally took part in the investigations, so much so that the time proved too limited for many to say all they wished to.

Sunday evening was devoted to social meetings—exhortations, prayer and singing.

After some appropriate closing remarks by the president of the meeting—bro. Appleyard the meeting was dismissed.

Many expressed themselves as highly pleased with the meeting, and we all went away feeling encouraged and strengthened. There were no "isms" to fight about, but many golden promises read from the Bible to think upon. There were no creeds of men to exact credulity and mar our peace, but we read the promises, the basis of our faith and hope as delivered in the lively oracles.

Unity and brotherly love were manifest throughout the meeting, so you may tell the household, if you will, that we had a good time.

The Noises of Earthquakes.

Prof. Lake writes in the Popular Science Monthly: Great subterranean noises and reports resembling thunder—these occur more or less during all earthquakes. Father Kircher describes them as "a horrid sound, resembling that of an infinite number of chariots driven fiercely forward, the wheels rattling and the thongs of the whips cracking." Sir Hans Sloane, in Jamaica, as "a hollow, rumbling noise, almost like that of thunder." At Colares, near Lisbon, in 1755, during the great earthquake, the sound is said to have been "like that of chariots, which increased till it equalled that of the roar of cannon;" and at Lisbon "a rattling as of coaches in the street, with a frightful noise under-ground resembling the rumble of distant thunder." At Madeira the same earthquake was preceded "by rumbling noises in the air like that of empty carriages, which died away like a peal of distant thunder." On the 16th of September, 1849, there was an earthquake at Burra-Burra, in South Australia, where the noise is said to have resembled the rolling of heavy carriages. The shock was followed by a flash of lightning that illuminated the whole atmosphere.

A Morning Song.

I wake this morn and all my life
Is freshly mine to live;
The future with sweet promise rife,
And crowns of joy to give.

New words to speak, new thoughts to hear,
New love to give and take,
Perchance new burdens I may bear,
For love's own sweetest sake.

New hopes to open to the sun,
New efforts worth the will,
Or tasks with yesterday begun
More bravely to fulfill.

Fresh seeds for all the time to be
Are in my hand to sow,
Whereby for others and for me,
Undreamed-of fruit may grow.

In each white daisy, mid the grass
That turns my foot aside,
In each meanwhile fern I pass,
Some sweetest joy may hide.

And if, when eventide shall fall
Its shade across my way,
It seems that naught my thoughts recall
But life of every day;

Yet if each step in shine or shower
Be where thy footstep trod,
Then blessed be every happy hour
That leads me nearer God.

Correspondence.

DEAR RESTITUTION:

I am so rejoiced at the weekly visits you make to our far-off shores. We have no teachers in this country who are true and bold advocates of all that was spoken of Christ by the prophets of old, how that the heavens must retain him until the times of the restitution. No, say the religious teachers, he is only coming at the end of the world, to burn up all things, and then take the souls of the good to heaven with him.

I would like to help do something to keep the RESTITUTION alive, but I am unable to write anything that would interest the brethren, when there are so many able writers. I take three copies this year, and hope I may be able to take four next. I think I can find some one to read it, although I find but few now who will read it. But when I find one that will read, I lend him some of mine.

Could I say anything to encourage anyone to aid you in your efforts to establish the truth, I should be glad to do so. I have been writing to brother Campbell, editor of the Christian Messenger. He would not publish my articles, but returned some of them with short answers. I will send them to you, that you may see in Indiana what some of us think on this coast of the doctrines of the Bible. You can read them if you have leisure, Mr. Editor; if not, pitch them aside for something of more importance.

I have never had the pleasure of seeing but two or three brethren that hold to the doctrine taught by the RESTITUTION. I have been a learner of the good things contained in the Bible for over thirty years, and have found in that time many things new to me. My early teachers had studied but very little of Bible, having a few stereotyped sermons. They were sure they knew enough, and any one who would offer to go further, must be wrong. But as I understand that a disciple of Christ must grow in grace and a knowledge of the truth day by day, as he lives. My first lesson was this. I learned that there was one Lord, one faith, one baptism, and one God, the Father of all.

When I had learned this much, and that Jesus was the Savior of sinners, and commanded all believers in him to repent and be baptized into his name, for the remission of sins, I obeyed, taking his name and the Father's also. I then believed, and do now, that by so doing my position was changed from an alien sinner to an heirship through Christ to an everlasting inheritance among the sanctified. For many years I had no correct idea of how being in Christ was to make me Abraham's seed, and an heir according to God's promise, I being a Gentile. This is now more clear to me than when I first believed. In all this time I have learned many new things, but I cannot think it my duty to be baptized for every new view I get, as some in the RESTITUTION. I have been baptized once. I wish to know my duty, and obey. Married to Christ once, but never divorced.

Z. S. BRYANT.

MARSHFIELD, Oregon, Sept. 22.

The following is one of the letters referred to by Brother Bryant. We are fully aware that the letter was not written for publication, and that had it been it would not have reached us. But being so well acquainted with Brother Campbell, having heart him preach frequently, for years, and having been a student in school under him years ago, in North-western Missouri, we are satisfied that he will take no exceptions in us giving it publication. And still, in its publication, we have another object in view,—it is this: Brother Campbell, standing as a representative in the Christian Church, it reflects clearly the views entertained by that body upon the points mentioned, which we desire to bring before our readers. E. M. M.

BROTHER Z. S. BRYANT:

Dear Sir:—Yours of 16th ult. came duly to hand. A press of professional business has delayed the answer.

Many questions rise in the mind as we advance in our investigations, both in nature and revelation, which we are unable to answer. The finite cannot comprehend the infinite. Hence we must be content to receive the things which are revealed, and leave the secret things to the Lord our God. The profit or effect of being baptized into Christ is a change of relationship, constituting him an heir to all things, including the life that now is, and the life to come. I do not know what is the condition of the dead between death and the resurrection. There is not a word said about a man's being rewarded or not rewarded at death, and any discussion of such a subject must be the vaguest conjecture. Every lover of truth must regret to see the wrangling now going on about the conscious or unconscious state of the dead. The resurrection is clearly taught, but whether from a conscious or unconscious state of the spiritual nature of man is not revealed. My own opinion is that it will be from a conscious condition. Yet it is nothing but an opinion. If another is of opinion that it will be from an unconscious condition, why should I fall out with him; he can no more prove his position than I can mine. The only thing either has to rely upon is inference.

What shall immediately precede the millennial state I am unable to tell. The meek inherit the earth now; for they alone enjoy that peace and joy which is found in doing the will of the Lord as revealed, without annoying themselves over untaught questions. I know and care but little about eternal punishment. It was never intended to affect a righteous man. I have no more dread of hell than I have of the penitentiary. I do not intend to make myself a fit subject for either. Yet I know I could form such a character that it would be an act of mercy to be permitted to hide myself in hell from the gaze of the pure and the presence of God, who would be a consuming fire. As to whether the punishment shall be limited or perpetual, is with me individually a matter of little concern, since I do not propose to have anything to do with it. Yet I know that the strongest words in every language to denote perpetual, unceasing, and unending duration are applied to it. If it is not represented as eternal, then there is no language that can present that thought. To destroy does not mean to annihilate. Perhaps the word death is the more difficult to comprehend in its true import, and tends to more confusion than any other in the language. It effects not the elements of anything. It is the same in all kingdoms. It severs, or is the result of severing, the vegetable from the earth, the source of its life, or the spirit from God, the source of its life. But in no case are the primordial elements of the vegetable, animal or spirit changed. Nothing that has life in itself can die. It is only that which derives life from something else that is subject to death.

But our salvation, our life and bliss, does not depend upon these abstract questions. You will never find any man wise enough to solve all the difficulties you may encounter either in nature or revelation. We may say with Young, "The patriarch pupil may be learning still, and dying leave his lesson half unlearned." We must wait the great teachers—Death and God.

T. F. CAMPBELL.

MONMOUTH, Oregon.

Review of T. F. Campbell's Letter.

We desire to notice a few points in the above letter, and will take the liberty to do so, knowing that Brother Campbell will not think it any injustice to him.

1. He has well said: "We must be content to receive the things which are revealed, and leave the secret things to the Lord our God." In this we heartily concur, and ask the question, why do so many people teach that at death persons are carried immediately to Heaven, while the Bible never once mentions such a thing? But to the contrary Peter says of David, a man after God's own heart, as for David, we know that he has not ascended into the heaven. Paul says of David that he fell on sleep and saw corruption. Acts ii. 34; xiii. 36. Jesus says: "No man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven." John iii. 13. And to the apostles, "Little children, yet a little while I am with you. Ye shall seek me; and as I said unto the Jews, Whither I go, ye cannot come; so now I say to you."

2. "I do not know when the patriarchs will or did receive the promises." We suppose Brother Campbell here is to be understood as not knowing when the patriarchs will or did receive the things promised. Paul says they (the patriarchs) died, not having received the promises (the things promised) and that they were not perfected without the apostles and primitive Christians; Heb. xi. 13, 39-40. Jesus teaches that the reward is at the resurrection of the just. Luke xiv, 13-14. Peter teaches that the crown is to be given when the chief shepherd appears. 1 Peter v. 1-4. Jesus teaches that it is when the Nobleman returns. Luke xix. 11-27. Also that his reward is with him when he comes. Rev. xxii. 12. The apostles are to be rewarded when Jesus sits upon the throne of his glory. Matt. xix. 28. Jesus will sit upon the throne of his glory when he returns with his angels. Matt. xxv. 31-46. Then one may know the time when the faithful will be rewarded. The time is clearly revealed.

3 "I do not know what is the condition of the dead between death and resurrection," says Brother Campbell. But what does revelation say of the dead? Let the Bible speak for itself upon this point, for it puts forth no uncertain sound:

1. It describes Abraham, Isliuneal, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, and many of the ancients as yielding up the Ghost (for Ghost, Heb. Ipun, literally, breathed out) and being buried. Gen. xxv. 7-9, 17; xxxv. 29; xlix. 33; l. 20.

2. It describes a man as going to a land of darkness and the shadow of death, and a land without any order. Job x. 20-22.

3. Job desires to be hid and kept silent in the grave (grave comes from Heb., Sheol; Greek, Hades). xiv. 13.

4. Job says, man's rest is in the dust. xvii. 21-16.

5. David says, for in death there is no remembrance of God; in the grave (Hades) who shall give the thanks. Psa. vi. 5.

6. David says again: The dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence, (silence is from Hades). Psa. cxv. 17.

7. Again David says of man: "His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish. Psa. cxlvi. 4.

8. Solomon says; "The living know that they shall die; but the dead know not anything. Ecc. ix. 15.

9. Again: "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave (Hades) whither thou goest." Ecc. ix. 10.

As it is almost universally held by the Christian Church, that, not the body, but the spirit goes to Hades at death, we have confined our quotations almost entirely to texts where Hades in the Greek occurs that the condition of that which goes to Hades, whether it be body or spirit, may be seen. And that Hades where I have marked, is in the Greek, President Campbell is fully competent to test.

4. "There is not a word said about a man's being rewarded, or not rewarded, at death." This is well said: and we might add, neither is there a word said yea, or nay, about the reward being given at birth, at the age of fifteen years, or that of forty years, entirely another time being plainly taught, (see note 2) these periods of course are never mentioned.

5. "The resurrection is clearly taught, but whether from a conscious or unconscious state of the spiritual nature of man, is not revealed." This is admitting a great deal, a resurrection from a conscious state of the spiritual nature not revealed!! Why then the next sentence? "My own opinion is that it will be from a conscious condition." We ask, if the doctrine is not revealed in the Bible upon what can the opinion be founded? Evidently upon something outside of the Bible and independent of revelation altogether. Then we care not even so much as to ask of Brother Campbell upon what, or whose teachings his "opinion" is founded. It is of no concern to us; it is our business to stay within the limits of revelation. With revelation before us, our faith (not opinion) is that it is a resurrection from a state of unconsciousness. Evidence, note 3, quotations from 1 to 9 above, Job xix. 23-27; Psa. xvii. 15, and Ezekiel xxxvii. 1-10. Notice in verses 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, the spirit there breath) is not called back from Heaven, Hell, Tartarus, or Paradise, but from the atmosphere.

6. "The meek inherit the earth now." We reply that there are full one-half of the meek who have no landed or real estate whatever. And when the meek do inherit the earth that their inheritance is to be forever, and the wicked are to be cut off and rooted out. Psa xxxvii. 9, 10, 11, 18, 20, 22, 29, 34; Isa. lxv. 17-25; Amos ix. 8-15.

7. Brother Campbell upon future punishment says: "I know or care but little about it." Again: "Yet I know that the strongest words in every language to denote perpetual, unceasing, and unending duration, are applied to it." All this is correct, but it fails to meet the difficult point in the subject. Let us explain Scripture by Scripture, as Peter says, "No scripture is of any private interpretation." Then we throw side by side two texts. (Matt. xxv. 46). "These shall go away into everlasting (Greek aionion) punishment." Heb. vi. 2. "Not laying again the foundation of the doctrine of baptisms, and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and of eternal (Greek aionion) judgment."

Now are we to understand from the latter text that the work of judgment is to be in continuance through eternity, that Jesus will never get through judging humanity? Or, that the judgment once past is final, and from it to a higher court there is no appeal? So of the former text; that when once punishment is inflicted it is effectual, from it there is no recovery. Not that through eternity these persons are suffering the punishment any more than in the other case they are ever being judged.

But we have lengthened out our strictures long enough for one issue. More, and upon the subject of death next week.

G. M. MYERS.

Three More United to Christ.

It is with much pleasure that I am enabled to announce to the readers of the RESTITUTION the good news expressed in the caption of this article.

On Monday afternoon, Oct. 19, brother Thomas Wilson and the writer went to Oakwood, a suburban town south of Chicago, for the purpose of assisting three individuals to put on Christ by baptism, namely brother and Sister Rice, and brother Malone. Sister Rice is a daughter of our aged brother and sister Lewis, of Harvard, Ill., and no doubt their hearts will be greatly rejoiced at the step their children have taken.

Brother Rice has been an orphan from early boyhood, and was brought up by an uncle, a Methodist clergyman. His uncle has been much pained at thought that his nephew should so far depart from the faith of orthodoxy as to believe that eternal life is only through Christ.

Brother Malone is a neighbor of brother Rice, and has received much instruction from him

Monday was a very unpleasant day, cold and stormy. The winds for a few days pervious had considerably agitated the lake, the waves roared and plunged with tremendous fury rendering it almost impossible to perform the object of our visit to its shores. While performing the sacred duty, it several times carried us from our feet.

Sister Rice has been rather delicate for some time and her nervous system was much weakened thereby. As we approached the water she remarked, "I am naturally afraid of water, but I have no fear now." Her moral courage overcame the weakness of the flesh. I could but admire the courage of the sister and hope that she may be able to overcome every obstacle that may present itself in her Christian warfare.

"Sorrow-ston, my happy home!
My soul still pants to see;
Blest city! Through rude and stormy scenes
I onward press to thee."

That they may all successfully live the Christian life and finally gain the eternal rest is our earnest desire.

A Hymn of Judgment.

TUNE—Jesus I my cross have taken.

Righteous God, whose merciful visit
All our fears and thoughts exceed,
Big with woes and fiery trials,
Hanging, burning o'er our head;
While thou visitest the nations,
Thy selected people spare,
Arm our cautioned souls with patience,
Fill our humbled hearts with prayer.

If thy dreadful controversy
With all flesh is now begun,
In thy wrath remember mercy,
Mercy first and last be shown;
Plead thy cause with sword and fire,
Shake us till the curse remove,
Till thou com'st, the world's desire,
Conquering all with sovereign love.

By the signals of thy coming
Soon, we know, thou will appear,
Evil with thy breath consuming,
Setting up thy kingdom here:
Thy last heavenly revelation
These tremendous plagues forerun,
Judgment ushers in salvation,

Earth unhinged, as from her basis,
Owns her great restorer nigh,
Plunged in complicate distresses,
Poor distracted sinners cry:
Men, their instant doom deplorine,
Faint beneath their fearful load;
Ocean working, rising, roaring,
Claps his hands to meet his God.

Every lovely alarming token
More confirms thy faithful word,
Nature (for its Lord hath spoken)
Must be suddenly restored:
From this natural confusion,
From this ruined earth and skies,
See the times of restitution,
See the new creation rise!

Vanish from this world of shadows,
Pass the former things away,
Lord, appear, appear to glad us
With the dawn of endless day:
O conclude this mortal story,
Throw this universe aside,
Come, eternal King of glory,
Now descend and take thy bride.

Charles Wesley, 1788.

The Two Witnesses.

Allow me to make a few remarks upon this subject, through the columns of THE RESTITUTION. Not for the sake of controversy, but truth.

I have noticed several sketches in your paper, setting forth something new—new to me at least,—in trying to identify "the two witnesses" of Rev. xi. with Moses and Elias; and in the last No., Sept. 22, I saw another short article, calling Enoch and Elias "the two witnesses." Now, as I desire truth and nothing else upon this, let me offer a few reasonable objections to this interpretation, for I consider both wrong, for the following reasons:

1. It is symbolical language, as can be seen by the 8th verse, which reads thus: "And their (the two witnesses') dead bodies shall lie in the street of the great city, which spiritually, is called Sodom and Egypt, where also our Lord was crucified." Now, what literal city was our Lord crucified in? Not one. But we can see how he was spiritually crucified, as shown in Heb. vi. 6, which crucifixion is the same as that spoken of in Rev. xi. 8. By comparing Scripture with Scripture, we learn that it is further proven to be symbolical.

2. These two witnesses prophesy "a thousand two hundred and three score days," the same length of time that the holy city is trodden under foot (verse 2), which is forty-two months, prophetic time, or 1,260 years,—just the time that the Roman beast of chapter xiii. 5, had power to continue, and is in the past.

3. Immortal men cannot die. Enoch did not die, but "was translated that he should not see death," (Heb. xi. 5), and so was Elias. And I understand by this that they were immortalized, or how could they escape death? If they were mortal men after their translation, they were not out of the reach of death. Mortality signifies a state subject to death, liable to die, (from mors-death) and if these two prophets were in a mortal state, and subject to death, it could not be said that God took either of them so that he should not see death. If they are not mortal,—not subject to death—as is really the case—they are, unmistakably, immortal, and cannot die, and then this statement, "the beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit shall make war against them and shall overcome them, and kill them," (verse 7), cannot be applied to these! Or, will it be argued that God will bring them back to a mortal state again, for the purpose of having this Satanic monster triumph over those who have once overcome the devil and death? Let us be consistent, brethren, and let the word of the Lord interpret itself. It teaches that when a man shall have overcome the world and the devil and in consequence, changed from death to life, that he "dieth no more, death hath no more dominion over him," (I know that this is said of Christ, but we learn that he is a sample of the changed and can die no more, just because "death hath no more dominion over him;" which was the very reason that Enoch "could not see death.") And upon the same principle, Moses can not die again, unless he is to have a mortal resurrection, and that would prove that he is not Christ's, for Paul says that all the dead who are Christ's at his coming shall be resurrected to an immortal life, (see 1 Cor. xv. 23), and he is the first fruits of all them who sleep in [illegible] as a corollary they must be raised immortal, else he is not the first fruits! And if this point is established, those who bear this resemblance to him, "can die no more." Moses don't yet, but Enoch and Elias do.

With this view of the matter, then, those personages will not answer to the witnesses of Rev. xi. 3. But as we do not wish to darken counsel, or take away the key of knowledge, that is to rebuke an investigating spirit, we will try to offer a few suggestions upon it in the light of revelation. And will present them in all kindness, hoping they may be of benefit, if not to our brother, who has been searching for truth, probably, to some others. We do not boast of ability in this direction; no, no; but sometimes we may learn from the simple.

In the first place we learn by going to the context in Zechariah iv. 6, that these two witnesses are called "the word of the Lord," sent unto Zerubbabel, saying, "Not by might nor by power, but by my spirit, saith the Lord of hosts." They are called "the two olive trees" and "the two candlesticks" (in verse 4 of the 11th chapter), which stand "before the God of all the earth." And in Zech. iv. 3, we find the same two candlesticks and olive trees, brought to view, in which I think they are really symbolical. We notice that there is first one "candlestick all of gold with a bowl upon the top of it, and seven lamps thereon, and seven pipes to the seven lamps," and by this candlestick are placed the other two—the witnesses—one on each side; and of this symbolic arrangement we learn that the seven lamps do not represent seven literal lamps, but "the seven spirits of God." See Rev. iv. 5. Now, if the one is a candlestick, and bears the seven spirits of God, the other two being candlesticks—representing something which contains light—must possess like functions. As olive trees they pour their "oil into the gold" (candlestick), and thereby supply light. From which we can only learn that these two witnesses are instrumental in causing light to shine; for they furnish to the candlestick before the throne of God, that which makes light—oil, and this oil gives light through the seven lamps, which are upon the candlestick, thus forming in all its parts a perfect complication.

If, then, these seven lamps may be understood to be "seven spirits," or messengers of God, and the olive trees likewise representing that which causes these lamps to give light, I can conceive of no other meaning for them—the two witnesses—than the one given by the angel, that they are "the word of God." In the case here, in Zech. iv., it is "the word of the Lord unto Zerubbabel," and if "the word of the Lord," then unto him, why not apply with equal force now unto others, as "the word of the Lord," which would agree with the interpretation that the Old and New Testaments are the two witnesses. I know not whether this is correct or not, but I remark, that it looks like it. I am not writing to bolster up any theory whatever, but I want the truth. However two men can not answer to the two candlesticks here.

In the position taken by the brother, he thinks Elias has to first come, before we can look for Jesus. But, let us reason together out of the Scriptures upon this. In Malachi's prophecy (chapter iv.) we find that the Lord is to "send Elias before the great and dreadful day of the Lord come," and he is "to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children," etc., just the work allotted to John the Baptist, (See Luke i. 17,) "And he (John) shall go before him (Christ) in the spirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just, to make ready a people prepared for the Lord." By which the prophecy of Malachi is once fulfilled, and I do not see any demand for its repitition. And in further demonstration of this fact, we hear Jesus after he had come down from the mount of transfiguration, when asked by his disciples, why the scribes said that Elias must first come. Now, hear the answer coming from the Lord, "Elias truly shall first come and restore all things. But I say unto you that Elias is come already, and they knew him not, but have done unto him whatsoever they listed." * * * "Then the disciples understood that he spake unto them of John the Baptist." Matt. xvii. 10-13. But John says he is not the Elias, (John i. 21) and if he had not said so, I would as far as personage is concerned, for we know that Elijah was born many centuries before John the Baptist was; and it would be a preposterous notion to suppose that Elijah being born into the world once of natural parents, and after arriving at manhood, translated and changed from mortality to immortality, and then coming into the world again in the same manner that he did at first, by being born of a woman, making two natural births. No this is not according to reason or revelation. So that John the Baptist and Elias were not one in person. Well, then, how do you reconcile the sayings of Jesus and John? Very easily. We will let Luke do this. "He (John) shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elias." Chapter i. 17. This elucidation of the subject is, to me, very clear. In the capacity of reconciliation he was the Elias, as Jesus said, and not the individual person, as he said himself. Which really fulfills this prophecy once, and answers to the demand; unless it is insisted upon, that the fulfillment must be repeated, and we very seldom see this done. God never fulfills a prophecy the second time, because some people don't know that it was once fulfilled.

And in conclusion, Jesus never told us of any such sign, and He gives us signs clear down to his coming. After enumerating the events, all that should precede the advent, he says: "When ye see all these things come to pass, then know that the kingdom of God is near, even at the doors." Matt. xxiv. 33; Luke xxi. 31. Truly, if this prophecy concerning the advent of Elias were to be fulfilled preparatory to the coming of the Lord the second time, and it being an event of such vast importance, He would not, nor could not have left it out, and said that when all these other signs were fulfilled, to them expect the kingdom of God. No; but he would have said, "When all these things come to pass, then know that the coming of Elias is nigh at hand, and after he comes then know that the kingdom of God is nigh even at the doors." But he does not even intimate it, but on the other hand forbids its place among the other precursors by locating the last of them proximating his own coming. He says of the signs, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days (days of persecution upon God's elect) shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of heaven shall be shaken and then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven." Matt. xxiv. 29, 30. Which signs, excepting the last one, are all in the past, as has been witnessed. But whether they are in the past or not, is not material to the question, as we are only referring to the announcement, and not the fulfillment of them; and we believe that Jesus announced in this prophecy of consecutive events all the important and necessarily conspicuous signs of his near coming, which if he did, the advent of Elias can not precede that of Christ, and neither will it succeed it, because it is in the past, and needs not to be re-fulfilled.

L. C. KERR.

HIGHLAND CREEK, ONT.

In the Church.

"Behave thyself in the house of God." 1 Tim. iii. 15.

By the church here, I mean local a church; a body of Christians, uniting together to worship God. I believe in Christian fellowship, in church organization. It seems suitable that there should be such institutions. Man is a social being. He was not made to live alone. He seeks companionship. Having broken off from worldly attractions and associations, by embracing the hope of a coming kingdom, he now seeks for companionship in another direction. He desires to find a society whose faith, sentiments, and spirits, accord with his own. He cannot wander about from place to place. He must have a home somewhere with the people of God, where he can hear the gospel preached, and exercise his own talent for the salvation of others. Like attracts like. When a man becomes a Christian, he seeks Christian society. He says, with David, "I am a companion of them that fear Thee." These fall in with his new views, and hopes, and joys, and sorrows. These are now his fellow-learners, fellow-travelers, fellow-laborers, fellow-soldiers; yea, whosoever now doeth the will of his father in heaven, the same is his brother, and sister, and mother.

In association with those of like precious faith there is consolation. Among all the organizations, where men are brought under obligations to care for, and to sympathize with each other, none can compare with this. Christians love each other; not because they have taken secret oaths, nor because money is the motive that prompts them; but because the love is in them, and it flows out naturally and freely. Here there is sympathy, tenderness, long-suffering, brotherly kindness, charity. I am not speaking now of real professors, but of real Christians; and I know that there is no such love and consolation in any other institution, as among the true followers of the Lord and Savior.

Here is safety. Out in the world, away from religious influences, a person is exposed to temptations; is liable to suspicions, and may be drawn into some hidden snare of the enemy. We need the restraints of good society, the instruction and watch-care of those who love us. In Christian union and fellowship we have it. How many times have young converts gone to meeting sorely tempted and almost discouraged; but when some aged brother or sister arose and related their experience, telling how they had been tried, and how the Lord gave them the victory, the temptation was broken, and they have resolved that they would press on, and overcome every difficulty. All who have had any experience know that it is much safer to be united in Christian fellowship, to have some religious home, than it is to be floating about from one church to another, really anchored and settled nowhere. No doubt many to-day are living in a backslidden state because they were not united with Christians where they could have the watchcare and instruction which was needed.

Usefulness is a consideration which should not be overlooked. In union there is strength. If there were no organized bodies, no concert in Christian action, very little could be accomplished toward establishing truth in any community. When Christians have selfish interests, and side issues, the world laughs; but when they pull together, the world trembles.

Are you connected with any local church? Strive to promote unity among its members. Labor for its prosperity. Whatever your position in the church, fulfill the duties of that position as a Christian. Seek not the highest seat. Be clothed with humility. Be earnest, active, spiritually-minded. Keep wide awake. Pray for your pastor. Pity the poor; seek the erring; be punctual at the prayer-meetings. Profit by the preaching. "Be not wise in your own conceits." Behave yourself as one who must give an account.—J. T. Thomas.

The True Punishment Terrible.

From the beginning, we have taught and contended, that to a creature, the loss of life forever, after resurrection and judgment, is a sentence very terrible and greatly to be feared. We have said that the preaching of this as the alternative of salvation with eternal glory, is quite sufficient to arouse all whom it is possible to move by fear in a salutary manner, and that the additional horrors of everlasting blasphemy and misery, are not only untrue and injurious, but absolutely unnecessary.

Our opponents, however, have frequently denied us to our face, that there is anything horrible in eternal extinction, and that destruction of body and soul in Gehenna is so dreadful. Indeed they have affected at times that it is no punishment whatever; but that utter extermination is rather something to be desired by the wicked. They have professed to see nothing in the deprivation of certain men of the life which they now have in possession, and their incapacitation, by the righteous action of God, of a share in all the life which stretches away endlessly into the future. This, they appraise at nothing. The cutting off of the soul, and the loss of the life of the world to come, is nothing! Can it be? O, surely, it is only a theological perversity that makes men so talk.

When men realize what death eternal means, when the true natural feeling prevails, when they are no philosophers but men, then they feel that to lose the vital spark, and to be excluded the eternity to come, is an awful, inexpressible weight,—a doom to be shunned, a punishment to be escaped. Then "the death that never dies,"—not the sinner that never dies—becomes an oblivion that the soul shudders at, is wrath from which the creature seeks to flee.

At such times annihilation is truly dreadful, as punishment should be and is. When in such a frame of mind, Halyburton wrote as follows: "Annihilation is so horrible to human nature and has so frightful a visage to men who have a desire of perpetuity inlaid in their very frame, that none can look at it seriously without the utmost dread. I have been credibly informed that a gentleman of no contemptible parts, who had lived as if indeed he were to fear or hope nothing after time, being in prison and fearing death, fell to thinking seriously on annihilation. The fears of it had so deep and horrible an impression on his mind, that he professed to a gentleman who visited him in prison, and found him quite dejected, that the thoughts of annihilation were so dreadful to him, that he would rather think of a thousand years in hell."

To escape the loss of his life, and to be allowed to live on, we have here the case of a man who would be willing to endure a thousand years of such torment as is pictured in hell forever—if that were possible to humanity. And let us remember, that it was to such a class of men, of much the same state of mind as regards hope and fear, that the gospel first came with its glorious news of deathless life; or, as an alternative, the death that men dreaded, but after the judgment of the great day.

We have seen other cases, where thoughtful men, thinking over the true penalty of sin, have been alarmed at its dreadfulness, and have desired to have out of the fulness of the Son of God that virtue which, making them holy in this life, will secure to them the blessedness of those on whom "the second death shall have no power."

In spite of what some say, we believe all considering men must feel, that so dreadful a cutting off as God threatens to the wicked, is a punishment that will have great influence when it is properly and solemnly put. —Bible Echo.

The Raising of Lazarus.

Let us pause here to answer the not unnatural question as to the silence of the Synoptists respecting this great miracle. To treat the subject fully would indeed be to write a long disquisition on the structure of the Gospels; and after all we could assign no final explanation of their obvious difficulties. The Gospels are, of their very nature, confessedly and designedly fragmentary, and it may be regarded as all but certain that the first three were mainly derived from a common oral tradition, or founded on one or two original, and themselves fragmentary, documents. The Synoptists almost confine themselves to the Galilean, and St. John to the Judean ministry, though the Synoptists distinctly allude to and presuppose the ministry in Jerusalem, and St. John the ministry in Galilee. Not one of the four Evangelists proposes for a moment to give an exhaustive account, or even catalogue, of the parables, discourses, and miracles of Jesus; nor was it the object of either of them to write a complete narrative of his three and-a-half years of public life. Each of them relates the incidents which came most immediately within his own scope, and were best known to him either by personal witness, by isolated written documents, or by oral tradition; and each of them tells enough to show that he was the Christ, the Son of the Living God, the Savior of the world. Now, since the raising of Lazarus would not seem to them a greater exercise of miraculous power than others which they had recorded—since, as has well been said, no semitometer had been then invented to test the relative greatness of miracles—and since the miracle fell within the Judean cycle—it does not seem at all more inexplicable that they should have omitted this, than that they should have omitted the miracle at Bethesda, or the opening of the eyes of him who had been born blind. But further than this, we seem to trace in the Synoptists a special reticence about the family at Bethany. The house in which they take a prominent position is called "the house of Simon the leper;" Mary is called simply "a woman" by St. Matthew and St. Mark; and St. Luke contents himself with calling Bethany "a certain village" although he was perfectly aware of the name. There is, therefore, a distinct argument for the conjecture that when the earliest form of the Gospel of St. Matthew appeared, and when the memorials were erected which were used by the other two Synoptists, there may have been special reasons for not recording a miracle which would have brought into dangerous prominence a man who was still living, but of whom the Jews had distinctly sought to get rid of as a witness of Christ's wonder-working power. Even if this danger had ceased, it would have been obviously repulsive to the quiet family of Bethany to have been made the focus of an intense and irreverent curiosity, and to be questioned about those hidden things which none have ever revealed. Something, then, seems to have "sealed the lips" of those Evangelists—an obstacle which had been long removed when St. John's Gospel first saw the light.

The Sanhedrin met in a spirit of hatred and perplexity. They could not deny the miracle; they would not believe on him who had performed it; they could only dread his growing influence, and conjecture that it would be used to make himself a king, and so end in Roman intervention and the annihilation of their political existence. And as they vainly raged in impotent counsels, Joseph Caiaphas rose to address them. When Caiaphas rose, and with shameless avowal of a policy most flagitiously selfish and unjust, haughtily told the Sanhedrim that all their proposals were mere ignorance, and that the only thing to be done was to sacrifice one victim—innocent or guilty he did not stop to inquire or define—one victim for the whole people—ay, and St. John adds, not for that nation only, but for all God's children scattered throughout the world—they accepted unhesitatingly that voice of unconscious prophecy. And by accepting it they filled to the brim the cup of their iniquity, and incurred the crime which drew upon their guilty heads the very catastrophe which it was committed to avert.—Farrar.

The Single Eye.

The French philosopher D'Alembert, was once called on by a young man who brought him a novel demonstration of some problem in mathematics. When the work had been examined and approved, the young man said, "I have done this for the sake of having a seat in the academy." "Sir," replied D'Alembert, "with such dispositions you will never earn one. Science must be loved for its own sake, and not for the advantages it affords."

Hear what this skeptical philosopher saith, and let us, Christians, learn the lesson of single-eyed, simple-hearted, following of the truth,—of him who is himself the embodiment of all truth. There are many who believe that in seeking to "flee from the wrath to come," or to keep the commands of God, that they may entitle themselves through their obedience, to the rewards of heaven, they are doing all that is required of them. But the worship and the service that our Father seeks, is that of the heart and "in spirit," not for a reward.

There is a righteousness that exceeds the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees: and it is that of those who follow the Lord Jesus, not because of foreseen results or rewards, but of choice and heartily, "with good-will doing service." Such was the service of the Master "who for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross despising the shame."

Men say within themselves, "We have kept his commandments, therefore we shall have the reward." God says, "In the keeping of his commandments there is great reward."—The Wayside.

Influence of the Bible.

It was a noble and beautiful answer, that of Queen Victoria, the monarch of a free people, reigning more by love than law, that she gave to the African prince who sent an embassage with costly presents, and asked her in return to tell him the secret of England's glory. The beloved queen sent him, not the number of her fleet, not the number of her armies, not the account of her boundless merchandise, not the details of her inexhaustible wealth. She did not, like Hezekiah, in an evil hour, show the embassador her diamonds, her jewels, and her ornaments, but handing him a beautifully bound copy of the Bible, she said: "Tell the prince that this is the secret of England's greatness."

In our own beloved land, the secret of our national greatness may be traced to the influence of this blessed, this God-given book. It is said that the first liberty pole ever erected in America was erected by the people of Massachusetts, and that they surrounded it with an immense pile of Bibles. No wonder that the people of that grand old state have always been the champions of liberty.

The act of Congress in 1777, providing for the importation of Bibles, evidently has had much to do with our national greatness. The influence of the Bible on men's hearts and lives more fully displays the power of the Bible. The seeds of truth may spring up long after being sown.—Christian Record.

The Corruption of the Romish Priesthood.

Miss Emily B. Gould, writing from 107 Via Babuino, Rome, gives this account of clerical morals in the "Eternal City:"

"My lot has been cast for nearly fifteen years under the shadow of the Vatican, and I know how deep and baneful is that shadow; that if slavery has destroyed its thousands, Vaticanism has ruined, soul and body, its tens of thousands. I know that so corrupt are the highest in clerical dignity in this city that decent women will not live as servants in the house where they visit, because they fear their outrageous insults. I know that an ecclesiastic, who has stood for years on the steps of the Papal throne, neither knows nor cares how many children he has. That their name is legion he and everybody else here knows. I know that a young American girl who was copying in the Vatican had her rights disputed by an Italian woman, who based her pretensions on the simple fact that she was a cardinal's plaything. I know that a Roman artist of distinction was condemned to long years of poverty because his wife would not break her marriage vow for one of these same red-petticoated corrupters of society. I know—what do I not know of the horrors of this church here, in its center, in the shade of its head?"

THE RESTITUTION,
Plymouth, Indiana.

Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the "rod of iron" of which, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a heavily belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Communications.—The Editor must not be understood as endorsing all the sentiments expressed by correspondents whose articles are inserted under this head. Each writer is alone responsible for the article bearing his own signature. If the teaching of any writer is not endorsed, an article setting forth the views of the party differing may be forwarded. Free discussion of Bible doctrine on all sides will be allowed, but the Editor reserves the privilege of criticising those communications which antagonize a belief and obedience of the Gospel as a means of salvation, or which undermine its principles.

The One Baptism vs. Three Dips.

"Baptizing them unto (Greek eis) the name of the Father, and the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." Matt. 28:18. "Keep the ordinances as I delivered them unto you" (1 Cor. 11: 2), "for the time will come when they will not endure the sound teaching, but according to their own desires will to themselves heap up teachers, having itching ears; and they will turn away their ears from the truth, and will turn aside to fables." 2 Tim. 4: 3, Bible Union. "See that thou make all things according to the pattern." Heb. 8: 5.

Bapt-izo, Βαπτίζω, is a Greek verb of the first person, singular number, active voice, and means I baptize i. e. immerse. It is derived from bapt-o, which means I dip. Carson with great research has written a portly volume on baptism, and he says, "Some have alleged that the termination ize makes baptizo a diminutive; but utterly without countenance from the practice of the language. Others have erred as far on the other side, and equally without authority make baptizo a frequentative. The termination ize has no such effect on either class as these writers suppose; and the history of the word, both in sacred and classical use, justifies no such notion." p. 18. Bapt-izo in the infinitive mood is bapt-izein, meaning to "immerse, immerge, submerge." And "Webster's High School Dictionary" says that the syllable ize in English is from the Greek izein, and is "A termination of verbs from the Greek, or of verbs formed on the same model, and denoting to make, to cause to be, to become;" as equal-ize, to make equal; civil-ize, to cause to become civil. Hence if we take the adjective bapt-os which means dipt, and turn it into the verb bapt-izo or bapt-izein, we have a word which means to make or cause one to become dipt or baptized. Thus we see that bapt-izo in its religious use carries with it the idea of some permanent and abiding moral effect, for although baptized over twenty years ago, the result has not ceased for I can still say that I am or have become a baptized man. The relationship into which that baptism brought me still abides upon me.

In speaking of the purifications, or dippings under the law, which were transitory in their effect, and had to be often repeated, we find that bapto and not baptizo is used in the Old Testament. Lev. 4: 6-17; 9: 9; 11: 32, (instead of "put into water," it is literally "dipt into water," bapto being used); 14: 5, 10, 51. In some of these places we find bapto connected with an action to be done seven times—"dip his finger in some of the blood and sprinkle it seven times." Ruth was invited to "dip (bapto) her morsel in the vinegar," an act often repeated during the meal. Ruth 2: 14. And Nebuchadnezzar after many drenchings or soakings from the heavy oriental dews during seven years, was said to have been "wet" (baptō) by the dews of heaven Dan. 5: 21.

We do not find, however, that baptizo is used one, and I think only once, in the Old Testament (Apocrypha excepted) where Naaman dipped baptizo himself seven times in Jordan. 2 Kings 5: 14. And this was the proper word in his case, for the effect was permanent, and he did not have to repeat the dipping a short time after, but so far as we know was permanently cured of his leprosy. Coming to the New Testament we find that baptizo is mostly used, and that baptizo occurs but three times, and is never applied to the gospel act of baptizing. "Dip the tip of his finger." Luke 16: 24. "When I have dipped it." John 13: 26. "Dipped in blood." Rev. 19: 13. This is according to the Greek concordance.

We infer from these facts that neither bapto nor baptizo contains in itself the idea of repeated dippings; but where the context points out repeated dipping, the word bapto seems to be used in preference to baptizo. A writer says that in reference the various purifications under the law, that bapto is used, "but in speaking of the continual repeating of these things, Paul used baptizo. Heb. 6: 2: 9: 10." This however is a great mistake, for Paul used the noun baptismos, and not the verb baptizo in the two verses referred to, also in Mark 7: 4, in reference to washing cups, etc.

It is claimed that baptizo is a frequentative word, and means "to dip repeatedly, or to dip often." But the English word glutton is frequentative in its nature, and does not mean one who three times in his life eat too much, but one who is continually from day to day eating too much. Should we be continually getting dipped as a religious ordinance! It is claimed that four lexicons define baptizo, "to dip repeatedly," while scores of lexicons do not give it this meaning." Were they all divinely inspired men who wrote the lexicons, we would say that there is no conflict here, and that the four only tell us a little more of the truth than the others. But none of them are inspired, and since the others certainly must claim to have given the full and complete definition of the word, we may conclude that the four have given more than its full and complete meaning. If a three dipper should have a bill presented to him by a large mercantile firm purporting to be a full and complete statement of his account, and certified to by "scores," i. e. at least 40, of the merchant's employees, that he owed $100, would he be so ready to accept the opinion of four of those employes who would say that the proper bill instead of being $100 was $300? But neither of these "four" lexicons gives "to dip repeatedly" as the only meaning of baptizo, but rather as one among a number of meanings. Thus by Liddell and Scott says, "Baptizo, to dip repeatedly, dip under, to bathe, to steep, to wet, to pour upon, drench, to dip a vessel, draw water, to baptize," Bretschneider, "properly, to dip in frequently, to bathe frequently; thence (1) to bathe, wash simply; (2) to immerse into water, to submerge."

Donnegan, "to immerse repeatedly into a liquid; to submerge; to soak thoroughly; to saturate."

Passow, "(1) to immerse often and repeatedly; to submerge; hence to moisten, wet, water; (2) to draw water; (3) to baptize, mid., to bathe one's self, to wash."

Now it is a well known rule that when a word has more than one meaning we must select that meaning which will best suit the context. The word chorizo means "properly to feed or fill with grass, herbage, etc., as cattle;" but it is also of persons and means "to satisfy with food, fill, satiate, satisfy the eager desire of any one." And hence in Matt. 5: 6, we translate it "filled" in its highest and best meaning, as the context requires. Now we are not left to our own uncurbed and willful fancy as to which meaning we should select for baptizo as the religious use of that word. We are pointed to the right meaning by the unerring finger of inspiration. Indeed so plainly has the Bible defined this word that if it could not be found at all in lexicons, we might easily discover that, so far as water is concerned, it means to immerse, and not repeatedly, for the symbols or patterns under which baptism is described, afford a complete and sure definition of it. And whatever may be the common meaning of the word, that meaning must in its religious use, be analogous to, and modified by these defining symbols.

These patterns or symbols are five:

1. The birth of an infant, "born of the flesh,"—once, John 3: 5.

2. The planting of a seed in the ground—once, Rom. 6: 5.

3. The burial of a dead body in the grave—once, Rom. 6: 4; Col. 2: 12.

4. The resurrection of a dead body from the grave—once, Rom. 6: 5; Col. 2: 12; 3: 1.

5. The deluge of water over the world—once, 1 Pet. 3: 21.

And to make assurance doubly sure, as to the "one baptism," it is to act in a great constellation of once and declared to be "one baptism," or as the American Bible Union translates, "one immersion." Eph. 4: 5.

The Bible abounds with types and symbols of instruction. Indeed a great part of the Mosaic law (that great schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, Gal. 3: 24) was "a figure." Greek, parabola. Heb. 9: 9.

On that memorable day when John directed his disciples to follow the greater than John, what more expressive or impressive words could he have used than "Behold the Lamb of God." John 1: 29-36.

Baptism is a solemn command, and a sacred duty, and to make it plain to every comprehension it is hedged about with symbolic illustrations that render it almost impossible for an unprejudiced mind to mistake its meaning. Were the words of John any less important for his having used the symbolic expression, "the Lamb?" Were the great truths of the gospel as preached by the blessed Savior, any less obligatory and important, from being spoken under the pattern and symbols of the beautiful parables which he uttered? So too the varied symbols used to explain baptism to us, only serve to increase our estimate of the legal and binding force of the ordinance.

Three dippers admit that baptism is the "form of doctrine" in Rom. 6: 17. But of what doctrine is it the "form" or "type?" for that is the Greek word which Paul uses—tupos. As one act is a beautiful form or type (in being "born of water"), of our entering upon a new life of purity and holiness as the innocent babe in the one act of birth enters upon its young life. Here the great doctrine of conversion and moral regeneration is aptly and vividly set following the heavenly pattern pointed out to us by the Savior himself, when he compared baptism to being "born of water."

As one act is a vivid form or type of that doctrine which teaches that in the waters of baptism we "wash away our sins" and leave them behind us, as the old grain when planted is left behind to rot in the earth. And as the new germ springs up from the earth, so the person baptized arises from the baptismal waters "a new creature in Christ Jesus," to bud and blossom in all "the beauties of holiness."

As one act, it is a type or picturing forth of our faith in the great doctrine that Christ died for our sins, and was buried, and was raised again from the dead. It also shows our faith in the doctrine that even if we die and are buried, we "shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day." These are essential doctrines fully worthy of being shown forth in "form" or "type" at the very beginning of the Christian life. And since baptism points to the resurrection morning, we see that not the Lord's supper only, but baptism also, is an ordinance that will "be fulfilled in the kingdom of God."

As one act, it symbolizes our putting off our former evil ways, as the earth by the one deluge put off its wicked inhabitants, but if we return to the same course of life, we will bring upon ourselves at least that fiery indignation which will devour the adversaries.

Let us go again over these five great symbols, each one of which is like an inspired lexicon given to teach us the meaning of baptizo. These symbols are bulwarks of defence for the "one immersion," and against such bulwarks the arrows of tradition and sophistry, shot from the bows of the three dippers, rattle harmlessly and in vain.

1. "Born of water" (Greek, ek hudatos ex hudatos, out of water). No sophistry can prove that a child is more than once born into the world in the natural way, and yet that one emergence into the world ushers him into all the varied relationships of this life. Why dwell on such a plain subject when we know so well that it is not to be "the second time," and the anguish is to be remembered no more in the case of any infant ever born. John 3: 4; 16: 21. The birth of Spirit, I think, will be one act also, and will take place after approval, so that the "mortality" in them "may be swallowed up of life," and when they come forth "out of the midst" of that "great cloud" they will be "living creatures," and not dying creatures as now. And they will have "the likeness of a man" which I suppose to signify "the Man Christ Jesus;" for "when we see him we shall be like him," and he will fashion our bodies "like unto his own glorious body." This birth of Spirit is illustrated, I suppose, Ezek. 1: 4-5; see also 2 Cor. 5: 4-10; 1 John 3: 2; Phil. 3: 21. "Then indeed a righteous nation will be raised in a day."

2. The planting. This symbol, like that of birth, is world-wide, and ought to be understood by all. "Planted together in the likeness of his death." The word death here evidently includes the whole of his death-state while in the tomb, as the prophet says, "He made his grave with the wicked and with the rich in his death." He was not with the rich in his death, except while in the tomb with Joseph. Isa. 53: 9; Matt. 27: 57-60. We plant a seed out of sight once, and let it remain in the ground, and see no more of it until the new sprout appears above the ground. This is true among all nations and in all ages, whether it be a grain of wheat, or corn, or whether it be a grape seed or an acorn that produces the mighty oak. So that we may say, "doth not nature itself teach" one immersion? The sower requires "deepness of earth" for his seed if he would raise a successful crop. Matt. 8: 5. What theory of baptism can find fault with these facts of agriculture but a theory brought to such straits as to be already defeated, whether it be a three-dipping or a no-dipping, but simply a sprinkling theory.

3. Burial. This, too, is a familiar symbol. We bury our dead once, and even that is the act of a short period, and contrending duties pertaining to this life. Sometimes indeed as exceptional cases, persons have suffered that anguish twice when they had to disinter their dead from some battle field, and transfer them to the family cemetery. But this exception proves the existence of the rule. "Burial, the interment of a deceased person; an office held so sacred, that they who neglected it have in all nations been held in abhorrence." Enc. Religious Knowledge. "The Romans in the most ancient times buried their dead. * * * Under the Empire burning was almost universally practiced, but gradually discontinued as Christianity spread. * * * The Greeks believed that souls could not enter the Elysian fields till their bodies had been buried." Smith's Dict. of Gr. Ro. Antiquities. As for the Jews, we know that burial was understood and practiced among them, from the time that Abraham buried Sarah until they bought the potter field to bury strangers in. Paul in writing to his Christian brethren used a word current among them, and therefore they must have understood him when he talked of a burial, for he declares that he used "great plainness of speech." How could they have known what was meant by the burial of Christ, unless they had known the meaning of the word bury? They certainly did not understand that the body of Christ had been burned to ashes. His burial was among the first great truths that Paul proclaimed everywhere he went. 1 Cor. 15: 4.

Bible vs. Geology.

By some Christians, the science of geology is considered, in its nature and teachings, semi-infidel. The science of astronomy, at first, shared the same treatment. Many very worthy persons array their notions of Bible teaching against science. The truths and facts of nature have God for their author as certainly as the truths and facts of Revelation. The Bible is God's second volume; nature is his first. When properly understood, they harmonize perfectly. Apparent contradictions arise from the want of properly understanding the two volumes.

Christians, uninformed in science, assume the age of the earth to be about six thousand years. When, therefore, the geologist gives the earth a much greater antiquity, he is accused of teaching principles subversive of the Bible and is called an infidel. Others, in attempting to harmonize the teachings of geology with such a youthful world run into very great absurdities. The error is in assuming that the Bible teaches the earth's age, and that that age is about six thousand years. I study both volumes, teach both books, and believe both volumes to be of Divine origin, and harmonize in all their parts and details.

Does the Bible teach the age of the earth? If so, I should be pleased to learn where. Each volume carries within itself the evidence of its own age, but neither that of the other.

The Bible has its chronology; so has the earth. What, does the Bible profess to teach relative to the age of the earth? Nothing. Does it not say, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth?" It does. But it does not say when the beginning was. It declares who created the earth. It did not come by chance, nor create itself.

It might have passed through a thousand epochs before it reached the state described in the second verse of Gen. i. But as man has nothing to do with those changes, they are left out of the second volume, but fully recorded in the first. The second volume does not repeat the facts and truths of the first volume; it simply asserts God to be its author. To learn the age of the earth, we must consult its own chronology.

At the beginning, this earth was much smaller than at present, as we learn from its stratified exterior. The thickness and age of these strata are learned from geological teachings. Commencing at those strata lining the fiery gulf, and ascending to the surface and noticing the internal evidence as we pass outward, we ascertain with some degree of accuracy, the length of time for the formation of each stratum to the surface of the earth. By adding these periods we are at the probable age of the earth.

The first verse of Genesis covers those ancient geological eons and not included in the six days, creation, or putting up of the earth. The six days describe the fitting and furnishing the earth for man's home.

What strata have been formed since the creation of man? Take our own country. Where I reside, we have ancient mounds. These mounds have no traditional history. They extend back to very great antiquity; and, yet, the drift era is more ancient than the age of man.

We do not pretend to say that strata are not now forming, or, that man is not older than some limestone—sandstone formations; but is man as old as the Potsdam sandstone? Geology divides the age of the earth into five parts:

1. Azoic time—which includes the earth in its infancy, before it became the home of any living organism. How long this period continued is not revealed, as it is without any chronological data.

2. Paleozoic age. The ages of the most ancient forms of life, divided into Silurian, Devonian and Carboniferous ages.

3. Mesozoic time. Including the age of reptiles.

4. Cenozoic time. Or mammalian age.

5. The Era of Mind. By examining one of these ages, we can form some idea of earth's great age.

Take, for example, a part of the carboniferous ago—the coal measures. These formations are alternated by shales, sandstones, limestones, fire clay and iron ore. Of these, in a vertical section of six hundred feet, I can count seven horizons of stone-coal, fifteen horizons of shales, eleven horizons of limestone, eight horizons of iron ore, and ten horizons of fire clay—in all 51 horizons.

By horizons we understand that each stratum, as deposited from and under water (except the coal measures) and then elevated above water forming for a series of ages the surface; the surface then sinking under the surface of an ocean, and remaining there till another formation was deposited. To form so many horizons, there must have been nearly the same number of elevations and subsidences. In Nova Scotia there are 80 strata or horizons of stone coal.

All these are confined in Ohio to six hundred feet, and yet, the thickness of all the strata of the earth's crust are 254,000 feet. Facts teach us that the first volume gives the history of our globe—through many epochs—each epoch, extending over many centuries.

If we study both volumes with a view to make them harmonize, we shall become much wiser and better.

Siloam.

A little way below the Jewish burying-ground, but on the opposite side of the valley, where the Kedron turns slightly westward, and widens itself considerably, is the fountain of the Virgin or Um-ed-Derej, near the beginning of that saddle-shaped projection of the Temple-hill supposed to be the OPHEL of the Bible, and the Ophlas of Josephus. At the back part of this fountain a subterraneous passage begins, through which the water flows, and through which a man may make his way, sometimes walking erect, sometimes stooping, sometimes kneeling, and sometimes crawling, to Siloam. This conduit has had tributaries which have formerly sent their waters down from the city pools or Temple-walls to swell Siloam. It enters Siloam at the north-west angle; or rather enters a small rock-cut chamber which forms the vestibule of Siloam, about five or six feet broad. To this you ascend by a few rude steps, under which the water pours itself into the main pool. This pool is oblong; about 18 feet broad, and 19 feet deep; but it is never filled, the water either passing directly through, or being maintained at a depth of three or four feet. The present pool is not the original building; it may be the work of crusaders perhaps even improved by Saladin, whose affection for wells and pools led him to care for all these things. Yet the spot is the same. This pool, which we may call the second, seems anciently to have poured its waters into a third, before it proceeded to water the royal gardens. This third is perhaps that which Josephus calls "Solomon's pool," and which Nehemiah calls the "King's pool" (ii. 14). The expression in Isaiah (viii. 6), "waters of Shiloah that go softly," seems to point to the slender rivulet, flowing gently, though once very profusely, out of Siloam into the lower breadth of level, where the king's gardens, or royal paradise, stood, and which is still the greenest spot about the Holy City. Siloam is a sacred spot, even to the Moslem; much more to the Jew. It was to Siloam that the Levite was sent with the golden pitcher on the "last and great day of the feast" of Tabernacles; it was from Siloam that he brought the water which was then poured over the sacrifice, in memory of the water from the rock of Rephidim; and it was to this Siloam water that the Lord pointed when He stood in the Temple on that day and cried, "if any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink."—Dr. William Smith.

Caiaphas.

Joseph Caiaphas, son-in-law of Annas, was appointed high-priest by the Roman procurator about 27 A. D. He held the office during the whole administration of Pilate, being deposed 36 or 37 A. D. Under the Roman Government high-priesthood, originally an office for life, was filled by creatures of the Roman court, who were appointed or removed at the pleasure of the Roman governor. In one hundred and seven years there were twenty-seven appointees. It was perhaps with reference to this degeneracy of the office that John describes Caiaphas, with delicate sarcasm, as high-priest for that year. It was Caiaphas who counseled the arrest and execution of Jesus, and who subsequently presided at his trial; and it was before him that Peter and John were carried after the miracle of healing at the beautiful gate of the Temple. Of his history subsequent to his deposition nothing is known. At the time of Christ the priesthood was generally filled by Sadducees, who alone affiliated with the Romans, and both Annas and Caiaphas appear to have belonged to this sect, the unbelievers of Palestine. Both are spoken of as high-priests, a fact which has given rise to some perplexity. The probable explanation is, that while Caiaphas held the office he was really controlled by his father-in-law, who had formerly been high-priest and seems to have retained the title, and, in some measure, the power of that office, which was held in succession by five of his sons.—Abbott.

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.

☞"We now have on hand a quantity of Bibles and Greek Concordances which we have just received from H. L. Hastings. Our brethren east can obtain these books from Boston cheaper than we can send from here. Those who live in the Middle States or in the west can order of us. Almost any style of a Bible can be obtained at fair rates.

Meetings in Ligonier.

We spent last Sunday with the people of Ligonier, a thriving town located on the Michigan Southern Railway, about twenty miles from Goshen. The religious community is composed principally of Disciples, Methodists, Lutherans and United Brethren. During the last summer the Seventh Day Adventists have been stirring up the people, and a ving unto the people that it was needful to "keep the law," or they could not be saved. A number of the citizens became bewildered with their sophistry, and this brought out more or less excitement upon the general question. By a special invitation from J. B. Stoll, editor of the National Banner, we visited Ligonier and presented the Bible view of the Sabbath question. This invitation was extended to us last June, but the pressure on our time has been so great that we could not arrange to go until Sunday last. Brothers Daniel and Platt McDonald, and sisters Thompson and Dickson, went with us and added much to the interest of the meeting by their excellent singing. The people turned out liberally to hear what we had to offer upon the Sabbath question; and we believe that we do not overstate the matter when we say that the great majority of those present were perfectly satisfied that the reasons offered by the Sabbatarians for keeping the seventh day are without foundation in the word of God. A goodly number of intelligent persons, who had doubts on the subject, expressed themselves as settled. We took up Mrs. White's visions and showed from them that she admitted that all honest First Day Christians would be saved who died previous to the year 1844. And yet she professes to believe that Sunday keeping is the mark of the Beast. Eld. Lane, the Sabbatarian preacher, was present, and took notes. The reading of Mrs. White's visions was not very satisfactory to his mind, there being some points brought out which made the whole subject look ridiculous in the minds of the people. On the whole we feel highly gratified with our visit at Ligonier and with the happy results attending it. We formed many pleasant acquaintances, which we shall always hold dear. During our sojourn we enjoyed the kind hospitalities of Mr. and Mrs. Stoll, and Mr. and Mrs. Fleming. May the truth of Christ bless, guard and keep us all for that eternal rest which shines before us in the kingdom of peace.

One More Ascended.

On Thursday morning, Oct. 7, the Rev. Thomas Ryder, pastor of the Stoney Street Baptist Church, Nottingham, England, passed into the Higher Life at the house of Prof. C. E. Stowe, Hartford.

So writes Mrs. Stowe in a recent number of the Christian Union. This is a fair specimen of the way men and women speak about persons dying. The spiritualists put obituary notices under the head of the new birth, while orthodox Christians call death the "higher life." Death came by sin, therefore, sin opened the way to the "higher life." According to this view the "higher life" is merely soul-life out of the body. Further on in the same article Mrs. Stowe says, when speaking of Mr. Ryder's death: "The next morning he was found, as in a tranquil sleep, with a smile upon his face; from the dream of life he passed away to the reality of heaven." This tells the whole story. Heaven is obtained without any resurrection and without a body. The naked spirit is in bliss and the body in the grave. How striking is this language in contrast with Paul, who gave an obituary notice of the Patriarchs: "These all, having obtained a good report through faith, RECEIVED NOT THE PROMISE; God having provided some better think for us, that they without us should not be made perfect." Heb. xi. 39, 40. For if the dead rise not, then is Christ not raised; and if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ ARE PERISHED. 1 Cor. xv. 16-18.

Mr. Ryder, according to Mrs. Stowe, is now in heaven: he got there through the gate of death, and was in no way dependent on the resurrection which Paul declares to be a NECESSITY. It is to be regretted that men and women will thus ignore the plainest doctrines of the Bible, and offer as a substitute for the resurrection the heathen dogma of going to heaven at death. But the true light is breaking in many minds, and it will not be many years before we shall see all Bible men using Bible language, when speaking and writing on these questions.

Mrs. Stowe commits another mistake when she says that Mr. Ryder ASCENDED. This squarely contradicts Peter's testimony about David: "For David is NOT ASCENDED INTO THE HEAVENS." Acts ii. 34. See verse 29.

Language like the above forever puts at rest the idea that men go to heaven at death. The resurrection, and not death, is the time when we shall gain the "higher life," when this mortal shall put on immortality and death is swallowed up in victory.

An Open Sea.

Dr. I. I. Hayes, the great Arctic explorer, has recently written a letter to the New York Herald, in which he claims that there is an open sea at the north pole. In concluding his letter he says:

Let us hope that the same fate may not be in store for the English ships Discovery and Alert, even although they do not carry the American Eagle to a quarter where Americans only have penetrated. Their chances seem to me to be exceptionally good. And of this we find evidence in the fact that comparatively little ice was encountered in Baffins Bay by Pandora. This is due to the great prevalence of northerly winds during the past spring and winter. One result of this is the great danger in navigating the North Atlantic on account of icebergs lying off the banks and in latitudes where ever seldom seen before. They are a product of the Greenland glaciers, and being formed of snow upon the land are fresh, sometimes rising 300 or 400 feet above the surface of the sea, and are seven times deeper beneath. They present broad surfaces, often a half a mile to the wind, and are driven rapidly to the south when the wind prevails long from the north. The field ice follows the same direction, and hence the North Atlantic has this season been unusually crowded with ice, while Baffin's Bay is free. And I still believe as I have always believed since my first voyage thereto, that near the pole there is an open navigable sea in summer; that it may be reached by ship or boat by way of Smith sound, and that the north pole is within reach of any nation that will spend money enough to get to it.

A number of Bible scholars have been of the opinion for years that there is not only an open sea at the north pole, but many contend that beyond the great ice range there is a land of surpassing beauty and fertility. Who knows but what another new world will be discovered beyond the glittering cities of icebergs and snow-clad hills.

Theology.

Theology is a word derived from the Greek. It is compounded of the two primitive terms θεος, God, and λογος, discourse; and θεολογια, theologia, etymologically signifies a discourse upon God. A fuller explanation defines the word: "The science of God and divine things; or the science which teaches the existence, character, and attributes of God; his laws and government, the doctrines we are to believe, and the duties we are to practice. Theology consists of two branches, natural and revealed. Natural theology is the knowledge we have of God from his works, by the light of nature and reason. Revealed theology is that which is to be learned only from revelation."

Theology is, and ever must be, the sublimest subject upon which the human faculties can be employed. Revelation, in lofty diction, ascribes creation to God; it is the first inspired utterance of the Book of books. "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth," is a sentence that, perhaps, for embodying the most meaning in the fewest words surpasses any other expression ever written. "Lift up your eyes on high, and behold who hath created all these things, that bringeth out their host by number; he calleth them all by names by the greatness of his might, for that he is strong in power; not one faileth." Isa. xl. 26.

The astronomer, with his accurately formed, and nicely adjusted instruments, and his subtle and infallible mathematical analysis, learns the mechanism of not only these lower heavens with which our system is connected, but he also resolves the immensely distant "isles of light" into systems, and systems of systems of astral glories, that are voced in the praises of God. The resolution of the white galaxy, to which the solar orb, that pours forth its ocean of splendor, is attached as a mere unit star, becomes in the observer's telescope a "heaven of heavens." Countless millions of suns and systems compose this milky zone; yet this is only one lone stratum of the distinct, and far-sundered, "island universes" that make up the amazing whole of God's creation.

A German poet, contemplating the grandeur of creation, soars off on the wild wings of imagination in the following strain of descriptive imagery: "God called up from dreams a man into the vestibule of heaven, saying, 'Come thou hither and see the glory of my house.' And to the servants that stood around his throne he said, 'Take him and undress him from his robes of flesh; cleanse his vision, and put a new breath into his nostrils; only touch not with any change his human heart—the heart that weeps and trembles.' It was done; and, with a mighty angel for his guide, the man stood ready for his infinite voyage; and from the terraces of heaven, without sound or farewell, at once they wheeled away into endless space. Sometimes with the solemn flight of angel wing they fled through Zaarahs of darkness, through wildernesses of death, that divided the worlds of life; sometimes they swept over frontiers, that were quickening under prophetic motions from God. Then, from a distance that is counted only in heaven, light dawned for a time through a sleepy glut; by unutterable pace the light swept to them, they by unutterable pace to the light. In a moment the rushing of planets was upon them; in a moment the blazing of suns was around them. Then came eternities of twilight, that revealed, but were not revealed. On the right hand and on the left towered mighty constellations, that by self-repetitions and answers from afar, that by counterpositions built up triumphal gates, whose architraves, whose arch-ways—horizontal, upright—rested, rose—at altitudes by spans—that seemed ghostly by infinitude.

Without measure were the architraves, past number were the arch-ways, beyond memory the gates. Within were stairs that scaled the eternities below; above was below—below was above, to the man stripped of gravitating body; depth was swallowed up in height insurmountable, height was swallowed up in depth unfathomable. Suddenly, as thus they rode from infinitude to infinitude, suddenly, as thus they tilted over abysmal worlds, a mighty cry arose—that systems more mysterious, that worlds more billowy—other heights and other depths—were coming, were nearing, were at hand.

Then the man sighed, and stopped, shuddered, and wept. His overladen heart uttered itself in tears; and he said, 'Angel, I will go no farther. For the spirit of man acheth with this infinity. Insufferable is the glory of God. Let me lie down in the grave and hide from the pre-occupations of the infinite; for end, I see, there is none.' And from all the listening stars that shone arose and issued a choral voice. 'The man speaks truly; end there is none that ever yet we heard of.' 'End is there none?' the angel solemnly demanded; 'Is there indeed no end?—and is this the sorrow that kills you?' But no voice answered that he might answer himself. Then the angel threw up his glorious hands to the heaven of heavens, saying, 'End is there none to the universe of God. Lo! also there is no beginning.'"—Planetary and Stellar Worlds, pp. 287, 288. O. M. Mitchell.

Well might the Psalmist say, in contemplating the perfections of God, that "Great is our Lord, and of great power: his understanding is infinite," when he reveals to us that "He telleth the number of the stars; he calleth them all by their names." Psa. cxlvii. 4, 5.

Revealed theology declares that God spread abroad the heavens with all the grandeur of their shining constellations; that he upholds them by the word of his power; that he enthrones himself in the amazing amplitudes and infinitudes of boundless splendor.

Natural theology can only borrow the language of revelation and respond: "The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament showeth his handiwork."

Revelation spoke of the "ordinances of heaven," and of the "sweet influences" and "bands" that tie the constellations together, thousands of years before Newton and Laplace demonstrated the theory and laws of gravitation in their world-renowned productions—The Principia, and Mecanique Celeste. Copernicus and Kepler have immortalized their names, the one by unfolding the true system of the universe, and the other by demonstrating the laws of elliptical planetary motion, but revelation long ago declared that God "hangeth the earth upon nothing," and that earth and heaven both continue "according to his ordinances." The Bible knows of no chains that bind the orbs and systems of the universe together, but the "sweet influences" that the great Creator has impressed upon them to guide, direct, and control the whole. Philosophy has given these concordant attractions the name of gravitation.

The nature, character, and attributes of the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, are revealed in his word: and the "Word of the Lord will abide forever." The great book of nature, too, reveals the Creator: and this is an eternity-enduring volume. The word and the works of the Lord will forever glorify him. Earth will one day speak the glories and goodness of God to heaven, and the heaven of heavens will respond in glad acclaim.

What though to solemn silence all
Move round this dark terrestrial ball?—
What though no real voice nor sound
Amid their radiant orbs be found?
In reason's ear they all rejoice,
And utter forth a glorious voice;
Forever singing as they shine,
"The hand that made us is divine."

Christ's Words vs. Man's Words.

One writer affirms, without giving a text to sustain the assumption, that the Sodomites had abundance of light, that Lot warned and instructed them. Will the writer, referred to, give us one thus saith the Lord, for this bold assertion? The text does not occur to our mind in which it is declared that Lot warned or instructed the Sodomites. Adultery and fornication were the chief sins of the Sodomites. Did Lot teach by precept or example the sin of adultery and fornication? Did he teach by precept or example the virtue of purity? He taught by precept and example the reverse. He even offered his own daughters for purposes of prostitution, and subsequently was guilty of incest with his own daughters. In his commercial transactions he maintained his integrity to truth and justice, while they bought and sold for unrighteous gain. But as far as purity and chastity were concerned, his moral status was very low. Noah was a preacher of right doing, but we have no evidence that Lot preached at all. And if the destruction of the Sodomites was a finality, then God did just what he told Abraham he would not do, viz.: to destroy the innocent with the guilty, for it will not be claimed that the infantile portion had "abundance of light, or was warned, or guilty. The adjective eternal, qualifies fire, not suffering. Fire is an eternal element. Everything that has been destroyed by fire, and which remains under its power, is suffering the vengeance of eternal fire. The vengeance of fire is to destroy combustible substances. The temple of Jerusalem is suffering the vengeance of eternal fire. Does this prove that it will never be restored? The same is true of Jerusalem, and will not both Jerusalem and the temple rise phœnix like from their ashes, and shine in eternal excellency? Yet the Bible as clearly and illuminatingly teaches the restoration of the Sodomites as it does the restoration of the Jews and Israelites. In Ezekiel xvith chapter, the prophet presents three sisters, Jerusalem, Samaria and Sodom. The idea that this prophecy was confined to three literal cities is preposterous. Was the literal city of Jerusalem led away into captivity? Did these literal cities commit whoredoms, and have multitudes of harlot children? Or did the people represented by these cities, commit these crimes? Was the district of country adjacent to Sodom and Gomorrah destroyed by fire? Is this land all that is represented by the harlot daughters of Sodom? To restore the daughter of Sodom, according to one writer, is simply to restore the land about this ancient city to its former fertility. To restore the daughters of Jerusalem and Samaria, according to another writer, is simply to restore these cities to their former glory. Thus the two elder sisters represent two literal cities, and the younger sister represents a district of country. One of these writers figures away the restoration of the Jews and Israelites, and the other figures away the restoration of the Sodomites. To be consistent, the latter must make the same application of the two younger sisters that he does of the older sister. These three sisters are to be restored at the same time and evidently in the same manner. The restoration of these three sisters will be either literal or figurative, which? If the resettlement of the land of Sodom by other people will fulfill the prophecy relative to the elder sister, then the resettlement of Palestine and Samaria by Turks, or any other people, will fulfill the prophecy in reference to her younger sisters. There is no avoiding this conclusion. These two writers agree in the eternal banishment of the oldest daughter, notwithstanding, the prophet declares that her sins were not half as heinous as those of her adulterous sisters. By the same rule of interpretation, Dr. Field, and most Advent expositors figure away the restoration of Jews, Israelites and Sodomites. The two writers referred to in the foregoing take precisely the same position that P. T. Russell took in his debate with me at Old Union. They are so afraid that all will have a fair chance that in a little while they will give nobody any chance at all, except the few who will have happened to hear the Gospel antecedent to Christ's coming and the resurrection of the righteous. THE WORDS OF CHRIST VERSUS THE WORDS OF MAN.

Christ. "Verily I say, unto you, It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for that city." Matt. x. 15. x. 15.

A more flagrant perversion of Christ's language never was made. Christ says that "It shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for this city;" thus carrying all the parties named forward to a future judgment. He not only waives the force of the future tense of the verb which carries the Sodomites forward to a future judgment, but substitutes the past tense of the verb which carried them away back into the history of the past, and has these predicted judgments inflicted two thousand years before the Savior uttered the prophecy; thus reversing the order of events and having the prophet foretell past events. By this flexible rule of interpretation all future events may be crowded back into periods antecedent to the time they were foretold: thus effectually dispensing of Christ's coming, a future kingdom and the resurrection as well as a future judgment. It tells what Christ means. Who authorized him to tell us what Christ or any other inspired writer means? If they did not mean what they said, who is qualified to tell us what they did mean? Words are the signs of ideas. Wave or destroy the meaning of words and they become powerless to teach or prove anything. We record our protest against all such tampering with the language of Christ or any other inspired writer. The aid of no translator is invoked, because there are none to sustain such daring perversions. Desperate must be the cause which demands such desperate means. What language could Christ use to divide the future rising up in judgment of the Sodomites if that which he did use does not clearly express such an idea? But few men understand the force and meaning of words better than the subject of these criticisms. He admits the full force of the future tense of the verb, but claims a necessity for transposition and substitution of other words of very different significations from those used by Christ. "Just and unjust" in plain English are simply just and not just. The Latin word an is the equivalent of the English adverb not. All are either just, or they are not just. If non-resurrection is the penalty of sinning without law, what is the reward of obeying without law? It must be a resurrection. Did God appoint the death of infants because of malformation? Is the death of infants of divine appointment? Were they included in the condemnation.

Conference Report.

Some of the readers of the RESTITUTION may desire to know something of the conference held at Jamestown, Mich., the last week of August. Allow us to say that a goodly number of brethren and sisters met together, and exhorted each other in view of "the approaching day." The whole of Saturday forenoon was spent in a conference of great interest. The spirit of union and love prevailed over all sectarian influences. Brother Willcox did the preaching, which was very instructive and acceptable. He was employed to labor as evangelist in the state as he may be able. The churches wishing his services should correspond with him.

By request I attended a conference on the 8th inst., at Raisin, Mich., in the neighborhood of Brethren L. H. and Artemas Chase. It was a conference of churches in that vicinity. The brethren docks at Rome Center, Morenci, and Clayton, were represented by good and true men and women. The preaching consisted of a series of discourses, each one preparing the way for the other. The great doctrines of the second coming, resurrection and kingdom, with their practical effects were proclaimed to good and attentive congregations. There was an unusual attention of Quakers and others to hear the word. There was nothing to mar the harmony and interest of the meeting. Christ, the prophets and apostles preached through God's servants. There were no "hobbies," and none to ride them. There was no "business," organizing or reorganizing to use up the brief time, that was devoted wholly to the spiritual welfare of those present. All seemed to derive benefit from the exercises of the meetings. The church at Raisin, under the pastoral care of the Bros. Chase, comes as near being a model church as any in the state. They have a convenient house, which they talk of enlarging, for the better accommodation of extra meetings. In manners and harmony they are probably not excelled. They have a well trained choir of singers, with a good leader. The truth was sung as well as spoken, and with good effect. As a church, they seem "compacted" together by the word and not by creeds of men. They are of "one mind and judgment" in reference to "the exceeding great and precious promises of the Bible." Every first day, they meet for breaking bread and worship, and in connection each member contributes as the Lord has prospered, carrying out literally the apostolic teaching. Thus is kept on hand a considerable fund to help the poor brethren everywhere, and for evangelical purposes. They propose to hold frequent conferences for mutual benefit, in that vicinity. Nearly all who will attend them, could not travel an expensive journey to attend a conference in distant parts of the state, yet they need the benefits of those assembling together. The Lord be with them and make them a light in all that region. Brother Watkins did good service in expounding the Word. Yours in the bonds of the gospel.

Correspondence.

The following letters we give a place in our columns. We are satisfied that there are hundreds of others in the Christian church who are almost educated to the point where they will leave and walk out into the full light of the truth and of the Gospel:

WILSON, PURCE & CO.—I came across an old copy of the RESTITUTION, some time since which I like very much. If it is still published, please send me sample copy, as I would like to subscribe the next year.

A few good tracts would be very acceptable.

I hold membership with the Disciples, but do not believe in their sky kingdom, immortal soulism and a great many other isms, to which they adhere.

Yours in the hope of immortality.

PETERSBURG, Va.

BRETHREN:—I have been examining a few copies of the RESTITUTION and am well satisfied with it. My attention has been directed to the the principle subject treated in it for some time and I have been preaching some upon it and the more I investigate the Word the more am I convinced of the truth concerning the glorious restitution. I wish therefore to take it for three months and if I still approve its general sentiments will renew. I should esteem it a privilege also to send an occasional article.

ELDER E. A. MATSH.

CLARKSVILLE, Iowa, Oct. 21, 1875.

"The Coming Man."

It is something over forty years that I have been a tolerably diligent reader and competent judge of what is going on in the world. But if this expression, which is now so common, is not of comparatively recent date, it has entirely escaped my observation, and I should be indebted to any reader of the Record who could date it very far back.

If this is the case, then men have recently begun to turn their eyes towards some one who is coming—some particular one—some great one—some one who is to do some great things above and beyond any thing ever yet done—perhaps put an end to all strife and corruption and abuses of all kinds—drive sin and sorrow from the earth and bring man back to the state in which God created him; such a man would be worth looking for.

Now there are one or two curious things to be noted in this connection; just such a state of things obtained more than 1,800 years ago. All men were looking for and talking about the "Coming One," and, finally, one appeared whose course seemed to show that He was something more than man, so that on various occasions the question was put to Him "Art Thou the Coming One?" And He clearly admitted that he was, especially when he rode in triumph into Jerusalem and permitted the multitude to proclaim before Him "Blessed be the Coming King."

Another fact in this connection: No sooner had this Coming Man disappeared, having ascended in a cloud to heaven, than it was announced that He "shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go."

Now, lastly, some think, and the number is increasing that the Coming Man is this very same one who is to come the second time, and no more as far as we are told;—that He is to come suddenly—as a thief in the night—that when He comes there will be no time to prepare to receive Him—that those who are not ready, whether in the church or out of it, will be great losers.

These views are confirmed by what is said of Him in the closing pages of Scripture where he is repeatedly spoken of as He "that was, and is, and is to come;" i. e. "The Coming One." or, "The Coming Man," the very same expression used concerning Him before his first coming.

These things being [illegible] whenever we hear or read of the Coming Man, should we not say to ourselves, "Be ye also ready," and heartily add "Even so, come, Lord Jesus?"—Foundlings Record.

What's the Use!

(Dedicated to S. E. Wilcox).

What's the use of singing over
All those old and time-worn songs?
Singing still at morn and even,
Nothing but those old, old songs?
What's the use of reading over
That old Book a hundred times?
Like as children read their stories,
Or repeat their childish rhymes?

Ah! the soldier springs to battle
To the arm he loves so well.
'Tis the old and time-worn marches
On a soldier's heart that tell!
And he loves when home returning
Still to drill the old ans o'er,
Thinking of the glorious mem'ries
That each war-tune holds in store.

And it is the old old banners
That the victor soldier loves;
Chosen colors of his country
That to deeds of valor move.
Emblems these of freedom, glory,—
Storied fields of battle won,
Tokens of an honored service,
Duty well and bravely done.

And the same old flag protects us
'Neath a far and foreign sky:
Show its colors on the ocean,
Save your speed the armed fleet by.
All the wide earth knows the symbol,
Knows the hidden strength behind,
That broad emblematic banner,
Binding States, as hand to hand.

And the Bible is our ensign,
It goes with us through the war,
We have fought beneath its colors,
Shown its glorious lines afar.
It in many a siege has saved us,
Lighted all our toilsome way,
Throwa its sweet protection o'er us,
Safely guided day by day.

Ah! that strange and quaint old banner
Key of life and key of fate!
Lamp and chart and compass to us,
Door to joy's enduring state.
How we love its blessed pages,
So unlike the flags of Thor!
Foil on bold for cycled ages,
Leading man to bloodless war.

Emblem of the King who sent it,
Of the service we are in,
Of our blessed heavenly country,
And the glories we may win.
Not an earthly monarch knoweth,
What that banner shall unfold,
When its soldiers all are victors,
And are wearing crowns of gold!

Can we? can we now desert it?
From the scoffing foeman flee?
Lay the old books in our closets
When so near the victory?
No! we'll sing the songs of Canaan,
Read the Bible o'er and o'er,
Till within the blessed kingdom,
We are anchored evermore!

Review of T. F. Campbell's Letter Continued—Death.

We would not continue the review of bro. Campbell's letter further, were it not for his remark upon the subject of death; a subject so much mystified, and around which there seems to be more of the sectarian mazes collecting.

Upon the subject of death bro. Campbell remarks:

"Perhaps the word death is more difficult to comprehend in its true import and tends to more confusion than any other in the language."

We ask why is it that this word is not well understood? We reply, simply because there is a theory taught concerning man's nature that must be sustained at all hazards, and to sustain that theory a definition of the word death entirely foreign to the teachings of the Bible and daily observation must be sought.

Again he remarks: "Nothing that has life in itself can die. It is only that which derives life from something else that is subject to death."

All this we concede to be correct. But the question now arises, Where, aside from Deity, is this independent life found? Does the so-called immortal soul or spirit possess it? If so, then let us look at some of the conclusions which must necessarily follow:

1. That the so-called spirit with life, and the functions of life—some of which are thought, reason and consciousness—has existed along with Deity from eternity.

2. That these pre-existent spirits must have some locality in which to dwell.

3. And as we have no knowledge of our pre-existent state, a veil intervening between that state and the incarnate, may not a veil intervene between the incarnate and the disembodied?

But who aside from the spiritualists are willing to follow the ancients into these wild speculations, which aside from the silence of the Bible upon them, bear inconsistencies upon their face? But to such inconsistencies must one be driven who takes bro. Campbell's view.

Let us look again. Then, if the so-called immortal spirit has not from eternity possessed these functions, there must have been a time when it began to possess them; when it began to think; when it began to reason; and when it became a conscious being. Therefore it must have derived these functions from some source. Hence not an independent but a dependent life; and therefore according to bro. Campbell's remark is subject to death.

Now it is held, if not entirely, almost universally by those upon bro. Campbell's side of the question, his own brethren included, that death is simply a separation from that which gives life. Then, with this definition before us, separate the so-called spirit from that source from which it obtained thought, reason and consciousness, and necessarily these functions of life will be at an end; just exactly the condition reached which Webster defines as death primary:—"That state of a being, animal or vegetable, but more particularly of an animal, in which there is total and permanent cessation of all the functions, when the organs have not only ceased to act, but have lost the susceptibility of renewed action."

This is just the death taught in the Scriptures wherever the word occurs; and that it was death natural, literal, physical, and primary pronounced upon Adam—the federal head of the human family—for the violation of the law given, we believe from the following reasons, viz:

1. It is a universal law in language, necessarily so, and without one single exception, that all words when first introduced are used in their primary sense.

2. Adam could have understood the word in its primary sense, having witnessed death primary; see Gen. iii. 21, but in no other.

3. From the significancy of the term life standing antithetically to the death, as a qualifier of the term tree—tree of life. That tree of life was not placed in the garden to sustain moral life needs no argument whatever, but to sustain physical life, enabling Adam to overcome the principle of decay and death implanted naturally in his system. This much it would have done, even after his transgression, could he have had access to it; see Gen. iii. 22-24. Adam evidently was 1, constitutionally subject to decay and death; 2, without transgression, a pauper—the tree of life—was furnished him; and 3, by transgression, and for transgression this panacea was removed and he was thrown back upon his original condition, with the principles of decay resting naturally in his system to work out their course—death.

4. Our fourth reason for believing the death pronounced upon Adam a physical death, a literal death, and death primary, is from the sentence pronounced upon him for the violation of the law. There are a few points here in the history worthy of our attention for awhile.

The man formed or made in God's image (not necessarily of the same material) in Gen. i. 26, is the same man whose nature and make-up we have described in Gen. ii. 7; vi. 3; 1 Cor. xv. 47. The same man to whom the law was given. Gen. ii. 16, 17. The same man that violated the law, iii. 6. The same man that hid himself; that God visited; against whom God brought the accusation; that pleaded guilty; and upon whom the sentence was pronounced, "dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return." Gen. iii. 19.

Civilly, when a law is given, and for the violation of that law a penalty is annexed, and the law is violated, the violator is arraigned, tried, found guilty, and the verdict rendered, it is expected that the sentence will specify plainly the manner of the execution of the penalty. If it is a criminal case, and murder in the first degree, and the penalty says death, then the sentence read out by the court must specify the manner of the death—and say whether the party is to be shot, stoned to death, burned at the stake, drowned or hanged. Just so in Adam's case. Not a single word said about a moral death; not a single word said about a spiritual death; not a word said about the popular definition of death, Webster's tenth meaning of the word—"separation or alienation of the soul from God;" but death by a return to the dust from whence he was taken.

To this, the plain, the practical, and the common sense view of the subject of death, there is not a single Scripture to the contrary. But to make good this last affirmative it might be well enough to briefly notice a few texts in the apostolical writings.

Then first we will notice those which refer to Adam's death. In 1 Cor. xv. 21-23, we have the death introduced by Adam and the life to be introduced by Christ placed in contrast. Is the one moral death? If so, the other is moral life. Then, as is generally done, give the broad application to the language of verse 22, and we have a universal resurrection or restoration to moral life. And in verse 23, in order for Christ to become the first fruits moral condemnation must have rested upon him. Again, if moral death be the death in kind, it follows from the expression "they that are Christ's at his coming," that none can be made morally alive until Christ returns to earth. But this view upon this Scripture is too absurd, and needs to be pressed no further.

Next, to the second and only other allusion to Adam's death, is in Rom v. 12, which reads as follows: Wherefore as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for all have sinned: (Margin—in whom all have sinned.)

To this Scripture, with a great deal of confidence our opponents rally as the bulwark of their position. But that they are wrong upon this, we are led to believe from the followi g considerations:

1. We are informed that death is a separation, and in this case a separation from God.

2. That this separation is caused by sin.

3. Then the apostle says sin is a transgression of law.

With these points before us it follows, then,

1. That in the absence of law there can be no transgression.

2. That where there is no transgression, there is no sin.

3. That where there is no sin there is no moral separation from God, and consequently no moral death.

To be brief, then, those who lived from Adam to Moses were not under law, had no law to condemn their actions; their actions remaining uncondemned were not imputed to them (not set to their charge,) therefore they could not have died a moral death. But the death introduced by Adam did reign over them; verse 14. Therefore, that death must have been other than moral separation from God. It must have been physical death; death primary.

The next Scripture that demands our attention perhaps is, 1 Jno. iii. 14, which reads: "We know that we have passed from death unto life because we love the brethren." The question now arises, what kind of death is referred to here? We answer physical death,—death primary. Jesus said in John iii. 18, "He that believeth on me is not condemned; but he that believeth not on me is condemned already. Simply, by reason of relationship to Adam the death penalty—condemnation to death has passed upon all—but by believing upon Christ, by obeying Christ and by loving Christ's disciples one has the promise of a restoration from the power of that penalty, as the Rheims version expresses Jno. x. 28. "And I give unto them (my sheep) eternal life, and they shall not perish forever," and again Jno. xi. 26. "And whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall not die forever." The death then overcome, was natural or primary death triumphed over by faith and promise, and the life referred to, was the prospective life from the grave, the relieving, by a resurrection, living as a child of God, See Luke xx. 36. "And are the children of God, BEING the children of the resurrection." The next text in order is Ephesians ii. 1. The above remarks upon 1 Jno. iii. 14, are directly in place here.

Next, Matt. viii. 22. "But Jesus said unto him (a disciple) follow me; and let the dead bury their dead." To paraphrase this text, let those who rest under the unexecuted penalty of death bury those upon whom the penalty has been executed. The death in each case is the same in kind, death primary. And so of the woman who lived in pleasure, and was said to be dead while she lived. Like the criminal who has been arrested, tried, condemned and had the sentence of death read to him in which it is specified that in one year he shall die, is said to be dead though alive. He is dead in law, and when the law is carried out and the force contained in the word death is spent upon him, it brings him to that condition described by Webster, and by God to Adam. G. M. M.

Gleanings.

Sister Sarah Greenour, of Lowell, Ind., says:

I can not very well do without the RESTITUTION. I am contending for the faith, but am almost alone here. I talk to the people in the churches and out of them concerning "the hope of the fathers." A few discourses here would, I think, do good.

Bro. Hooper, of Nemeha, N. J., writes us of the history of a RESTITUTION. He says:

BRETHREN:—It may interest you to know the history of one of your papers after leaving your office. The only copy I know of taken in Nemeha is taken by Brother D. H. Tichnor. He has kindly given it to me for about eighteen months, and we call it the best paper that comes into our house. We do not throw it down carelessly after reading it, but keep it moving, and finally give it to Bro. Lee, who sends it to his parents at Coventry, England, who, he says, are glad to get it.

Brother Nelson, of Warren, Illinois, writes:

I cannot get along without the RESTITUTION, if I have to let all other reading matter go. I love the paper, and must try and take it as long as I can get it. I cannot get a chance to go to our meetings very often, but am a firm believer in the Gospel as preached by Christ and the apostles, and my wife, who died upon the 18th of June last, was a firm believer. Oh! what a happy time it will be when we can all meet to part no more. May the time soon come. May we have on the breast-plate of righteousness so that we may be accepted of him who is to be the King of the whole earth.

Your brother in the Gospel,

E. O. NELSON.

Brother Amos Sanford writes of his labors as follows:

Monday, Oct. 11.—Yesterday I spoke to a few persons in the city hall at Anna, Ill., and at night I had a fair congregation of intelligent free-thinkers. Hereafter I am to hold meetings three times on the first Sunday in each month. Prejudice is strong, and with the Methodists, Baptists, Catholics, German Reformers, Lutherans, Presbyterians, Thomas Paine Infidels and Spiritualists all working against the truth, it is difficult for one poor soul like me to make much rapid progress. Pray, brethren, for the success of the word at this place, and that the Lord may add to the church such as may be saved.

My family are not yet recovered, but the doctor thinks I may leave them with safety, and I go to-night to St. Louis again to hold a series of meetings.

Brother Asa N. Rice of Chelsea, Province of Quebec writes: I have been here two years striving to spread the truth among the people. The sword of the spirit is dividing houses and causing a great hurricane among the divines. They burn and destroy my tracts and papers when they meet with them, and threaten putting me out of the country; yes even threaten death to me. But thank God I am yet alive and testifying to old and young concerning my Master. There are some, however, like King Agrippa, almost persuaded to become Christians. But when the seed is sown then comes along an enemy which sows tares. I think that could some good speaker who could declare the whole counsel of God come this way and speak for us that good could be done.

Brother Smith of Severance, Kansas, after renewing his subscription writes: I expect to make the RESTITUTION a regular visitor to my humble home as long as I live, or till the Lord comes and calls us to a more important work in the redemption of humanity. The work of the Master in this vicinity is not very encouraging; the seeds have it nearly all their own way, and because iniquity abounds the love of many brethren waxes cold. Brother Orum is away most of his time preaching. He is a very able speaker and ought to be kept in the field all of the time, and better supported than he is; but all of the brethren that have the cause at heart I suppose do all they can; and that there are now, and always will be nominal members in all classes of society, is as much a melancholy fact to-day as it has been for a long time in the past.

Yours in hope,

J. D. SMITH.

SEVERANCE, KAN., Oct. 12, 1875.

The following letter brother H. Oatman, of Eagleville, Mo., has sent us from his son for publication, thinking it would be of benefit to some as an item of news and also a source of gratification:

DEAR PARENTS:—I arrived here to-day in company with uncle Clement Oatman and others of the brethren. I withdrew from the clerk's office more than a month since, and went from Plano to Center Point, Kerr county, where uncle Clement was delivering a course of lectures, after the close of which I went to Hickory Creek, Blanco county, where cousin B. F. Oatman is now living, and came from there here. Four obeyed at the close of the lectures at Center Point, making about seventeen who have obeyed since July 1. Uncle Clement spoke forty-one hours at Center Point all included. I also delivered four short lectures there, and four at Hickory Creek, the subjects of which are as follows: 1. The Gospel, it is about the blessedness of nations. 2. The natural body, and the spiritual body compared—the natural body being a "living soul"—the spiritual body being material and tangible 3. Where will Christ reign, and where will the saints be rewarded? 4. The subjugation of the nations by Jesus Christ and the resurrected and immortalized saints, or the kingdoms of this world are to become the kingdoms of the Deity and his Anointed, who shall reign with the saints for a thousand years, when death will be destroyed, and the whole world will be filled with the glory of the Lord, God being all and in all, thus ending the creation, he seeing the end from the beginning.

Uncle Clement listened to the last, and pronounced it satisfactory. I will send you the substance of the second lecture when I get time to write it off. Uncle Clement is to deliver a course of lectures here. I shall also lecture as opportunity presents itself. We think we will get a large hearing. At the close of the lectures here, I shall go to Center Point, and from there to Plano, where I will remain only a few days.

S. H. OATMAN.

The following letter from a brother in Arkansas is an item of interest and information. The brother says:

In reply to your interrogations, there is a small congregation of disciples in my neighborhood, near Donaldson Station, on the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern railroad, about fifty miles southwest of Little Rock. We have occasional preaching by elder D. F. Salley. I desire place his name in the RESTITUTION on the list of public speakers (Midway P. O.)

Yours in hope,

JAMES R. HAM.

Errata.

BROTHER REED:

Please correct a verbal error of the printer in my article, in your issue of Oct. 13th: Article "Worthy of Death, No. 3." The word erroneously printed is "totem," an Indian word equivalent to "fetich," and means an idol or symbol of divinity.

The word "token," which is three times substituted for "totem," hardly makes sense.

Also, the lectures of Dr Manning, which are in his book entitled "Half Truths and the Truth," instead of "Holy Truths," &c.

Your Brother,

A. W. BUTTON.

Jesus of Nazareth Passeth By.

What means this eager, anxious throng,
Which moves with busy haste along;
These wondrous gatherings day by day?
What means this strange commotion, pray?
In accents hushed the answering reply:
"Jesus of Nazareth passeth by."

Who is this Jesus? Why should he
The city move so mightily?
A passing stranger, has he skill
To move the multitude at will?
Again the stirring notes reply:
"Jesus of Nazareth passeth by."

Jesus! 'tis he who once below
Man's pathway trod, 'mid pain and woe;
And burdened ones, who sought he came,
Brought sight unto the blind, and lame,
The blind beheld to hear the cry:
"Jesus of Nazareth passeth by."

Again he comes! From place to place
His footprints we can trace.
He patient sits at our threshold—nay
He enters—condescends to stay.
Shall we not gladly raise the cry:
"Jesus of Nazareth passeth by?"

Ho! all ye heavy laden, come!
Here's pardon, comfort, rest and home.
Ye wanderers from a Father's love,
Return, accept his proffered grace.
Ye troubled ones, there's grace nigh—
"Jesus of Nazareth passeth by."

But if you still his call refuse,
And all his wondrous love abuse,
Soon will he sadly from you turn,
Your bitter prayer for pardon spurn.
"Too late! too late!" will be the cry,
"Jesus of Nazareth has passed by."

Questions and Criticisms for the Public.

A correspondent of a popular monthly in an article headed—I Shall Be Satisfied—says:

"Fallen as we are, the cravings of our immortal nature cannot be satisfied with less than full perfection."

Question 1. If God is immortal by nature, and therefore divinely self-existent, and not subject to change, or creature complaints, as a result, can a creature, yea, a fallen creature that craves full perfection, be immortal by nature? And if the imperfect creature is immortal by nature, why does not the same nature produce the same results in the one being as in the other—viz: exemption from change and creature complaints. If the results are not the same, is it not an indubitable evidence that the nature is not the same, but that the creature is by nature a craving, dying and perishable being, on probation for, and to be rewarded with, an imperishable, undying, self-existent, divine and immortal nature as the gift of God, to reward the faithfulness of his loyal creatures, or otherwise not possessed? So at least it seems to me, in spite of the reproach that follows the truth.

Question 2. Does the immortal nature of the Deity render him absolutely perfect, and yet the same immortal nature in man be conscious of sorrow, want and its cravings not satisfied with less than full perfection? Or, in other words, is not the immortal nature a divine, holy and absolutely perfect nature, whether in God, angels or men? And if not in the latter class of beings, where is the certainty that either angels or men shall ever be happy, holy, and absolutely perfect, even in the eternal future? Or will length of time and duration of years change the unchangeable, divine and immortal nature of the divine being which inherently possesses no principle of alteration? And if so, who can tell what may happen in the eternal future even to God, the universe, angels or saints? If under any circumstances the immortal nature of the self-existent and divine being, whether existing in God as the divine giver, or in his creature as the divine gift, is liable to change or imperfection, then woe to the future; for the prospect is gloomy. But if to attain the divine nature, as the result of faithfulness in a life of mortal probation, is also the attainment of an absolutely perfect, holy and unchangeable nature, viz: the immortal nature, then the glorious future looms up with distinct brightness, immortal life, and endless felicity, and presents itself to the believing mind as an object to be sought for, and also attainable by a patient perseverance in obedience to Jesus Christ, only through his redemption from death and the grave, by the blood of his atonement. And if the immortal nature is coherent with the atonement as a gift of reward to the obedient only, then it is not coherent with human conception, or the original creation of man—unless a gift of reward at the judgment, and inherent nature are the same; which I presume no one will affirm. For notwithstanding some claim that rewards are given and judgment is executed at death, I know of no one who affirms that judgment is executed and rewards given at creation, conception, or birth. And if not, then the immortal nature is either not a gift of reward, or else it is not coherent with human nature in mortal probation, then no thanks to the atonement for the redemption from death of that which could never, no, never die.

Chautauqua, N. Y. this Season.

BY O. F. HENSHEY.

The grounds have been greatly improved this season. Many new cottages of beautiful and artistic design have been erected, and everything in the management evinces a lovable mind in its conception, and a master hand in execution. Hundreds of white tents are set all through the grounds. The first thing the eye falls upon on nearing the dock is a correct specimen of an oriental house, with court, chambers upper rooms, and flat roof, with harems, beds, divans, curtains, and persons in Eastern costume, reclining or engaged in the usual domestic affairs of the East.

The lower story is a grand bookbazaar, where every needed help for Sabbath school workers or Bible students, maps of the holy Land, with chromos and all the requisites for normal class work are shown in great perfection.

Just a little farther to the right is the famous Park of Palestine, on a scale of two feet to a mile of horizontal distances, and a foot to 400, vertical measure, from data found on the map of Von de Velde and the ordnance survey of the British Government. This miniature park, last year, was the educator of many thousands who found through this object lesson a better acquaintance with the entire location of all the cities towns, seas, mountains, lakes, and rivers, so interesting to the Bible student, and necessary in teaching the lessons in the Sunday school. Better facilities are given than by an actual visit to these Bible lands, because the eye takes in the whole scene, and fixes the locality of the important places.

As I write, not less than fifteen hundred persons are standing on the mountains and treading the valleys of our Palestine, while Van Lennep, the Turk, in Eastern costume, with shepherd's crook in his hand, is giving a lecture illustrating Bible scenes and the customs incident to the country.

This may be witnessed every day at 4 o'clock. Throngs gather with ever-increasing interest. The model of Jerusalem, which is one three-hundredth of the size of the original, is surrounded at all times with a crowd who linger to view the mosques, synagogues and temples of this walled city of olden time, and as one stands on the brow of the hill, he is, in thought, carried back 1800 years ago, when Jesus wept over the wicked city.

Palestine and Jerusalem in miniature were both planned and built by the Rev. W. W. Wythe, of Erie, Pa., who has been on the ground and at work for months. The miniature tabernacle, a model one half the size of the original, containing three thousand square feet, with its outer court, brazen posts, its inner court, its Holy of Holies, sacred veil, golden candlesticks, ark of the covenant, and all its sacred appurtenances, is invested with great interest, and it furnishes opportunities for intelligent and profitable study. pastors, superintendents, teachers and others may be found here. A section of one of the great pyramids of Egypt is represented, showing the internal arrangement, with the king's and the queen's chamber, etc.

Rev. J. S. Ostrander, with thirty-six trained assistants in oriental costumes, illustrates Eastern manners and customs to a crowd of thousands. Maps, ancient and modern, mummies, specimens of Eastern wood and flowers, waters of Jordan, and everything that can in any way illustrate oriental style or Bible scenes and incidents are here in great variation.—Illustrated Bible Studies.

An old and very unwelcome visitant has made its appearance in the marshy districts between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers. It is the old fashioned plague, which, under the name of black death, destroyed in Europe, between 1348 and 1351, about twenty-five millions of people. Who was it that said, "There shall be famines, and pestilences, and earthquakes in divers places," and what time did he refer to?

A number of tablets, written upon and carefully arranged in an ivory box, have been discovered in the ruins of Pompeii. They contain receipts for payment of money and bear the consular date, with the name of the day and the month, and the amount paid. The tablets are evidently accounts, and from the way in which they are kept there can be no doubt that the spot where they were found was the site of a Roman banker's house.

A hawk recently alighted in a barn near Ottawa, Ont., seized a large turkey and about stripped it of feathers, when a little boy, ten years of age, advanced boldly to the rescue. A fierce fight ensued, in which the hawk was vanquished, and the boy bore his prize into the house in triumph.

Significant Names.

Did you ever consider the significance of the names of places connected with the earthly career of Jesus? He was born at Bethlehem, the house of bread. He is the living bread for our souls. He was brought up at Nazareth, the place of shrubs or sprouts. He is a tender shoot out of the stem of Jesse. He agonized at Gethsemane, the oil press. He trod the wine press alone, and of the people there was none with him.

The Jews in the Caucasus.

A foreign correspondent of the Jewish World writes:

Among the many races which inhabit the country between the Black Sea and the Caspian Sea, I may name two who strictly retain all their original habits, mode of living, and religion, viz: the Tartars or Mongols, and the pure Caucasians. An equally distinct race is the Jewish, which, from time immemorial, and perhaps ever since the destruction of the first temple, has inhabited these regions. It is believed that at the time of the Babylonian captivity, a part of the captives were transported to this country, and the present name of Gurja, being the Grusinian equivalent for "Jewish country," has been retained ever since first settlement of the Jews there. It is, however, most likely that they had settled there after the loss of their political significance.

The number of the present Caucasian Jewish population exceeds 25,000 souls, divided according to the respective districts into Grusinian, Persian, and Tchechenian Jews. The first named live in Tiflis and in Kutais, the second in the province of Daghestan, and on the borders of the Terek and Kuban, and the last named in Baku.

Uneducated and untouched by the light of European civilization, their manners and habits are similar to those of other mountaineers. They can only be distinguished by their religion, which, however, is not based upon Talmudical traditions or Rabbinical philosophy, but is simply founded on the precepts of the Pentateuch. As they do not possess a good translation of the Bible, it may be expected that they have only a weak perception of the spirit of the Bible, and of the religious duties which bind them as Jews. Their religious ceremonies consist merely of prayer, and service is conducted by their spiritual leader in a sort of synagogue. This leader, or chief, who is at once shochet, teacher, and judge of the community, is himself very ignorant, and has but a meagre knowledge of the Jewish religion and the fundamental spirit of Judaism. To this general ignorance, there is no exception, as is shown by a traveler who visited a Caucasian rabbi and begged him to show him his library, on which he received the reply that besides the usual prayer book and the "Shulchan Aruch" (a copy of which had been presented to him by a Jewish tourist) no other book was to be found neither with him nor within the whole district.

Although, however, the educational status of the Caucasian Jew is of a very low character, their physical and moral condition is very fair. They are of high stature, strongly built frame, and distinguish themselves among the other mountaineers by their warlike courage and dauntlessness. The arms, which they use with great dexterity, are their inseparable companions; they, however, only use them in defence of their persons, and never to practice robbery. Great energy, shrewdness in all their operations, hospitality and benevolence are their characteristics. They prefer to live in fields and among the mountains, and all endeavors of the local government to induce them to settle in towns have proved fruitless.

The Resurrection of the Just.

The promise of our Savior (Luke xiv. 14) to the Pharisee, whose guest he was that for calling "the poor, maimed, lame, and blind" to his feast, he should "be recompensed at the resurrection of the just," indicates that the just will have a resurrection peculiar to themselves. Otherwise, it would have said, "Thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection." But when he added "of the just," he taught a distinct resurrection for the just.

That remarkable discourse of our Lord's, recorded in the sixth chapter of John, is exceeding strong on this point:

Verse 39. "And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me, I should lose nothing, but should raise it up at the last day."

Verse 40. "And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day."

Verse 44. "No man can come to me except the Father, which hath sent me, draw him; and I will raise him up at the last day."

Verse 54. "Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day."

These four statements in one discourse promise each of them to the children of God, and to no others, on those conditions, a resurrection "at the last day." If it belongs alike to all mankind to be raised up at the last day, why this special promise to certain characters, and in view of that character? The obvious import of the words is, that the just shall have a resurrection at that time, peculiar to themselves, in which the wicked shall not participate. This being the obvious import, there is, to say the least, nothing to be deduced from these texts in opposition to the doctrine of a distinct resurrection for such character.—Life's Discussion on the Millennium.

The Moral Effects of Hurry.

To the thoughtful the moral consequences of traction and hurry are very saddening; to the physician, their physical results are a matter of profound concern, for their grave evils come under his daily observation. No evolution of force can take place with undue rapidity without damage to the machine in which the transformation is effected. Express railway stock has a much shorter term of use than that reserved for slower traffic. The law is universal that intensity and duration of action are inversely proportional. It is, therefore, no matter of surprise to find that the human nervous system is no exception to the law. The higher salubrity of rural over urban life is not entirely a matter of fresh air and exercise. Rural life involves leisure and pause in work, which are very essential to the maintenance of the nervous system in a state of due nutrition. Unremitting spasm ceases altogether. The high tension of life produces weakness at the very place where strength is most needed. The damage done to the be ith of the most valuable part of the community, the best trained thinkers, most useful workers, is incalculable.

Work and worry, though not proportional, are closely connected, and an excess of the former soon entails an increase of the latter beyond the limits which the nervous system can bear with impunity, especially under the conditions under which work has to be done. The machinery for organizing the work of a community has to be right and inflexible, and in the strain involved in bringing a changing organism into harmony with a machine, the former must inevitably suffer.—London Lancet.

Christian Growth.

A true Christian's course is progressive. It is as much his duty to grow in "knowledge" as to "grow in grace," and when Christians cease to grow in grace and knowledge, a spirit of prejudice supplants that spiritual power which was to be with the church militant to the end of this age. Growth is a progressive work. Paul, the special recipient of revelations, was for leaving the things behind and reaching on to those before. But his advancement was not without impediments. He met with most bitter and determined opposition. This may be truly said to have been the heritage of all reformers, social as well as religious, and all truly growing Christians to-day can scarcely expect exemption from the same kind of opposition to the advancement of light which their Master experienced, and which culminated in the heaven-pitying scenes of Calvary. The cause of this opposition to investigation and religious advancement is very evident; for not a very minute examination is necessary to see that it springs from a desire to defend their religious tenets, instead of possessing, on the contrary, a deep and earnest desire to know if they are true.

The apostle Paul has affirmed that "we know only in part;" hence, admitting this apostolic declaration to be true, it follows that none in this state of imperfection can attain perfection of knowledge. Could such a condition be possibly reached by any, they would truly become doctrinally infallible, and might claim a degree of justification for opposition to investigation of scriptural subjects.

No one is in a condition of Christian growth until he loses sight of self, and supremely desires to please God. As we advance step by step in Christian knowledge we should examine our conclusions candidly and critically, and thus shall we make sure and rapid growth.

Let us follow on to know the Lord—earnestly press forward in biblical research, and more will God's character, in its true light, be unfolded to our vision; and our hearts shall rejoice in contemplating him as a being of supreme compassion and love for poor frail, erring children of dust—a being whose character can but attract to closer fellowship and deeper love—Wm. H. Spencer.

Sublime Courage.

Men have been martyrs for a mistake and willingly suffered death for a false belief, but it would be hard to find the instance of heathen devotion that could match for lofty and triumphant daring this story of self-sacrifice by an early Christian:

A great many years ago a Roman emperor said to a Greek architect—

"Build me a coliseum, and when it is done I will crown you, and I will make your name famous throughout all the world, if you will only build me a grand coliseum."

The work was done. The emperor said, "Now we will crown that architect. We will have a grand celebration."

The coliseum was crowded with a great host. The emperor was there and the Greek architect, who was to be crowned for putting up this building. And then they brought out some Christians, who were ready to die for the truth, and from the doors underneath were let out the lions, hungry, three-fourths starved. The emperor arose among the shouting assemblage and said:

"The coliseum is done, and we have come to celebrate it to-day by the putting to death of Christians at the mouth of these lions, and we have come here to honor the architect who has constructed this wonderful building. The time has come for me to honor him, and we further celebrate his triumph by slaying these Christians."

Thereupon the Greek architect then sprang to his feet and shouted, "I also am a Christian." And they flung him to the wild beasts, and his body, dead and bleeding, was tumbled into the dust of the amphitheater.

A Breathing Cave.

In the range of mountains in Western North Carolina, known as the Fox Range, is a most singular phenomenon. It is a breathing cave. In the summer months a current of air comes from it so strongly that a person can't walk against it, while in winter the suction is just as great. The cool air from the mountain in the summer is felt for miles, in a direct line from the mouth of the cave. At times a most unpleasant odor is emitted upon the current, from dead carcasses of animals sucked in and killed by its violence. The loss of cattle and stock in that section in winter is accounted for in this way: They range too near the mouth of the cave, and the current carries them in. At times, when the change from inhalation to exhalation begins, the air is filled with the hair of various animals; not unfrequently hoofs and whole carcasses are found miles from the place. The air has been known to change materially in temperature during exhalation, from quite cool to unpleasantly hot, withering vegetation within reach, and accompanied by a terrible roaring, gurgling sound, as a pot boiling. It is unaccounted for by scientific men who have examined it, though no exploration can take place. It is feared by many that a volcanic eruption may break forth there some time. Such a thing has occurred in places as unexpected.

The Late Rev. Emlie Cook.

At one of the revival meetings recently held in Edinburgh, Mr. Moody spoke of the importance and power of faith in prayer. Dr. A. Thomson read a letter he had received from a lady in Edinburgh, narrating a series of incidents, in connection with the rescue of the passengers of the shipwrecked Loch Earn.

"After the Trimountain left them, and they had examined their ship, they feared they would never see land again. They could not navigate the vessel, and were left to the mercy of the wind and waves, or rather to the care of him who ruleth wind and waves. Two ministers were left on board the Loch Earn. One, M. Cook, a truly good man, did all he could to encourage his hearers. Every day at noon he gathered them together, and earnestly by prayer strove to lead them to the Savior. The day before they were rescued he told them he had no doubt they would be saved; that even then a vessel was speeding to save them; God had answered their prayers; and that next day, as morning dawned, they would see her. As morning dawned, every eye was strained to see the promised ship. There truly she was, and the British Queen bore down upon them. One thing, is remarkable—the officer in charge on board the British Queen had a most unaccountable feeling that there was something for him to do, and three times during the night he changed the course of the vessel, telling the watch to keep a sharp lookout for a ship.

The congregation of a Methodist church in New York have decided to have a lady as their permanent pastor.

A Hindoo Oracle on Man.

For all our days are passed away in Thy wrath; we spend our years as a tale that is told.

"This year has been to me as a fabulous story; like the repetition of a dream, my days pass away. The beginning of life is as the dewdrop upon the tender herb; in ten moons it assumes its shape, and is brought forth; it lies down, it crawls, prattles, walks, and becomes acquainted with science. At sixteen, he is a man; goes forth in the pride of his youth, gets a wife, and becomes the father of children. The husk of his rice he refuses to part with, and his wish is to enjoy all. He thinks by living cheaply, by refusing to support charities or to dispense favors, he is of all men the most happy. He is regardless of the writing on his forehead (fate), and is like the lamp which shineth, and ceaseth to shine; pour in oil, and there will be light; take it away, and there will be darkness. In old age comes the rheumatics, the jaundice and obesity; the eyes are filled with rheums, and the phlegm comes forth. His body becomes dry, his back bends, his wife and children abhor him, and in vision he sees the death car and horse. The place of burning says, 'come, come;' and his family say, 'go, go.' His strength is gone, his speech falters, his eyeballs roll, and his living soul is taken away. The people then talk of his good and evil deeds, and ask, 'is this life?' The funeral rites follow; the music sounds forth, and the dying carry the dead to its place of burning." Thus sang the devoted Arana-Kirigar.—Roberts.

Beecher on The Ten Commandments.

Take the ten commandments. It is true that by a very liberal construction you can make them cover about everything in creation, as by beating gold with gold beaters' skin you can make a piece as big as my hand cover an acre or so. The ten commandments stand where men emerge from the lowest conditions, and in the dawn of the recognition of God's authority. They have to do with the commonest vices of men, and with their plainest duties in society. They are the charter that imposes conditions, without which there could not be rectitude, or the proprieties of life, or the sanctities of the household. But they are all negative. All that which is called in the New Testament "the fruit of the Spirit" is left out of them. Of the glow of interior illumination, there is not a ray in them. Far back they stand in the beginning of the history of the world, and far down in that history which reproduces itself in every generation. They are adapted to the building up of a lower style of man. Their cry is, "Thou shalt not," "Thou shalt not." Woe to that man who has lived among the churches and Bibles and preachers and has not got higher than the ten commandments! And yet we see them emblazoned in the house of God as though they expressed the highest ideas to which men have reached. They say to men, "Thou shalt not steal, thou shalt not bear false witness, thou shalt not commit adultery; the grosser and more bestial forms of sin are forbidden by them; but those moral virtues and spiritual attainments which belong to a developed manhood are not enjoined in them.

Evidently the Christian has seen something of the world, or it never could have found out so many sins that need to be preached against as it condenses in a few paragraphs. It says:

We want a religion that banishes small measures from the counters, small baskets from the stalls, sand from the sugar, chickory from coffee, alum from the bread, and water from the milk-cans.

The religion that is to save the world will not put all the big strawberries at the top and all the little ones at the bottom.

It will not make one half a pair of shoes of good leather, so that the first shall redound to the maker's credit, and the second to his cash.

It will not put Jouvin's stamp on Jenkin's kid glovet; or make Paris bonnets in the back room of a Boston millinery shop; nor all-wool delaines and all-linen handkerchiefs be amalgamated with clandestine cotton; nor coats made of old rags pressed together be sold to the public for real broadcloth.

It does not put bricks at five dollars a thousand into chimneys it contracts to build with seven-dollar material; nor smuggle white pine into floors that have paid for hard pine; nor leave yawning cracks in closets where boards ought to join; nor make window blinds of slats that cannot stand the wind, and paint that cannot stand the sun, and fastenings that may be looked at, but on no account touched.

The religion that is going to sanctify the world pays its debts. It does not consider that forty cents returned from one hundred cents given is according to the gospel, though it may be according to law. It looks on a man who has failed in trade, and who continues to live in luxury, as a thief."

Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the re-establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortalized saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential to final salvation.

Communications.—The Editor can not be understood as endorsing all the sentiments expressed by correspondents whose articles are inserted under this head. Each writer is alone responsible for the article bearing his own signature. If the teaching of any writer is not endorsed, an article setting forth the views of the party differing may be forwarded. Free discussion of Bible doctrine on all sides will be allowed, but the Editor reserves the right to refuse those communications which antagonize a belief and obedience of the Gospel as a means of salvation, or which undermine its principles.

The One Baptism vs. Three Dips.

BY WILEY JONES.

But a three dipper enquires, "How can a baptism into the death of Christ, (Rom. v. 3,) be a baptism into the Father who never died?" The answer to this is one of the plainest truths of Scripture—but for the death of Christ there could be no approach to the Father, and no future redemption for us. "We were reconciled to God by the death of his Son." Rom. v. 10; Col. i. 22; Rev. v. 9. Christ is the "door," and no man cometh unto the Father but by Him. Jno. x. 9; xiv. 6. And hence when by one act we are baptized into the death of Christ we thereby enter into that enriching relationship to the name of the Father, Son and Spirit, which nothing but his death could procure for us. While the death of Christ is not all that the "one immersion" represents, yet his death is the foundation of those other precious truths which that immersion represents. Seeing that no man can come to the Father but by the Son, and without the shedding of blood, there can be remission of sins, we might return the question in this form—how can there be a baptism into the Father unless the same act be also a baptism into the death of Christ, by whom alone we can come to the Father? Acts ii. 38; Heb. iv. 22.

We dare not try to climb up some other way, for Christ alone is the door and the way, and unless we "come unto God by Him," there is no salvation for us. Jno. xi. 9; xiv. 6. It is only "through Him" that both Jews and Gentiles "have access by one Spirit unto the Father." Ephes. ii. 16, 18.

4. Resurrection. As truly as the "one immersion" into the water represents a burial, so truly the one arising from the water represents our moral rising now to walk in newness of life, and our physical rising in the resurrection, as Christ arose, to die no more. For as "Christ being raised from the dead, dieth no more;" neither shall we, when once emerging from the grave, be subject to a "second death." If approved at the judgment seat. All this is fully set forth by the divinely appointed "one immersion." Rom. vi. 5, 9; Col. ii. 12; iii. 1, 4.

5. The Deluge. Peter, speaking of the deluge whereby "the world" was "overflowed with water" and eight souls were saved in the Ark, says "the like figure whereunto even baptism doth also now save us." 2 Pet. ii. 5; iii. 6; 1 Pet. iii. 21. Campbell's Translation reads—"The antitype, immersion, does also now save us." And in parable he says, "The word tupos, type, denotes a thing that is so formed as to convey an exact image of itself, by impression on another substance capable of receiving the impression. In Scripture it signifies a pattern, according to which a thing is made. * * * The word antitupos, antitype, denotes the thing formed in imitation of the type or pattern." Hence, as the old world with its heavy weight of sin and sinners upon it was submerged in the deluge, and emerged from the flood to enter on a new career, so the old character and sinful habits are purged away and laid aside in the baptismal waters through the merits and efficacy of the blood of Christ and from those waters we arise to "walk in newness of life."

An ancient writer about A. D. 300 aptly expresses this idea when he speaks of "the waters of the deluge, by which the old iniquity was purged—after the baptism, so to say, of the world." Thus we see that the one immersion was foreshadowed about 2344 years before being commanded in Matt. xxviii. 19, just as the Paschal lamb, 1500 years before the crucifixion, foreshadowed that a bone of Christ should not be broken. Ex. xii. 9, 46; Num ix. 12; Jno. xix. 36. There was but one deluge, and the beautiful rainbow in the cloud is a reminder that there shall not be a second or a third (Gen. ix. 11, 15), and as it was but once that the great globe seemed to sink beneath the rushing waters and to arise once from that liquid grave so we have here a ground, beautiful and sublime symbol of the "one baptism."

These five symbols or patterns are authorized by Holy Scripture as the true analogies of baptism, and hence they prove something. But fanciful, far-fetched and forced analogies or comparisons prove nothing in respect to this ordinance, because they are not declared by Scripture to be fit and proper comparisons. Those who rightly handle "the word of truth" will neither seek to "put asunder" what God "hath joined together," nor to join together what He hath put asunder.

The "one baptism," being a type or "form of doctrine," must not be mutilated, for in mutilating the type you make it fail to set forth the doctrine which it was intended to teach. Of what doctrinal use is a symbol except so far as it resembles or pictures forth the thing symbolized? Breaking a bone of the Paschal lamb, or cutting it into three parts and making a broth of it, would have been unlawful, because this mutilation of the symbol or type would have prevented it from teaching what it did concerning Christ. Justin Martyr says that the lamb was "roasted and dressed up in the form of the cross. For one spit is transfixed right through from the lower parts up to the head, and one across the back, to which are attached the legs of the lamb." Died with typhu, exl. How vivid the symbol! And so too it must be unlawful to cut up the "one baptism" into fragments (not according to the pattern), and have it so mutilated as not any longer to picture forth the new birth, the planting, the burial, and the resurrection. To picture forth these things it must be one act of submersion under the water, and one act of emergence from the water. And who can say that the eloquent formula in Matt. xxviii. 19, is not perfectly consistent with this in its true and real grammatical meaning? By the inspired writer the one word "baptizing," is used once in connection with the three names; just as the one act of immersing leads us into spiritual relationship to all of the three names. "The God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob" is one God in relation to the name of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob. Then why should not baptizing into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, be one immersion in relation to the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit? Certainly there is some resemblance in the grammatical form of the two sentences. Luke xx. 37. And notice that the holy name, "God," occurs three times in the one sentence; while the word "baptizing" occurs but once in the other. "Of water" in one action we are "born" into relationship to "the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." A child in being once born is ushered into a family relationship to the name of his father, and of his mother, and of all of his earthly kin, whether these kinsman be renowned for wisdom, wealth, or great titles of honor. By one coming into the world, I was born into (1) the county, and (2) the state, and (3) the United States. A foreigner is not naturalized 36 times for once for the name of each state before he becomes a citizen of the "United States."

In this country a child by the one act of birth becomes politically related to the name of the president, and of the governor, and of the mayor (if born in a city). That the merest infant born in this country does obtain political claims upon those three official names, is evident from the fact that the parents of that infant may, if necessary, call upon all three of those officials to use their united governmental powers in protecting the life of the infant, if that little life is threatened by one or more law-breakers. A house is the joint property of A, and of B, and of C, but a builder charges a thousand dollars for putting an addition to the house; does the mean that when he comes to settle up he must be paid three thousand for the work, i. e., one thousand for each of the three owners of the house? Well, the union of Father, Son and Spirit is more intimate and perfect than any earthly partnership can be. It is the Father in the Son by the Spirit; and in being once immersed for all of the three names, we do among other truths show our faith in that union. So intimate is the union between the Father and the Son, that the Son hath said "I and my Father are one; he that hath seen me hath seen the Father; I am in the Father and the Father in me." Jno. x. 30; xiv. 9, 10. And I see not how this profound union was produced except by the Spirit which the Father giveth not by measure unto the Son. Jno. iii. 34. By acknowledging this union of the Father in the Son by the Spirit, we can understand how the apostles in strict obedience to the meaning of the command in Matt. xxviii. 19, could baptize people "into (eis) the name of the Lord Jesus" without any separate and distinct mention in the latter formula of either the Father or the Spirit. Acts viii. 12, 16; xix. 5. Certainly the apostles understood the formula in Matt. xxviii. 19, and must have been acting in exact obedience to it, when they baptized "into the name of the Lord Jesus." This was the "one baptism" for both Jews and Gentiles between whom the Lord had now "put no difference," having "broken down the middle wall of partition." Acts xv. 9; Gal. iii. 28; Ephes. ii. 14; iv. 5. Thus the more enlightened disciples of John, as well as the Samaritans who had formerly worshipped they knew not what, were alike baptized "into the name of the Lord Jesus," after Pentecost. Jno. iv. 22; Acts xvii. 23. We conclude, therefore, that just as preaching "Christ" is equivalent to preaching "the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ" (compare in Acts viii. the 5th and 12th verses), so baptizing "into the name of the Lord Jesus" is equivalent to baptizing "into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." The name of the Father, and of the Spirit must, therefore, be deposited and contained in "the name of the Lord Jesus," who is the great Exponent or name-bearer, in the work of redemption. In the Father's placing his name in the angel who guided the hosts of Israel, I think we have an illustration or foreshadowing of his placing his name in Christ. (And not only was the Father's name placed in the angel, but also in the temple, which temple typified Christ, and the Father dwelling in Him. Ex. xxiii. 21; 2 Chron. vi. 20; xx. 9). If then an angel was worthy of being thus honored by the Father, how much more worthy is the only begotten and dearly beloved Son who is "made so much better than the angels," and whom all the angels are commanded to worship? Heb. i. 4, 6. No marvel then if the Father's name is contained in "the name of the Lord Jesus," "for it pleased the Father that in Him should all followers dwell." Col. i. 19. Yea, in Him "dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily." Col. ii. 9. He "of God is made unto us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption." 1 Cor. i. 30; See Jer. xxiii. 6, where the Father's name is placed upon Him and He is declared "The Lord our righteousness," i. e, Jehovah-tsidkenu as the margin explains. "God hath highly exalted Him, and given Him a name which is above every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come." Phil. ii. 9; Ephes. i. 21. "We are complete" in Christ (Col. ii. 10), for a person being once "baptized into Christ" (Gal. iii. 27), is of course "in Christ Jesus," and hence he is "a new creature" (2 Cor. v. 17), to whom there is "no condemnation" so long as he shall "walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit." Rom. viii. 1. Hence when by the one dip, i. e., the "one immersion," we become "in Christ," we are safe because Christ Himself is already "in the Father." Jno. xiv. 10

Hence, I conclude that the ordinance would be equally valid and proper whether we say "into the name of Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit;" or whether we say "into the name of the Lord Jesus," provided that in both formulas we perform it by one dip, adhering strictly to the "one immersion."

For the sake of plainness, however, and adaptation to the modern comprehension of the subject, I think the formula in Matt. xxviii. 19, is to be preferred. And the one immersion will suit both formulas, but according to the defining symbols, three immersions will suit neither.

But a three dipper enquires "what does Paul mean by the doctrine of baptisms in Heb. vi. 2?" I answer that he does not mean to contradict the "one immersion" enjoined upon us in Ephes. iv. 5. The "comprehensive commentary" supposes the word "baptisms" to mean "either the various legal washings * * * or John's baptism, and that of Christ, which were distinct from each other, or the traditional baptisms of the Pharisees;" and it adds, "the Syriac here has the singular. Barrington understands the phrase of the baptism of water and the effusion of the Holy Spirit, by which the first disciples among the Jews, and the first converts among the devout and idolatrous Gentiles, were initiated." Adam Clarke says, "I am inclined to think that all the terms in this verse (Heb. vi. 2) as well as those in the former, belong to the Levitical law; and are to be explained on that ground. Baptisms—ablutions of the body in water, sprinklings, and washings, were frequent as religious rites among the Hebrews." It is affirmed under "No. 17" in "Time Appointed," October, 1874, that in this place (Heb. vi. 2) Paul was "admonishing the Hebrews to leave the washings under the law." But whether it refers to the baptisms under the law, or the baptisms of John, or the traditional baptisms of the Pharisees; we see that it was necessary to teach some doctrine at that time concerning these various baptisms, in order that the Hebrews might rightly value and understand the "one baptism" of the Gospel dispensation.

The Christian Era.

It is a source of satisfaction to be able to refer to authority which is at once truly scientific and devout on so important a matter as the true date of the Christian era. Thinking that the following quotation from "Ferguson's Astronomy," would not only be interesting, but instructive to many of your readers, I therefore, send the following for the RESTITUTION:

"The vulgar era of Christ's birth was never settled till the year 527, when Dionysius Exiguus, a Roman Abbot, fixed it to the end of the 4713 of the Julian period (but did not come into public use until the eighth century, W. D.) which was four years too late. For our Savior was born before the death of Herod, who sought to kill him as soon as he heard of his birth. And, according to the testimony of Josephus, (b 17 chap 8) there was an eclipse of the moon in the time of Herod's last illness; which eclipse appeared by our astronomical tables to have been in the year of the Julian period 4710, March 13th, at three hours past midnight at Jerusalem. Now, as our Savior must have been born some months before Herod's death, since in the interval he was carried into Egypt, the latest time in which we can fix the true era of his birth, is about the end of the 4709th year of the Julian period.

There is a remarkable prophecy delivered to us in the ninth chapter of Daniel, which, from a certain Epoch, fixes the time of restoring the state of the Jews, and the building of the walls of Jerusalem, the coming of the Messiah, his death, and the destruction of Jerusalem. But some parts of this prophecy in our version are so injudicially pointed that, if they be read according to those stops, they are quite unintelligible. But will give the whole of the prophecy according to the learned Dr. Prideaux. 'Verse 24. Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people, and the Holy City, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and the prophecy, and to anoint the most holy. Verse 25. Know therefore and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem unto the Messiah the Prince, shall be seven weeks and three score and twenty weeks, the street shall be built again, and the wall even in troublous times. Verse 26. And after three score and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off, but not for himself, and the people of the Prince that shall come, shall destroy the city and sanctuary, and the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war desolations are determined. Verse 27. And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week, and in the midst of the week (the Dr. says, that this ought to be rendered, the half part of the week, not the midst), he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate even until the consumation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolate.'

This commandment was given to Ezra by Artaxerxes Longimanus, in the seventh year of that king's reign. Ezra vii. 11-26.

From this accomplishment till the time when Christ's messenger, John the baptist began to preach the kingdom of the Messiah, 62 weeks or 434 years. From thence to the beginning of Christ's public ministry, half a week, or three and a half years.

And from thence to the death of Christ, half a week, or three and a half years; in which half week he preached, and confirmed the covenant of the Gospel with many. In all, from the going forth of the commandment till the death of Christ, 70 weeks, or 490 years. And, lastly, in a very striking manner, the prophecy foretells what should come to pass after the expiration of the 70 weeks; namely, the destruction of the city and sanctuary by the people of the Prince that was to come; which were the Roman armies, under the command of Titus, their prince, who came upon Jerusalem as a torrent.

Now, both the undoubted canon of Ptolemy, and the famous era of Nabonassar, the beginning of the equinox. For Josephus expressly says (Antiq l. 3. chap. 10): The passover was kept on the 14th day of the month Nisan according to the moon, when the sun was in Aries. And the sun always enters Aries at the instant of the vernal equinox; which in our Saviors time, fell on the 22d of March. The dispute about the year of Christ's death, is limited to four or five years at most. We have shown that he was crucified on the day of a paschal full moon, and on a Friday, all that we have to do, is to compute in which of those years there was a passover full moon on a Friday. * * * And I find by calculation, the only passover full moon that fell on a Friday for several years before or after the disputed year, was on the 3d day April, in the 4708th year of the Julian period, which was the 460th year after Ezra received his commission from Artaxerxes according to Ptolemy's canon, and the year in which the Messiah was to be cut off, according to the prophecy, reckoning from the going forth of that commission; and this 490 years was the 33d year of our Saviors age, reckoning from the vulgar era of his birth; but the 37th, reckoning from the true era thereof.

The 4714 year of Julian period, which we have astronomically proved to be the year of the crucifixion, was the 4th year of the 202d Olympiad; in which year, Phlegon, a heathen writer, tells us, there was the most extraordinary eclipse of the sun that ever was seen. But I find by calculation, that there could be no total eclipse of the sun at Jerusalem in a natural way in that year. So that what Phlegon calls an eclipse must have been the darkness at the time of our Saviors crucifixion; a darkness altogether supernatural as the moon was then, and must have been, in the opposite part of the heavens, therefore, could not possibly darken the sun."

So as far as Biblican research is considered, this is not 1875, but 1870.

From Whence the Functions of Life?

Some of the functions of life we find to be sensation, registration of impressions, thought, reason and consciousness.

The question that we desire to spring, is the one that stands as the caption of this article, "From whence do these functions arise?" From the many elements chemically considered, of which man is composed, do these functions arise out of one element, or out of the combination of the many?

One of the two positions above referred to must be taken; from the choice there can be no possible escape.

Then shall we make our choice, and take the position that the functions of life arise out of one element found in man, and that, that element is Spirit?

With this position selected, and before us, let us for a moment or two reflect.

Then as conclusions growing out of this position,—

1. We must expect to find these functions possessed by this element under all circumstances and in all conditions. Otherwise this element might be subjected to conditions which would destroy them.

2. If this element, Spirit, possesses these functions in all conditions and under all circumstances, then it possessed them before it became incarnate as well as while combined; else it is made to depend upon combination for them. If this be true, then pre-existent life.

3. Then can we argue pre-existent life and consciousness as easily as future dis-embodied life and consciousness.

4. And by analogy, if our pre-existent life and consciousness at incarnation was by a vail shrouded in darkness from our present view, may we not expect the present to be hid when that element reaches the dis-embodied state?

5. If this element, and this element alone possesses these functions, then may we expect to find its presence wherever we find these functions. We find these fuctions in the entire animal kingdom, and therefore its presence.

6. If this element Spirit will in a dis-embodied state perpetuate these functions for man, why will it not for the horse, the ox, and the dog?

But for all these conclusions arising out of our proposition, we are hardly yet prepared, and kindly ask to be excused while we look again.

Then to the second position that, the functions of life arise out of the union or combination of elements.

But we know that the perpetuity of any principal arising out of a combination of elements is made to depend upon the continuation of that combination; and that whenever a power is brought to bear upon that principal, sufficient to resolve it back into its primary elements that that principal is at an end.

Illustration. We take the two gases, oxygen and hydrogen, in certain proportions and unite them. The article formed is not oxygen, nor is it a gas at all, but it is water. Now the continuation of that water is made to depend upon the continuance of this chemical union; and whenever a power is brought to bear upon it sufficient to resolve it back into its primary or native elements then the water is no more.

Likewise, if sensation, registration, thought, reason and consciousness arise out of a combination of elements, then their continuation must necessarily depend upon the continuance of the combination. And whenever a power, as death, is brought to bear upon that union of elements sufficient to break it up, then must sensation, registration, thought, reason and consciousness come to an end.

Such is man when chemically viewed.

Of the modern crowns of continental Europe, perhaps the most remarkable is the triple crown or papal tiara, or perhaps tiaras, for there are four of them. The tiara is seldom worn by the pope; it is carried before him in procession, but, except on rare occasions, he wears a mitre like an ordinary bishop. Of the existing tiaras, the most beautiful is that which was given by Napoleon I. to Pius V II. in 1805. It is said to be worth upwards of £70,000. Its three circlets are almost encrusted with sapphires, emeralds, rubies, pearls and diamonds; and the great emerald at its apex, said to be the most beautiful in the world, is alone valued at 12,000 francs.

THE RESTITUTION.

PLYMOUTH, IND.....Nov. 10, 1875

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.

☞The reader will find in this issue, a full report of our meetings in Liconfer, which we clip from the National Banner published in that city.

☞By the force of circumstances we are obliged to publish several long articles this week. As the paper is small brethren must learn to abridge, so that we can have a greater variety. There are subjects, of course, which seem to demand more space than others, but in such cases the articles should be sent to us in numbers.

☞Bro. Myers spent last Sunday at Argos. He reports that his meetings were well attended and a deep interest is manifested in the new life. We commenced meetings at Argos on Tuesday, and shall remain until Friday.

☞After a five weeks campaign in other parts of the state, we were permitted to meet with the brethren in Plymouth on Sunday last. We gave two discourses upon the great questions of the Christian Hope. The house was well filled with intelligent hearers, who seemed much interested in the Word of Life. In the evening about fifty partook of the emblems of our Lord's broken body and spilled blood.

☞Prof. Swing is soon to sever his connection with the Fourth Presbyterian church of Chicago. Mr. Swing is a man of broad views, and feels too much cramped in the thirty-nine articles he harness. It does not need a prophetic spirit to foretell the inevitable breaking away from the old creeds which only tend to hamper a true religious spirit.

☞The insurrection in Bosnia and Herzegovina is growing in importance. The Turkish power seems to be unable to crush it. The latest news indicates that Russia is in full sympathy with the insurrectionists, and is desirous of moving her capital from St. Petersburg to Constantinople. The signs throughout Europe are ominous of great changes. That Turkey will some day fall and become Russian, and that the Czar will hold the key of seas is the voice of God through the prophets of Israel. Politicians also look upon this as one of the most certain events of the future. A few more years will bring students of prophecy nearer together upon all those questions which bear up the ending of Gentile times and the beginning of the Messianic kingdom. To us is plain that Turkey must be removed as a power, and that the Holy Land must pass into the hands of the Jews. Everything now points strongly in that direction.

The Happy Family.

There seems to be some difference of opinion among Infidels and Spiritualists as to which is the happier family. The following from the Boston Investigator takes off the Spiritualists in a way at once truthful and amusing:

Mr. Editor:—I notice in the new paper, the New Age, that one Prof. William Denton says that Spiritualism contains the true philosophy of life; that Materialism promotes disquietude of mind; makes existence a failure without an object or an aim; and that the Spiritualists are the only happy people.

I have an idea that the true philosophy of life consists in knowing the truth, which is the basis of Materialism, rather than being imposed upon by delusion and trickery, of which spiritualism is mainly composed. I never heard of any impostors in Materialism, but spiritualism is full of them—so much so, that it might properly be called the philosophy of pretension and monomania.

The Professor (I never heard what college conferred upon him his title) says the Spiritualists are cheerful and happy. Are they? Let us see. Randolph, the medium, lately committed suicide; R. D. Owen and Gerrald Massey went crazy; Woodhull and her tribe have gone into free love; Olcott and the Banner of Light are at loggerheads; the "Gentle Wilson" has sued Jones of the R. P. Journal for defamation of character; Moses Hull gets his head broke in a row at a spiritual camp-meeting; and the Spiritualists generally are such a quarrelsome set that they cannot unite and build a temple in Boston as the Materialists have done.

Really, Spiritualism promotes harmony, union, and cheerfulness—"over the left." I think the professor must have been under the influence of "evil spirits," if any, when he was writing this "philosophy."

COMMON SENSE.

The Bible.

That collection of books termed "THE BIBLE" is, unquestionably, the most wonderful volume in existence. It is a book of not only the most venerable antiquity, but at the same time a record claiming a divine origin. And a production too, that in its high pretensions, professes to reveal the existence and attributes of that Almighty Spirit to whom it ascribes the creation of the universe, the formation of man, and the continued supervision of all things. Its daring chronology ascends to the beginning,—that far distant point in the gone-by duration, that antedates the measureless astronomical and geological ages—nay more,—to that unbeginning eternity that is only filled with the infinite existence of the eternal God. Though written in the language of common daily life, and in modes of expression the most intelligible to ordinary comprehension, thus adapting it to the instruction and guidance of the unlearned, yet its figures are surprisingly beautiful, its poetry rich in exquisite embellishment, its philosophy accurate and sublime, its history positive and correct, and its prophetic declarations magnificent and wonderful. Those prophecies, in their all-comprehending unfoldings, stretch onward into the immeasurable coming eternity, and, complementing its histories, link the interminable future with the limitless past. Its writers differed greatly in all their circumstances of life, as well as in their natural and acquired abilities. The king, the courtier, the scribe, the shepherd, the husbandman, the physician, and the humble fisherman—men who lived in different times and in different countries, who spoke different languages,—employed their pens in its composition; and yet it is, as a book, a perfect and harmonious whole. Its illustrations, figures, metaphors, and symbols, are drawn from every department of human knowledge. Its conceptions of the grandeur and magnificence of the physical universe are of the most lofty character; yet, written in a style of inimitable simplicity, they are within the comprehension of all; and thus wonderfully adapted for the instruction of men of all ranks and orders in the doctrines and duties enjoined for belief and practice in every part of the sacred volume. These compositions, being written under the guidance of the omniscient Spirit, contain revelations fitted to all capacities, places, and times.

The Bible, from its diametrical opposition to every form and species of vice and wrong, has exposed itself to attack from all quarters. Scientific men have labored to subvert its teachings; geology, history, chronology, and astronomy, have been appealed to for evidences to impeach its veracity, but in vain. During the three thousand years since these records have been in being,—in whole or in part,—they have exercised such a sway over the opinions and conduct of multiplied millions of the learned and intelligent part of mankind as no other writings have ever done. The revelations of this wonderful book have swept away the mythologies of Greece and Rome; and the fabled gods of Olympus have no longer, even an imaginary existence, outside the poetic fictions of those lands who penned their supposed existence and doings in all the sweetness of harmonious verse. The pomp, ritual and sacrifices, of Pagan worship have forever disappeared from lands where magnificent temples once lifted their spires above the altars smoking with the victim-offerings of countless devotees. The languages in which it was written receive the sacred deposit of revelation, and cease to be spoken as living tongues; but the Bible lives on. Graven stones and lettered bricks disclose to the inquisitive explorer the records of perished nations in the hieroglyphics of a hoar antiquity;—and these mute witnesses depose to the truth of Bible facts.

The disenterred ruins of mighty cities,—the coins, the medals, the sculptured rocks, and memorial columns—all bear testimony to the authenticity of the Book of books. All the proud empires of history have passed away, and that volume, in which prophecy had foreshadowed their overthrow and desolation, lives on as the guide and director of all that is noble in national civilization, or individual excellency. From Moses in the wilderness of Sinai, to John on the isle of Patmos, was a period of about 2,000 years; and during this period the sacred canon was composed, and its finished contents completed and sealed up. A book,—disclosing the nature and range of human duty, unfolding all the obligations and responsibilities under which humanity is placed, portraying the difficulties and trials of a life of virtue, bringing to light the retributions of the future, and the ultimate destiny of the two great classes of moral agents,—it is without a peer or rival. These compilations, differing as they do in style, method, and arrangement, all treat of one great subject—the manifestation and mission of a Redeemer and Deliverer, through whom the salvation of man, and the restitution of all things coming within the scope of its wonderful predictions, should be effected. Its pre-intimations of the sufferings of the Redeemer have all been fulfilled to the letter, and its prophecies of glory and honor awaiting the same Divine personage are sure of accomplishment in due time.

S. A. C.

The Terms, Forever, Everlasting and Eternal.

It has been shown, that to limit the terms everlasting and eternal to an age, will limit the existence of God, the immortalized saints and the everlasting inheritance. Thus, to argue the temporal punishment of the finally impenitent from the etymological construction of these words evidences either ignorance of the Bible use of these words or recklessness in reference to the consequences growing out of such an unwarrantable position. Moses, when referring to the great God says: "The eternal (AGE LASTING) God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting (AGE LASTING) arms." Deut. xxxiii. 27. Thus limiting the existence of the eternal God to an AGE.

Referring to the duration of Christ's throne and kingdom the prophet Samuel says: "Ho (David's royal Son shall build an house for my name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom forever (FOR AN AGE). And thine house and thy kingdom shall be established forever." (FOR AN AGE) thy throne shall be established FOREVER (FOR AN AGE.") 2 Sam. vii. 13, 16. Also, 1 Chron. xviii. 12, 14.

The foregoing view limits God's everlasting covenant with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. In his song of thanksgiving, David exclaims, "Even of the covenant which he made with Abraham, and of his oath unto Isaac; and hath confirmed the same to Jacob for a law, and to Israel for an everlasting (AGE LASTING) covenant." 1 Chron. xvi. 16, 17. When referring to the immortality of God, the Psalmist says: "Surely he shall not be moved (FOREVER (FOR AN AGE) the righteous shall be in everlasting (AGE LASTING) remembrance." Psa. cxii. 6. Thus, teaching that at the end of an age God shall be moved, and shall forget his people. "But (saith David) the Lord shall endure forever" (FOR AN AGE). Psa. ix. 7. Again, in Psalm xxxvii. he says, when speaking of the duration of the inheritance of the saints, "The Lord knoweth the days of the upright; and their inheritance shall be forever," (FOR AN AGE.) Also at the 28th verse when referring to the endless preservation of the saints, he says, "For the Lord loveth judgment, and forsaketh not his saints; they are preserved forever," (FOR AN AGE.) Also the next verse, when referring to the inheritance of the saints, he continues, "The righteousness shall inherit the land, and dwell therein forever" (FOR AN AGE.) The Psalmist compares the eternal perpetuity of the name of Christ with the duration of the Sun. He says' "His name shall endure forever; (FOR AN AGE) his name shall endure as the Sun; and shall be blessed in him—and blessed, be his glorious name forever; (FOR AN AGE) and let the whole earth be filled with his glory." Psa. lxxii.

Thus, teach according to the view under investigation, that the Sun in the heavens shall be blotted out and the immortal Son of the living God shall cease to exist; and that his glorious name shall cease to be held in grateful remembrance. In the following verses, FOREVER and FOREVERMORE are used synonymously, and interchangeably. They measure the duration of the Sun, Moon and the endless ages of heaven. The great God says, "I have made a covenant with my chosen, I have sworn unto David my servant, thy seed will I establish forever," (FOR AN AGE.) Thus at the end of an age God's oath and covenant with David concerning the perpetuity of his throne and kingdom will be abrogated and his son himself shall cease to be.

The eternal Jehovah continues, "Also I will make him my first born, higher than the kings of earth. My mercy will I keep for him FOREVERMORE, (AN AGE MORE) and my covenant shall stand fast with him. His seed also will I make to endure forever, (FOR AN AGE), and his throne as the days of heaven. My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips. Once have I sworn by my holiness that I will not lie unto David. His seed shall endure forever, (FOR AN AGE) and his throne as the days of heaven. Selah." Psa. lxxxix. 3, 4, 27-29, 34-36. From Genesis to Revelations the same terms are used to denote the duration of the punishment of all incorrigible sinners that are used to represent the duration of the rewards of the righteous. This penalty is placed in antithesis to the promised words. This reward for obedience and punishment for disobedience of the same law, are qualified by the same terms expressive of duration. The same measuring line is also used to represent the existence of God. The same rules of interpretation which will limit the threatened penalty, will also limit the promised reward. Wherever these terms are used to denote limited periods of time, these limitations are plainly stated.

Correspondence.

BRETHREN:—I wish to say a word or two concerning the church in Cleveland. Some have supposed, because the meeting house was moved away so that the brethren did not meet in it, that their light had gone out, while others who did not know it was disposed of, still supposed that the church in Cleveland had a house of their own.

Now I wish to say that neither is true. For reasons which I need not state here, they sold the meeting house, but they now meet in Beck's Hall, corner of Woodland and Case avenues, on the first day of the week to break bread, at 10½ a. m., which they find to be better in every respect except that there is no shed for the teams.

Perhaps it is not generally known that there are but very few brethren in Cleveland, most of them living from three to twelve miles away. Though I am sorry to confess that some—and those mostly the older members—seldom meet with us, yet we have some live members who are nearly always in their places, who would be glad to meet with any brother or sister who may pass this way.

I notice also that our brother Reed, in the list of preachers, has accredited to Cleveland. Now it is true he has spent a few weeks in Cleveland, during the summer, but he has again returned to his home in North Carolina.

GEORGE FLTON.

Gleanings.

Brother R. V. Lyon of Suspension Bridge, N. Y., reports Oct. 27th, that a few months ago he immersed eleven into Christ, and recently seven others. He says further: "I wish the RESTITUTION success in proclaiming the Gospel. I am deeply interested in many articles appearing in it.

The following letter we give in full in our gleanings, believing it will be read with interest:

BROTHER REED:—For so I will address you, though I have not been immersed into the Christ since I have believed in the faith once delivered to the saints, and am not, therefore, by law—the law of Christ—a member of the royal family.

My husband has taken the RESTITUTION, and we are both readers and believers in the precious truths taught in the columns of that paper. We are alone in the faith here. The RESTITUTION is all the preaching we have. My husband has often wished he could hear some of your evangelists preach. If we had the means we would pay the expenses for some one to come and hold meetings and immerse us. I have desired to be an obedient believer of the word of life ever since I have been a reader of the RESTITUTION. We take great comfort in having God's Word made plain to us through the columns of the paper. We were both baptized when quite young; I was at the age of sixteen years baptized by the Baptists, and was taught that if we believed in Jesus and was baptized, we should go to heaven when we die.

I am deaf and cannot hear preaching, so your papers and tracts are a great comfort to us. Remember us in your prayers.

L. B. CHAMBERLAIN.

NORTH WILBRAM, CONN., Oct. 18, 1875.

Upon the above we will remark, that since the Bible does not teach apostolic succession, nor does history sustain an unbroken chain of transmitted authority, from the apostles to the present, but a broken chain in twenty-six places, therefore, the validity of the ordinance of baptism does not depend upon the character of the administrator, but upon the faith of the candidate. This being true, we would say to brother and sister Chamberlain that in the absence of any one to administer the ordinance, go to the living—running water and the husband administer the ordinance to the wife, and in turn the wife to the husband.

The Reign of Christ.

We hear much about the spiritual reign of Christ on the earth; that he is even now reigning in the hearts of men, and that this spiritual reign is the coming of Christ so frequently spoken of in the Scriptures!

How strange the delusion! when the Scriptures so repeatedly and unmistakably refer to the personal reign of Christ on the earth in the same body in which he ascended to heaven! How strange that the church, the bride, the lamb's wife, should be so well satisfied with the absence of her lord!

What would an absent husband think if he should learn that his wife, who professed great love for him, was perfectly satisfied with his absence, having no desire for his return on the assumption that he was present in spirit. The woman who washed the feet of Jesus with her tears, and then wiped them with the hairs of her head, could not have been satisfied with his spiritual presence, which she undoubtedly had. The spiritual presence, as it is called, may satisfy those who had experienced no trials or sorrows, and are living at their ease, but the afflicted ones who are suffering from disease, or annoyed with debts, toiling for a scanty subsistence, all such rejoice in the glorious hope that Jesus will again come to this earth in person to break up oppression and tyrany of every kind, and alleviate the condition of the suffering every where, and reward every man according to his works.

Among the professed followers of the Lord Jesus, at his coming, there will be unspeakable joy or the deepest anguish. By a sudden change, in the twinkling of an eye, the bodies of many will be made immortal; they will realize that for them "there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things are passed away."

But this happy change will not be experienced by all the professed followers of Jesus; there will be weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth among those who have lightly estimated the value of that priceless gift of God, eternal life. All such will realize that they cannot escape the punishment of death, and that everlasting.

We are saved by faith, but faith in the Lord Jesus Christ involves the belief in the oft repeated declarations of Scripture that Jesus will return again to this earth, and establish an everlasting kingdom, the saved ones to be associated with him in the government of the earth. The kingdom of God like every other kingdom will embrace both rulers and subjects, but the rulers will be immortal, eternal life be theirs only. The subjects of the kingdom may have a prolonged life, according to their obedience, but eventually they are to die forever. The strong delusion of an immortal soul will have vanished.

Reader, eternal life can be secured by seeking for it, although "few there be that find it."—Recently Visitor.

Sadducees and Pharisees.

Thanks to the researches of Jost and others, something like a satisfactory account can now be given of the origin and nature of the two great Jewish parties, Sadducees and Pharisees. The Sadducees were really a political party consisting of the descendants of Aaron and the distinguished lay families, who were conservative and averse to change. Unless a man belonged by birth to this close and compact aristocracy, he could not be a Sadducee, however much he might sympathize with their political and religious views. They first appeared under the Asmonean princes, and it is probable the tradition which derives their name from Zadok, a contemporary (probably) of Jonathan, the brother of Judas Maccabeus, is correct.

The Pharisees were rather a religious party than a social or political one. The word pherism means separated, and was applied to them from their scrupulousness in avoiding those whose contact might make them ceremonially unclean. They were especially popular and democratic, and included not only the mass of the people and the Scribes, but also many of the wives of Sadducees, and even some priests who had shaken off the prejudices of their caste. The Pharisees insisted upon the minute carrying out of all the injunctions of the law, together with the interpretation or tradition with which it had been overloaded by the Scribes. The tradition was placed on a footing with the law, and many doctrines, such as the Zoroastrian conception of angels and evil spirits, or the transmigration of souls, rightly regarded as novelties by the Sadducees, were superadded to the teachings of the Old Testament. The controversies between the two parties show that the Christian fathers were in error who, like Tertullian, asserted that the Sadducees admitted none of the Old Testament except the Pentateuch. As a matter of fact they admitted even the traditions stamped with antiquity, though they did not value them so highly as did the Pharisees. Their rejection of the belief in immortality was based partly upon the obscurity with which it is covered in the Old Testament, partly on the ground that the Pharisees had derived the doctrine from the Persians. However, as was to be expected in an aristocratic political party, the Sadducees had no theological system of their own. They were conservatives, and determined to cling firmly to the power they found in their hands. The Pharisees, on the other hand, exalted the Scribe above the priest; multiplied the ordinances and ceremonies of their religion; did not shrink from admitting foreign elements into it, if they thought its interest required them; and not only endeavored to limit the privileges of the priesthood, but tried to extend to the whole community duties the priests claimed for themselves.—The Independent.

Old Catholicism is spreading in Italy. It has constituted itself a denomination under the name of "Italian National Catholic Church," and is represented by 3,000 members.

Women are more like flowers than we think. In their dress and adornments they express their natures, as the flowers do their petals and colors. Some women are like the modest daisies and violets, they never feel better than when dressed in a morning wrapper. Others are not themselves unless they can flame out in gorgeous dyes, like the tulips or the blush-rose. Who has not seen women just like white lilies? We know several double marigolds and poppies. There are women fit only for velvets, like the dahlias; others are graceful and airy, like azaleas. Now and then you see hollyhocks and sunflowers. When women are free to dress as they like, uncontrolled by others, and not limited by their circumstances, they do not fail to express their true characters.

SAN FRANCISCO, Cal., Oct. 8.—The memoranda of the steamer Great Republic report that during the latter part of her passage, with a moderate breeze, there was a heavy swell from the northwest. Reports from various points on the coast, from Santa Cruz to Cape Mendocino, mention a similar heavy sea, without wind, the waves rolling upon the beach from 100 to 300 feet beyond the usual high water mark, in some instances with sufficient force to carry coasters from their moorings. These facts, in conjunction with the recent slight earthquake shocks felt in this city and vicinity, are thought here to indicate a great convulsion in some distant quarter of the globe.

The Berlin correspondent of the London Times telegraphs that a small Russian force has been sent to Karateghin, 150 miles south of Khokand. The English claim, according to their official maps, that Karateghin is in Afghan territory. Afghanistan, it will be remembered, is the one strip of territory lying between the Russian outposts and the frontier of British India. It is also the strip of territory whose independence one of Victoria's ministers promised, about six months since, should be defended and preserved intact at all hazards. Really the Czar is pushing forward at a more rapid pace than anybody could have foreseen; and if his troops have garrisoned Karateghin, it is very probable that England will alter her "official maps" rather than dispute his claim. But where will it end?

Origin of the Word "Protestant."

With the month of April is associated the derivation and denomination in a formal and official manner of the designation of Protestant. The Emperor Charles the Fifth called a diet at Spires in 1529 to request aid from the German princes against the Turks, and to devise means for allaying the disputes growing out of Luther's rebellion against Catholicism. The diet condemned the reformers and issued a decree in support of the doctrines of the ancient church. Against this decree six Lutheran princes and the deputies of thirteen towns of the empire formally protested on April 17, 1530. From this act the designation of Protestant, which then was given to the followers of Luther, is derived. The Calvinists were subsequently included, and the title became general for all the sects outside the original Christian church. The six protesting princes were John and George the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, Ernest and Frances, the two dukes of Lunenburg; the Landgrave of Hesse, and the Prince of Anhalt.

THE RESTITUTION,
Plymouth, Indiana.

Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the Restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the christ as King of Kings, of the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Communications.—The Editor must not be understood as endorsing all the sentiments entertained by correspondents whose articles are inserted under this head. Each writer is alone responsible for the article bearing his own signature. The teaching of any writer is not endorsed, an article setting forth the views of the party differing may be forwarded. Free discussion of Bible doctrine on all sides will be allowed, but the Editor reserves the publicity of criticising those communications which antagonize a belief and obedience of the Gospel as a means of salvation, or which undermine its principles.

The One Baptism vs. Three Dips.

BY WILEY JONES.

An effort has been made to prove that three dips belong to the Gospel dispensation by the following vague and incongruous method: It is argued that all whom John baptized had been once "baptized unto Moses" as Levi paid tithes in Abraham; then John's baptism would be the second; then it is claimed that Christ baptized none but those whom John had baptized, and that this makes the third dip.

But the Scripture says that "Jesus made and baptized more disciples than John, (though it was not Jesus himself, but his disciples who immersed."—Campbell's Translations.

"Disciples" here, is in the nominative case (hoi mathetai) showing that they are the actors, not the acted upon—Jno. iv. 1, 2. In baptizing more than John, they must needs have immersed some whom John had not immersed.

Three dippers appeal to history, but the Lord has not made our salvation depend on the writings of erring and uninspired historians. It is an old maxim that "the Bible and the Bible only, is the creed of Protestants." Acts xx. 32. Even the Episcopal church has declared in article vi. that "1. By Scripture contained all things necessary to salvation; so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man, that it should be believed as an article of the faith, or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation." But let us see how history helps their case. Tertullian, about A. D., 200, says, "we are thrice immersed, making a somewhat ampler pledge than the Lord has appointed in the Gospel."—De. Cor. c. 3, Clark's English edition, Edinburgh, 1809.

In his debate with Rice (who advocated sprinkling), Campbell quotes Lemborch as calling baptism "a mere pledge." Debate, p. 472. Campbell also says, in reply to Rice, "The gentleman tells you of the trine immersion of Tertullian. * * * And what have we to do with these eccentricities? It only makes the argument stronger; for, if they thus submitted to three immersions instead of one, how strong their faith in immersion. The Gospel commands one immersion, but it seems they got to three." Debate, p. 248.

In a work, however, which notices the reader that it "is not final," I find this extract from Tertullian translated thus—"we are immersed three times, answering something more than the Lord in the Gospel appointed." There seems but little real difference in the meaning, for if the one immersion which the Lord has appointed in the Gospel is "the answer of a good conscience," (1 Pet. iii. 21,) then of course the three immersions would be like "answering something more" than He appointed. Respondentes, rendered "answering," is the participle of respondeo, one meaning of which is Antitheti's Ainsworth," is, "to act suitably;" hence Tertullian's "amplius aliquid respondentes quam," would indicate that he was guilty of the monstrous notion of trying to act somewhat more suitably than the Lord has appointed, or trying in some way to amend the Lord's ordinance"; This was the sin of the Pharisees trying to amend the Lord's ordinances, and to do "something more" or ampler" than He had ordained; thus "making the word of God of none effect through their traditions." Mark vii. 7, 13. But why does Tertullian take such a monstrous position? The context proves that he was trying to justify oral tradition; for, after naming several other things "ampler" or "something more" than the Lord has appointed, he says, "If, for these and other such rules, you insist upon having positive scripture injunction, you will find none. Tradition will be held forth to you as the originator of them. * * * These instances, therefore, will make it sufficiently plain that you can vindicate the keeping of even unwritten tradition when it has been established by custom." This assertion of Tertullian, however, is so grossly unscriptural as hardly to need serious refutation. It is about as absurd as for a sinner who has grown old in crime to say that his course has become justifiable from the fact of his having been so long at it! Watson mentions "that disposition to improve upon God's ordinances, for which even the close of the second century was remarkable, and which laid the foundation of that general corruption which so speedily followed." Institutes p. 442. If the three dips could be traced even to Apostolic times, this would not prove the practical and Apostolical right; for many heresies arose even while the apostles were living, as Acts, the Epistles, and the messages to the seven churches prove. Acts xv. 5; xx. 29, 30; 1 Cor. xv. 12; 2 Thes. ii. 7; Rev. ii. iii. Speaking of Tertullian's times, Rice says: "If those days objected to one immersion as decidedly as to pouring or sprinkling. Indeed, they considered it a matter of such importance, that in one of the early councils, as Dr. Gale informs us, it was decreed, that a bishop should be deposed if he ventured to baptize a person by one immersion only." Debate with Campbell, p. 252. Here we have even historical evidence of the existence of the "one immersion" at that "early" day, and hence that Munzer in 1522 could not have been the originator of it. If it had not been in existence, how could laws have been made against it by the "early councils" of the growing apostacy? "The Edinburgh Encyclopedia" says: "Baptism in the Apostolic age was performed by immersion. * * * Immediately after the Apostolic age, however, trine immersion was introduced." Vol. iii. 1832. Of course then this "trine immersion," as it is called, cannot be of Divine authority, but must be merely a human tradition, if it was not introduced until "immediately after the Apostolic age."

We say then, let us "hold fast the form of sound words," even the wholesome words of Holy Scripture, which plainly teach that "there is one body, and one spirit, and also ye were called in one hope of your calling, one Lord, one faith, one immersion, one God and Father of all." 2 Tim. i. 13; Ephes. iv. 4, 5. The Seed of Abraham According to the Flesh, and According to the Promise.

Having looked over articles in the Advent Christian Times and in the RESTITUTION, on the above subject, I desire space in the RESTITUTION for two or three articles on the same: as I can not have a hearing in the Times, and have no claims upon either paper, I shall be compelled to venture on the good will of the editor of the RESTITUTION.

Will the Jews, as a people be restored back to the same old land of promise, and in mortal flesh have portion in the kingdom of God?

To me this looks like a strange controversy for Bible readers to raise. I have no issue to make with the people called Adventists, on the above, as far as the present gospel age is concerned. They were broken off and thrust out among the nations, and stand on a level with them. But what is the future purpose of God concerning them? How could the Deity, by his prophets, predict the calling of the Gentiles when he was held and firmly bound in the covenant of Sinai to make them a kingdom and a priesthood, and to make them the head of all nations? If rejection was to come at the time of the setting up of the kingdom, there is nothing after. But the chosen obtain it and the rest were blinded. Romans xi: 7.

They could seek consistently for what was promised in their covenant, that is, to become kings and priests in God's kingdom, the head of all nations.

Hear Paul, Romans xi: 12: "But if their fall is the wealth of the world, and their failure the wealth of the Gentiles, how much more will their full acceptance be?" Here it is positive and clear that the same persons who blundered and fell will be accepted again. The throne fell first, (See Ezekiel xxi: 25, 26,) then the priesthood and judgship, then the tribes were scattered, and now for the order to be observed in setting up this tabernacle of David that is fallen down.

That the throne will be occupied by the Christ, the Christ, there is no dispute. The question is in respect to the resettlement of the twelve literal tribes, their place in the kingdom, and the position to be occupied by the glorified body, the heavenly, the royal house of David. If the following texts do not settle the return of the twelve tribes, then no amount of evidence could:

Isaiah xi: 12-15; xviii: 2-7; xxx: 18-24; xxxv: 10; lx: 9-11; lxi: 4, 5, 6; lxvi: 13 to end. Jer. iii: 16-19; xxiii: 3-9; xxx: 15-23; 130, 20; Ezek. xx: 39 to 45; xxviii: 25 to end; Hosea iii: 4-5; Amos ii: 14, 15; Rev vii: 1-8.

Be it remembered that this sealing of twelve thousand out of each of the twelve tribes of Israel takes place after the Lord's day comes.

The world wanders after the beast, and the world has been taught that when Jesus comes probation ceases; hence they are prepared to wait because of him. It is them that cry for rocks and mountains to fall on them.

But beyond this there is a glorious future for the tribes of Israel and the left of the nations; and if all this array of prophecy is conditional, then, indeed, we had a conditional Bible and it all failed when Israel stumbled. Here is God's kingdom restored, and the riches of the world of which Paul speaks: the Messiah on David's throne, the twelve tribes resettled in that old land, surveyed off to them according to their tribes, (see Ezek. forty-eighth chapter), the sanctuary in the midst of the land, (see Ezek., forty-fifth chapter), priests and Levites taken from among them, making their offerings, Ezek. xliv: 15 to end; Isa. lxvi. 21; Mal. iii: 3-7.

Yes, sir, offerings in the age to come, because there will be probation; there were offerings made to God from the days of Abel till the Christ made the one offering of himself for the age, for by one offering he permanently perfected those being sanctified. Heb. x: 14.

"Having therefore, brethren, confidence concerning the entrance of the holies, by the blood of Jesus, which way he consecrateth for us through the vail, (that is, his flesh recently killed and yet is living;) and having a great Priest over the house of God. Heb. x: 19-21.

Jesus is the High Priest of the house of God, the house of Abraham, the house of Judah, the house of David; by promise this house is the new and heavenly, the regenerated, the royal house of David that rules over the literal or fleshly seed of Abraham, and then all nations.

Here is the wealth of the world, instead of a kingdom of God in a little strip of country in Asia, defined by the river on the north, the river of Egypt on the south, the sea on the west and on the east—the dominion under the whole heavens. And when Jesus comes, having obtained the kingdom, his princes are prepared, having been called out of the Gentiles by the Gospel, for this very purpose. While here he formed a nucleus, the little band, gave them the promise of twelve thrones over the twelve tribes of the restored kingdom of Israel; then, having made the purchase of the forfeited dominion of his father David, he gave them their commission, to the nations, and when a people are taken out who are to be made princes in all the earth. See Psalms xiv: 14 to end.

Behold a king shall reign in righteousness and princes shall rule in judgment. Isaiah xxxii. 1.

I saw a great white throne, and him that sat thereon. Rev. xx.

Let it be remembered that in this book of similitudes white is the emblem of righteousness; the white robes is the emblem of saints. The white throne of this chapter is the one of Isaiah. He says: A king shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgment. John says: I saw thrones and they sat on them, and judgment was given to them. This is the throne of the age lasting judgment that Paul speaks of in Hebrews, as one of the first principles of the doctrine of the anointed. Surely, men ought to know the first rudiments of a thing before they go out to teach others.

By the fall of fleshly Israel the Gentiles gained the rich Gospel of the Kingdom. By their fulness the world will gain a glorious government. The reign of righteousness lasts for that period of time called by John a thousand years; by Paul, for ages of ages; by Gabriel to Mary, for the ages; by the prophets through all generations it will last till the seed of Abraham shall be multiplied as the sands of the sea, and the stars of heaven. John says that the little ones and the great ones stood in the presence of this throne and were judged each one according to his work, and whosoever was not written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire. I am prepared to prove, if any doubt it, that not in this article, for I have not the space, that not one literal resurrected party enters into this judgment. But let us have the testimony of Jeremiah, thirty-first chapter, from the 28 verse to the end of the chapter. I give the 28th, 29th, 30th and 31st verses, as follows:

And it shall come to pass that like as I have watched over them, to pluck up and to break down, and to throw down, and to destroy, and to afflict; so will I watch over them to build, and to plant, saith the Lord. In those days they shall say no more, The fathers have eaten a sour grape, and the children's teeth are set on edge. But every one shall die for his own iniquity: every man that eateth the sour grape his teeth shall be set on edge. Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah.

This is just where John places it. All men die now, because of the transgression of the first man, and this is the first death, the Adamic penalty. But this runs no farther than his dominion runs. When the second Adam is seated on the throne of righteousness, then the soul that sins, it shall die, for its own sin; not the first death, a gradual wasting of years, but shall be destroyed, cast into the lake of fire—an emblem of destruction. And this is the death, the second, the death, (that is, the 1st is no longer.) Then he that does that which is right and lawful—keeps the new covenant—he shall live, he shall not die. Oh, the glorious future!

But let us hear the purpose of the Deity:

Thus saith the Lord, If my covenant be not with day and night, and if I have not appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth; then will I cast away the seed of Jacob, and David my servant, so that I will not take any of his seed to be rulers over the seed of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob; for I will cause their captivity to return, and have mercy on them. Jer. xxxiii: 24, 26.

Mark this language. It may be said to be conditional, but the "if" is dependent on the breaking of the ordinances of heaven and earth, day and night. Here it is declared that God will take the seed of Jacob and David to be rulers over the seed of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Here we have Israel after the flesh, and Israel after the promise, rulers and the ruled. I challenge all the Adventists of the continent to set up the kingdom of God and leave out the twelve tribes of Israel according to the flesh. We would have the Messiah seated on this throne to reign over the house of Jacob, and the house not there. We would find the twelve apostles seated on the twelve thrones to be the judges of the twelve tribes of Israel, but no tribes there. The judgship restored in Israel, as at the beginning, and the beginning, and the day of judgment in the past for their theory places the judgment i. e., before the Lord reigns in Mount Zion. But in order to evade and overthrow the plain and literal statements of the old prophets concerning the restoration of Israel, and proration in the age to come, they appeal to the Book of Revelations, and yet as I now believe that it is highly figurative. One of their main texts is in Rev. xxii: 4, where John is made to say that there shall be no more death. I give here the reading of the Diaglott:

And he will wipe away every tear from their eyes, (from the eyes of his people,) and the death shall be no longer.

But I would ask, which death? For in this book, and in this book alone, the second death is spoken of; and there cannot be a second death without a first, any more than there can be a second Adam without a first. And now which, the first or the second death? John said, The death is not longer. It has run its course, and expired. The first Adam, as ruler of the world, runs his course, and gives place to the second, who is from heaven. John says, The sea is no more. But which sea? the Pacific, Atlantic, Mediterranean, or the sea of glass that the conquerors of the beast put down under their feet. Let them remember that in this book waters are peoples and nations. See Revelations, 17th chapter. The sea would be the greater body as that dominion of the apostacy. This goes under last, for the saints take the kingdom.

A Few Plain Scriptural Truths.

"God only hath immortality."—1 Tim. vi. 16.

Immortality, or eternal life, is a gift of God through Jesus Christ:—a gift to be conferred on all who by patient continuance in well doing seek for it. Rom. ii. 7.

God who cannot lie has promised to Abraham all the land of Canaan—the land in which he then dwelt—to be inherited by him and his seed forever This promise was repeatedly made, and can admit of no other meaning than that the land on which Abraham walked is yet to be possessed by him and his seed for an everlasting possession. Any attempt to spiritualize away these plain promises, coming from God direct, cannot but be offensive to him, as it is saying virtually that God has not spoken the truth. Gen. xiii. 14-17; xvii. 8; xxii. 16-18; Psa. cv. 9-11; Micah vii. 20; Acts vii. 4, 5; Heb. vi. 9; xiii. 39, 40.

The promises made to Abraham and his seed includes the Gentiles, to whom the door of faith has been opened through Jesus Christ. God is now visiting the Gentiles, taking out from among them a people for his name, and blindness in part is happened to Israel until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in. Gal. iii. 14 16, 29; Acts xv. 14; Rom. xi. 25.

Jesus the Christ, the Son of God, the seed of Abraham, who has suffered death on the cross, and was raised from the dead, and received into heaven, will come again in like manner as he was seen to go into heaven. The heavens must receive him until the times of restitution of all things. Acts i. 11; iii. 20, 21.

The Son of Man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels, and then he shall reward every man according to his works. Read Matt. xxi. 27.

The Lord Jesus at his coming will raise from among the dead, and change from among the living, all who are to be honored with the gift of eternal life, and their bodies will then be fashioned like unto his glorious body. Phil. iii. 20, 21.

The Lord Jesus will then establish the kingdom of God on the earth, and will sit on the throne of his father David, and will be King over all the earth. Zech. xiv. 9; Luke i. 32, 33; Acts ii. 30.

Jerusalem, now being trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled, will be the city of the great King. Luke xxi. 24; Matt. v. 35.

All who are honored with the gift of eternal life will reign with Christ in the government of the earth. They will judge the world, and reign on the earth as kings and priests. 1 Cor. vi. 2; 2 Tim. ii. 12; Rev. v. 10; Dan. vii. 18, 27.

The nations of the earth will go from year to year to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, in Jerusalem. Any rebellious nation will be scourged by drought Jer. iii. 17; Micah iv. 2; Isa. lx. 12.

The unrighteous, the murderer, the adulterer, the fornicator, the thief, the liar, the drunkard, the unforgiving, the covetous, and all who have no faith in God's promises, will be shut out from immortality, or eternal life in the Kingdom of Christ and God. Gal. v. 19-21; Eph. v. 5.

Death will continue to prevail on the earth during the days of judgment until the expiration of a thousand years' reign of Christ and the saints, after which there shall be no more death. Christ must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. 1 Cor. xv. 25, 26; Rev. xx. 6; xxi. 4.

The righteous shall never be removed, but the wicked shall not inhabit the earth. The earth abideth forever. The righteous shall inherit the land, and dwell therein forever. The meek shall inherit the earth. Psa. xxxvii. 29; Eccl. i. 4; Matt. v. 5; Prov. x. 30.

To be saved, or to obtain salvation, is to inherit the gift of eternal life in the kingdom of God; this will be accomplished by the change of the body from the mortal to an immortal state. This wonderfully glorious gift of God will be received by the saints at the coming of the Lord.

To believe that Abraham and his seed, by a resurrection from among the dead, through his Son Jesus the Christ, is to believe the gospel. Faith in God's promises will lead to baptism for the remission of sins. The faith that saves will be accompanied by good works, for by their fruits ye shall know them.

These plain scriptural truths conflict with the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, a doctrine not taught in the Scriptures, but so universally believed, that to doubt or question it will cause the Christian to be shunned as a disturber of the peace of the church. If the doctrine of the immortality of the soul be true, then God's promises to Abraham and his seed, of the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession, were of no value whatever.

The immortal soul believer lives in expectation of that which God has never promised to give, a kingdom in the skies, where a resurrection of the dead, so earnestly preached by Paul, can be entirely dispensed with, and where all the glorious things spoken of the future Jerusalem on the earth, can be to them a matter of no importance.

Dear reader, the immortality or eternal life revealed in the Scriptures is worth the seeking. It is God's gift, and therefore cannot be mean.

The Scriptures are full of glowing descriptions of the future earth, made more beautiful by the glorious appearing of its inhabitants, and where there will be no more pain, or tears, or death, but where joy and gladness will everywhere abound, and this state is to continue throughout all ages, forever.

BEVERLY, N. J.

Verbal Vices,

Indulgence in verbal vice soon encourages corresponding vices in conduct. Let any one of you come to talk about any mean or vile practice with a familiar tone, and do you suppose, when the opportunity occurs for committing the mean or vile act, he will be as strong against it as before? It is by no means an unknown thing that men of correct lives talk themselves into crime, into sensuality, into perdition. Bad language easily runs into deeds. Select any infidelity you please; suffer yourself to converse in its dialect, to use its slang, to speak in the character of one who relishes it, and I need not tell how soon your moral sense will lower down to its level. Becoming intimate with it, you lose horror of it. To be too much with bad men and in bad places, is not only unwholesome to a man's morality, but unfavorable to his faith and trust in God. It is not every man who could live as Lot did in Sodom, and then be fit to go out of it under God's convoy. This obvious principle of itself furnishes a reason not only for watching the tongue, but for keeping ourselves as much as possible out of the company of bad characters.—Ref.

Moody's Revivals.

Some people have an idea that those who embrace Christianity under Moody's preaching, get a better kind than can be obtained elsewhere. We would not in any way disparage any effort which tends to build men up in a higher and purer manhood; but we seriously question whether true Christianity ever gained anything by too much excitement. The following from the Covenanter, published in Londonderry, Ireland, reviews the Moody and Sankey work in London, in the following manner:

"A very suggestive document is now before the public, which has been called 'The Revival Balance Sheet.' It is the financial account of the committees who had charge of the movement in London in which Messrs. Moody and Sankey were central figures. The receipts reached a total £20,250 from 2,750 subscribers. One gave £500, seven gave £100 each, twelve £50 each, forty-six £10 each, thirty-six £10 10s each, two hundred and nine £5 each, sixty-nine £3 5s each, and four hundred and sixty-nine £2 each. Only twenty-seven sent in a half-a-crown each, and stronger still, only fifteen contributed a shilling each. The significance of these figures cannot be exaggerated, and the feeling they are calculated to excite is deepened when we remember the daily advertisements of the committee calling on those who had received benefit to contribute. We read of the thousands, nay, hundreds of thousands, who filled the places of assembly, of the multitudes who crowded the 'inquiry rooms.' If a hundred thousand had sent in a shilling each the balance sheet would have surprised us less. But what of the spiritual results? These can only be known by their effects. We have seen that the money raised came from a comparatively small number, and these among the wealthy classes. The prayer-meeting has dwindled down almost to nothing. Where thousands assembled when Moody, Sankey, and American organ were present, only from 150 to twenty are to be found. The requests for prayer, which took so long to read that they had to be classified, have all but ceased. A large increase of church membership was expected, particularly in the north of London, round the Agricultural Hall, where the meetings were so crowded. But, instead, the ministers report an actual decrease in the number of those seeking the membership of the church. During the past two years about a quarter of a million has been expended on the work of these Americans. We look for results in vain. If the same amount had been expended on the ordinary means of grace, some solid and lasting results would have been obtained. In four months, in London alone, a sum has been expended more than six times the income of the Home Missionary Society, and more than one-fourth of the entire revenue of the London Missionary Society. The worst of all this is that the money that used to be given to these most beneficial societies, and to others of the same class, has been lavished on this so-called revival."

Sardis.

"Thou hast a few names even in Sardis which have not defiled their garments; and they shall walk with me in white: for they are worthy."—Rev. iii. 4.

In ascertaining what the true moral condition of any church may be, we must have reference to the dispositions and conduct of its individual members. We can best learn this by following them in their dispersion through the week. It is not so much how they may appear in their collective capacity when gathered for public and social worship, but let us ask how they act when thrown upon their own resources in their daily transactions with the world. What use do they make of time that most precious of all trusts? The dying queen of England learned its worth when too late, as she exclaimed in anguish, "Millions for a moment of time!" "I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day; the night cometh, when no man can work," is an expression of our Savior showing the value he set upon time. What use do they make of the surplus means with which God has entrusted them? "To do good and to communicate forget not; for with such sacrifices God is well pleased" is a solemn admonition of the apostle to his brethren.

Riches are a dangerous snare. Let us hear the apostle again on this subject: "They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition." Men must not trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God which giveth us richly all things to enjoy. And the Word of God enjoins upon all that have wealth, to do good, to be rich in good works; to be ready to distribute; to be willing to communicate, and thus lay up in store a good foundation against the time to come; and thus, too, to lay hold on eternal life. Multitudes are, in our day, laboring for a crown of eternal glory for the perishable pelf of this life.

But, again, how do individual church members transact their business? Are they prayerful and thankful to God for all his mercies? Are they persons of truth and honor in whom all can have implicit confidence? Are they really the servants of Christ who regard his cause as paramount to all others? Is the Word of God, in which the people of God anciently took so much delight, neglected, and all their energies given to business, sensual delights, or pursuits wholly worldly? Have they any likeness to Christ who came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and give his life a ransom for many.

These are a few of the questions that help to determine the condition of a church, which can only be a living, spiritual, body in the aggregate, as it is composed of living, spiritual members.

Sardis, as a church, had a name to live, and was dead. The last publications of its spiritual life were found in a little few names that had not defiled their garments; to whom the Lord promised that they should walk with him in white, for they were worthy. Were the Savior to pronounce on the moral condition of the churches of these last days, what would be his decision? Let us not think that we are not subjected to the scrutiny of him that searches the heart, and tries the reins, because we have no secular denomination of the fact. There is not a church of baptized believers upon earth, that escapes his scrutinizing inspection. If we have lost our first love, if we have become entangled in the world, if we have become disheartened and disgusted on account of repeated failures, or even if we have fallen into sin, we have a great and faithful high priest that can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities. All his words to the churches are words of admonition and comfort. Garment, as a figure, represents character. To keep our garments unspotted, is to maintain purity of character. The fine, white linen, is only a figure for righteousness. It is the Sardian few, of the spotless raiment, that will join the white-robed company of the redeemed in the soon coming day of deliverance. May we be of the number.

✕ Luke XXI. 33. Generation.

"Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass away till all be fulfilled."

A brother writes: I would like an explanation of the text, "This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled."

Y. D. B.

1. Some have supposed that the prophecy given in Luke is not the same as that given as recorded by Matt. xxiv, inasmuch as Luke records the casting into the treasury by the rich and the poor, verses 1-4, and the prophecy, verses 5-28, without mentioning any walk from the temple to Olivet as intervening, while Matthew describes the prophecy as having been spoken to the disciples while on Olivet. But this idea is refuted when we consult Matthew's and Luke's records in connection with Mark's. Mark records the casting into the treasury xii. 41-44; the moving out from the temple to Olivet, and the conversation on the way, xiii. 1-2; and the completing of the conversation while on the mount, vs. 3-37. Therefore, the prophecy as recorded in Matt. xxiv.; Mark xiii.; and Luke xxi., is one.

2. Many, in order to escape from the force of the language of Luke xxi. 31, upon the organization of the kingdom; and others to escape the doctrine of a literal coming and judgment of Jesus, claim that the entire prophecy was fulfilled when Titus led the Roman army against Jerusalem; and as proof, cite the word "immediately," Matt. xxiv. 29. But as in the case above, let us interpret Scripture by Scripture.

Turn to Matt. xxiv. 29: Immediately after those days,

1. The sun shall be darkened.
2. The moon shall not give her light.
3. The stars shall fall from heaven.
4. The powers of the heavens shall be shaken.
5. The sign of the Son of Man in heaven shall appear.
6. The tribes of the earth shall mourn.
7. They shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven in power and great glory.

Now as in the former case, Mark gave an account of the intervening walk from the temple to Olivet, thus harmonizing Matthew and Luke, so Luke throws in some intervening incidents at this point, enabling us to interpret Matthew and Mark. As intervening incidents between the distress upon the Jews at the destruction of their city, and the signs enumerated by Matthew, we have, in Luke xxi. 24:

1. "They shall fall by the edge of the sword." This was fulfilled of course in the destruction of their city.

2. "And shall be led away captive into all nations." History informs us that this was not done until after the city fell.

3. "And Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." This could not have commenced until the Gentiles took possession of it under Titus. Also this Gentile authority continues yet, and will continue until there is a fulfillment of Acts xv. 14 - a sufficient number taken out of the Gentiles as heirs of God and joint heirs of Jesus to establish the Kingdom.

Chronologically then comes the signs as given by Matthew which were to immediately follow the great tribulation. If there is an intervention between the tribulation and the signs then the incidents given by Luke must fill up that period. But if the signs are joined hard upon the tribulation, as the word "immediately" seems to indicate, then the tribulation must reach to the removal of Gentile authority from the city. See Zech. xiv.; Daniel vii. 1-3.

But a question we will drop here. If the tribulation reached to the close of the seige by Titus, as is generally admitted, and these six points as enumerated above, given by Matthew, were to come between the tribulation and the coming of the Savior, how could the the coming of the Savior have been at the destruction of the city? And how could Titus' army have been the angels? Impossible. Impossible for that which is third in order to be first.

2. Another position is, that some certain generation—age—would live to see all these signs fulfilled, and that the first—the "darkening of the sun,"—took place May 19, A. D. 1780, ninety-five and a half years ago.

But to the view that, May 19, 1780, was the dark day referred to in the prophecy, the following difficulties suggest themselves:

1. There have been other dark days as appalling in their nature, and as extensive over territory as that of May 19, 1780, which would seem to have as great claims to prophetic fulfillment.

2. The prophecy does not confine the darkness which was to be observed to any particular locality, much less to New England.

3. Why should the people of New England be so peculiarly favored by a presentation of this sign to the exclusion of of the remainder of earth's inhabitants? Or did the Savior recognize that finally Boston was to become the "hub of the world?"

4. The Sav or says: "When ye see," that is, disciples see. This sign then was to be seen by disciples. We do not intend by this remark to convey the idea that the world were not to be observers, but that the Savior said the disciples should see. Now persons do not frequently become intelligent and observant disciples before about the age of fifteen years. Then such an one would have to be one hundred and ten years of age to have as a disciple beheld that phenomenon and be living to-day. Can the advocates of that theory find one such upon the continent of America? Can they find one half dozen persons now living who have the fullest recollection of seeing the phenomenon?

5. If ninety-five years have been employed in the fulfillment of two or three of the seven points, how old would one have to be, at the same rate, who saw the first, to see the seventh? Between two and three hundred years of age.

4. But now to the word "generation," we direct attention; and first we will give a definition of the word. Our lexicons do not number their definitions as they give them, but for convenience we will give them in the order they are presented and number them in that order.

PICKERING.—Genea—1. birth, 2. generation, 3 parentage, 4. stock, 5. race, e. g. Of this race and blood I boast to you that I am, Ph. Pl. vii, 211, 6. a lineage, 7. a family, 8. descent, 9. age, 10. the age of man, etc.

DONEGAN Genea—1. generation, 2. procreation, 3. birth, 4. period of birth, 5. race, 6. the ordinary space of man's life, 7. An age—thirty years, 8. posterity, 9. progeny.

GREENFIELD.—Genea—1. a family, 2. generation, 3. descent, 4. an age, 5. race, 6. generation of men, including upon the average a space of thirty years.

Now for a definition of the word Genea in the text, shall we select Pickering's 10; Donegan's 6 and 7, and Greenfield's 6; or shall we select Pickering's 6; Donegan's 5, and Greenfield's 5. This selection must be determined by the context in which the word Genea stands. Seeing that we are not justifiable in selecting the first or primary meaning, if primary it may be called, as given by any one of these authors.

Then, Luke says, xxi. 32, "This generation shall not pass away till all be fulfilled.

Mark records, xiii. 30, "This generation shall not pass, till all these things be done.

Matthew says, xxiv. 34, "This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled.

We are left then to select our definition of the word by determining the amount of ground covered by the phrase, "These things." Does the phrase "these things," cover simply the seven points contained in the prophecy as enumerated above? If so, then the phrase refers to the rapid succession of these events which were to follow the removal of Gentile authority from the city, and justifies us in defining the word according to Pickering's 10, Donegan's 6 and 7, and Greenfield's 6: "Generation—age of 33 years."

But I am, from the expressions "Till all be fulfilled in Matt., "Till all these things be fulfilled," in Luke, and "Till all these things be done," in Mark, led to believe that the other definition should be selected—Pickering's 5, Donegan's 5, and Greenfield's 5—Race. The phrase "these things," appears to cover more time than the seven points occurring subsequent to the removal of Gentile authority from the city.

That such a definition is justifiable further, we refer to Matt. xxv. In verses 1-12, we have the virgins watching with their lamps trimmed when Jesus returns. And in verse 13 as these virgins, the apostles are addressed. The word "ye" then applies to all disciples, and covers the whole time, from the days of Jesus' ascension till his coming again. Also in verses from 14-30, we have the word servant covering the same time.

To this view, that the word generation—Genea—in this scripture means race, and refers to the Jewish people, there can be but one plausible objection urged. That objection is, that the word "until" is a word of limitation, and denotes a reverse in the existing order of things when its limit runs out; and, therefore, would denote the cessation of the Jewish people as a race, which is contrary to Bible teaching. But there are very few rules to which there are no exceptions, and as exceptions to this we mention, 1. Luke xvi. 16: "The law and the prophets were until John, etc. The law and the prophets were in existence not only till John, but till the death of Christ. See Col. ii. 14; Rom. vii. 1-6. 2. Rom. v. 13: "For until the law sin was in the world," etc. Sin has continued in the world since the law was given as well as before. Also the text before us we cite as an exception, let us chose either definition of the word "generation." If the text contemplates the people who are to witness the seven points as given by Matthew, following in rapid fulfillment the removal of Gentile authority from the city, then it contemplates many disciples as beholding these signs. Now we ask the question, will these disciples who behold these signs ending with the advent of the Savior, pass away? Let the apostle answer this question and the objection is entirely removed. See 1 Cor. xv. 51-52; 1 Thess. iv. 15-17.

Correspondence.

MR. EDITOR:—The RESTITUTION was brought to my notice sometime since by brothers Smith of St. Louis, Mo., and Sanford of Avon, Ill. Since subscribing for and receiving several copies of the same, I desire to state, in a word, that I am exceedingly well pleased with it.

My object, however, in writing at this time, is to spread before your readers as briefly as I may, a few facts relating to the journeyings and labors of our esteemed brother, Amos Sanford, whose acquaintance it was my good fortune to make in St. Louis, on or about the 9th of last month where it was my opportunity to hear him speak some three or four times; which suffered, however, to beget on my part an earnest desire to hear more of the good news relating to the kingdom and concerning the gospel plan of salvation. Therefore as his work for the time was about closed in the city, and that without any marked results, which was I may safely say for the same reason that Paul was unable to revisit certain brethren, though he greatly desired to do so. 1 Thess. ii. 18.

Under these circumstances, being about to return to my home, I invited brother S. to accompany me, where we arrived on Wednesday morning, Oct. 13.

The same day, our brother visited a Baptist church near here, where he labored for one week very acceptably. A goodly number are very much interested in his expositions and all are desirous of hearing him further on these matters.

On the 20th ult. brother S. commenced a course of lectures at this place, continuing the same for eight nights.

Our congregations were all of the time small, and consisted of Catholics, Methodists, Baptists and non-professors. Notwithstanding some hot shots were dispensed good attention and order prevailed throughout the entire course the result of which we may state in a few words:

Three of us accepted, and obeyed the Word relating to the gospel plan of salvation hence we are feeling as ever more to rejoice in the hope of Israel.

Nearly a half dozen more were, we think fully persuaded as regards their duty, yet as it is too often the case they decided to wait another opportunity, which, the providence of God permitting, we trust they may have in a few weeks, inasmuch as brother S. has promised to visit us again next month, when we hope that not only these but many others may not only be persuaded but inclined to do their duty.

H. BEADLE, M. D.

BOIS BRULE, MO., Nov. 10, 1875.

The time for our annual meeting is drawing near, and we wish to call the attention of the friends of like precious faith to the importance of having this meeting well attended. It is the desire of the friends of Bible truth at West Irving, to have this meeting a success, and to this end we invite all who have in earnest started for the kingdom of God, that possibly can, to be present with us at this annual gathering.

Come brethren, with your hearts all aglow with love for the truth as it is in Jesus. Come with an eye single to the glory of God and the salvation of mortals from death. Come with words and deeds that will say for us that we are trying to promote the cause of our blessed Master and not self.

May nothing be done through strife or vain-glory, but in meekness let us esteem others better than ourselves. In short, let us come together filled with that wisdom which is from above which is first pure then peaceable, easy to be entreated, full of good fruits.

If we thus work together as one man in one common cause, the result will be that God will be glorified, sinners converted, believers comforted and made to rejoice in hope of the glory of God. Amen.

J. T. PHIPIE.

WEST IRVING, IOWA, Nov. 6, 1875.

The RESTITUTION continues to make its weekly visits laden with the good news of the kingdom which the Father hath promised to all those that obey him. We prize it next to the Bible and could not for a moment think of being deprived of it the longer we take it the better we like it.

The truths of the kingdom are fast gaining ground in this section. We are now holding a series of meetings at Hudson City, and nine have signified their determination to obey the gospel and live for the promised region spoken of by all the holy prophets of God since the world began—all heads of families, and we expect others. The interest is such that the house does begin to accommodate the audience. May the good work continue and may many be enlightened in the things concerning the kingdom and name of Jesus.

We are certainly living in the last days. Times of peril are upon us. Let us all be faithful workers in our Master's vineyard, looking unto him for help who is the author and finisher of our faith that when he shall appear we may share a part with him.

MRS. V. B. DUNCAN.

To J. F. Willcox.

Your grateful request to hear from me (through the RESTITUTION of Oct. 20) has just met my eye (I had been absent and not seen the papers regularly). In answer, it may be proper to state that my attention was called to this point by conversation with G. S. and I. Grim, in Philadelphia, the year prior to its introduction, as a special doctrine, by the editor of the "Bible Examiner."

The question then raised, related to the grammatical value of the terms in Acts xxiv. 15, etc., and I did my best to get at the root of the matter; so when the "non-resurrection" theory was resolved on, and made the special doctrine of the "Examiner," I made my statement of "the truth" taught in that text, based on the most precise import of its terms—so far as I could grasp it.

This fact is noted only for the purpose of showing how I was led to examine this point in God's ever abiding word. I wanted to know "the truth." His "word is truth." John xvii. 17.

My testimony was published in that serial; and so far as I know, it has never been controverted, except in a general way, by advocating the opposite, in a like general way; all which left the teachings of that text, to my mind, at least, palpably plain, positive and unmistakably certain. "There shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." Amen. The first clause, "the dead," includes more than "the just;" and then the supplemental terms,—"both of the just and unjust,"—render its import as absolute as any judicial document. Furthermore, taken as it stands, it can not contravene other texts, that teach the death of the honored hea hen; with no notice save a denial of their resurrection! Psa. xlix. 12 20; Isa. xxvi. 13, 14; as contrasted with the dead, under the light of Revelation, vers. 19-21. "In their time of sudden changes." I hope to be kept from all changes, except such as are involved in an advanced Christian life; in running the Christian life; or the required growth in grace and the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." 2 Pet. iii. 17-18; Rev. xii. 1-8. Some seem to have no anchorage; and are ever afloat and at the drift of the ever changing waves. They seem to have no first "principles of the doctrine of Christ;" and it follows of course, that they never "go on to perfection." But as was said of one on inquiry, "his conversations have been so sudden and so often, that he may not know which end is up." Such displays of both human weakness and folly should humble us all.

The soul that is anchored within the veil; that has attained the assurance that God's word is truth; (and of course consistent and unchangeable, like its Almighty Author) has a divine keeper in "the Shepherd and Bishop of souls." John x. 11-16; Rev. iii. 10.

But those who make themselves, or some other poor mortal, their standard; or who take one class of texts to suppress another, have no anchorage in "the rock of ages," the "immutable things" of God's promise and oath! However, "the foundation of God standeth sure. The Lord knoweth them who are his." Though the wayside, thorny and stony ground hearers, are yet as three against the one which comes to anything at "harvest." This view, like every other rational view, should prompt the prayer, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done, in earth as it is in heaven!" Amen.

Yours in hope of life everlasting,

J. B. COOK.

Revival.

The revival we need is not only a revival of sounder Scriptural preaching, but a revival of Christian living. We have had quite a surfeit of the religion which luxuriates in the devout favors of the prayer meeting and the camp ground, which sings sweet hymns and applauds sweet sermons, and then goes straight off to its money-grasping and its pleasure-seeking and its panderings to self and sin. God forbid that we speak lightly of true spiritual emotion! But the Christianity which Christ demands is something deeper than a song or a sermon or a sacrament. It is the holy and humble imitation of himself.

The revival, then, which we need, is a revival of the religion which keeps God's commandments; which tells the truth and sticks to its promises; which pays twenty shillings to the pound; which cares more for a good character than a fine coat; " " " which denies ungodly lusts and which can be trusted in every stress of temptation. A revival which will sweeten our homes and cleanse our press and purify our politics, and cleanse our business and commerce from roguery and rottenness, would be a boon from heaven. A revival which will bring not only a Bible knowledge, but a Bible consciousness to all, is what the land is dying for. The world's sorest want to-day is more Christ-like men and women. The preaching it needs is more sermons in shoe.—Cuyler.

Facts in Natural History.

Frogs, toads and serpents never eat any food but that which they think is alive.

When a bee, wasp or hornet stings, it is nearly always at the expense of its life.

Serpents are so tenacious to life that they will live six months or longer without food.

Turtles dig holes in the sand and bury their eggs, covering them to be hatched by the sun.

A whale suckles its young, and is therefore not a fish. The mother's affection is remarkable.

Toads become torpid in winter, and hide themselves, taking no food for five or six months.

Serpents of all species shed their skins annually, like

"And when they had sung a hymn they went out into the Mount of Olives."

What song sang the twelve with the Savior
When first had the Sacrament wine?
Were they bowed and subdued in behavior,
Or bold as made bold with a sign?

Were the hairy heads strong and defiant?
Were the naked arms brawny and strong?
Were the bearded lips lifted reliant,
Thrust forth and full-throats with song?

What song they? What sweet song of Zion,
With Christ in their midst (like a crown)
While here sat St. Peter, the Iron,
And there, like a lamb, with head down,

Sat St. John, with his silken and raven
Rich hair on his shoulders, and eyes
Lifting up to the face unshaven
Like a saint to a child's in surprise.

Was the song as strong fishermen swinging
Their nets full of hope to the sea,
Or low like the ripple wave singing
Sea-songs on their level Galilee?

Were they sad with foreshadow of sorrow,
Like the kind that sing low when the heavens
Is hung in with a pale of to-morrow—
With earthquakes and shaking of seas?

Ah! soft was their song as the waves are
That fall in low, mid-sea moans;
And sad I should say as the winds are
That blow by the White Grave-stones.

News.

The Jews, because of their talents and their money, are more powerful in Hungary than in any country I know. Few as they are, they are everywhere the chief tradesmen and bankers, and they have an overwhelming influence with the public journals of the day.—Inquirer.

A letter from Odessa to the Volks says that the Jewish population of that town has been agreeably surprised by the recent promotion of a young Israelite to the grade of officer, this being the first application of the article of the new military law granting to Jews the right to the epaulette.

The first Masonic Lodge of Jerusalem is a beautiful illustration of the cosmopolitan nature of the principles of brotherly love in practical operation. The Master is an American, the Past Master an Englishman, the Senior Warden a German, the Junior Warden a native, the Treasurer, a Turk, the Secretary a Frenchman, the senior Deacon a Persian, and the Junior Deacon a Turk. There are Christians, Mohammedans and Jews in the Lodge.

The President of the Turkish Branch of the Alliance, Senor Fernandes, addressed a letter to the Wali of Smyrna, to which he requests this functionary to punish with all the severity of the law the rioters of Melas who have lately brought a false charge against the Jews, accusing them of having kidnapped a Christian child, terribly ill-used a number of them, and destroyed a large amount of property in the Jewish quarter.

News comes from Spain that the government, in a note to the Vatican, has declared that international engagements render it impossible, for grave reasons of State, to re-establish Catholic unity in Spain; and that while admitting that the Concordant has been violated, it is nevertheless compelled to accept accomplished facts, and therefore must respect the modification introduced with respect to religious toleration

Roman Catholic Testimony.

Catholicism will one day rule America, and religious freedom will be at an end.—Roman Catholic Bishop of St. Louis.

That the Catholic vote should be cast solely for the Democracy at the coming election is undoubtedly true: It is the only possible hope to break down the school system.—Tale s Catholic Review.

It will be a glorious day for the Catholics in this country, when, under the laws of justice and morality, our school system shall be shivered in pieces.—Catholic Telegraph.

If the school laws be modified to secure denominational education for all, Catholics will cheerfully pay their proportion of the school fund. If this wise amendment cannot be made, taxation for school purposes must cease.—Catholic Telegraph.

Resolved, That the public schools, ignoring all supernatural authority, and making God the first, knowledge the last thing to be learned, is a curse to our country, and a floodgate of infidelism, and of sensuality, and of evil, social and national corruption.—Resolution passed by Irish Catholics at St. Louis, Oct. 17, 1853.

Saying Grace.

It is interesting to see how universally the custom, of "saying grace" at meals is observed in England. The queen, in the absence of her chaplain reverently asks a blessing. The children do the same at their lunch. The very beggar on the curbstone, as he eats his crust looks up and says: "The Lord be thanked for this ful." The Lord provided for him at [illegible]. He is joined by the two sheriffs, and any strangers who may happen to be present. In his magisterial garb his lordship, without cant or pretense, offers a brief grace before the food is touched. At the Lord Mayor's dinner, at Guildhall, grace is sung by the entire company, rising to their feet, and singing the lines which have been sung for the same purpose since 1515. When the custer-mongers, street-sweepers, boys from the ragged schools, and street walkers, are brought together for tea, at each gathering grace is sung by the entire company, and thanks returned in the voice of song.

How to Serve God.

"And he called his ten servants, and delivered them ten pounds, and said unto them, occupy till I come." Luke xix. 13. 18. 23. What would be a wise and faithful use of this money, if rendered to God, would be acceptable service.

"Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain." 1 Cor. ix. 24. As men run a race; so, we should serve God and obtain the reward.

"Be patient, therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Behold the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and the latter rain. Be ye also patient; stablish your hearts; for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh." James v. 7, 8. When the husbandman has performed all the conditions of his expected harvest, he waits patiently for it. So we, when we have performed the conditions of salvation, and while we continue to walk in newness of life, we should look for that blessed hope, and wait patiently for God's Son from heaven.

The Apostle Paul compares his Christian life, to a fight, to a course, to an engagement. He says, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith, hence-forth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous judge will give to me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing." 2 Tim. iv. 6, 8.

Thus, we have the rule established, that if we yield ourselves to God, with the same devotion, with the same ability and with the same faithfulness and skill, that we have yielded ourselves to other things, we shall serve God acceptably. This we know how to do from our experience.

APPLICATION.

The first duty enjoined upon us in the Bible is, "To believe the Gospel." This implies that we understand it, and that we have studied it. This duty may be stated more fully, thus: Study to understand the Gospel, and then believe it. The Gospel is a proposition of good, on certain conditions. We know how to study, and how to understand, and how to believe. We have practiced this process all of our lives. Everybody does this. A proposition of some good is presented to us, on certain conditions. We consider the good proposed, and the means by which it is to be secured. After weighing the whole subject sufficiently to enable us to decide, we accept it with its conditions, we yield ourselves to it, we say we will do it, we believe it is the best thing we can do. This is faith. This is what has controlled us all our lives. This faith is the same, whether we yield ourselves to God, or to sin. It is the same in all. It is when we believe which determines our course of life.

I WILL BUILD ONE.

A home in a new country is presented for our consideration. We carefully in our plan of home all the good we hope for in life. It is to us the great end of life. Such a home is not just what we want. But it is cheap, and we can make it what we desire it to be in time. We shall have to submit to the privations incident to a new country. Such as lack of buildings, of improvements, of fences, of roads, of bridges, of school houses and of churches, but we can supply them all in time, and as we have but a little to invest in a home at first, on the whole, all things considered, we decide upon the home in the new country, we accept it with its conditions, we yield to it, we say: This object shall henceforth control our lives. This is our faith. A home in an old country is presented to our minds. We consider how much we have to invest in it, how much this home will cost, how many privileges we shall receive, and after full deliberation we decide to accept the proposition with its conditions, we yield ourselves to it, and say this shall be the object of our life. This is our faith. A home in the City is the object presented. The same questionings, comparisons, considerations and final decision to make our home in the city. The same yielding ourselves to this object the same purpose to do it. We accept it with its conditions. This is our faith. This home in the city shall be the object of our life. This faith is always the same. It has for its object some good, and accepts the conditions necessary to secure that good. The objects of faith are various. Our faith always guides us in the direction of the objects of our hope. It always determines our character. Our faith is the all-controlling power of our lives. As we have yielded ourselves servants unto these and all other objects, so now we should yield ourselves servants unto God. We should accept the good God has promised on the conditions he has named. We should pursue this good with the same devotion and faithfulness that we have been accustomed to practice in the attainment of other objects.

The faith of the Gospel is one faith. Each one is to believe this one faith. But this is not all that is required of him. We are all to be one. We are to be perfectly joined together in the same mind, and in the same judgment. We are to strive together for the faith of the Gospel. We know how to do this. We have had large experience in uniting ourselves together for the accomplishment of objects, which could not be accomplished by individual effort. We have joined ourselves together to increase our power and influence in the temperance cause, in the abolition cause, in the grange movement. We have joined ourselves together for the purpose of manufacturing, and for building railroads, and for establishing governments, etc. We have formed these unions more or less compactly according to the nature of the objects to be secured. In all of these associations a general rule has prevailed, according to the judgment of the civilized world. The object of the union is stated, the terms of membership, the officers, the rules by which they will be governed, etc., as we have joined ourselves together to increase our power and efficiency in accomplishing the objects we have had in view, so now, we are to join ourselves together, for the purpose of striving together for the faith of the Gospel. The object is of vastly greater importance than any for which we have heretofore made united effort. Therefore, we should yield ourselves together in a closer, more compact, more perfect, and consequently more efficient union, than we have ever done before. As our former unions were adapted to the [illegible] objects we had in view, so now we should yield ourselves together in a way adapted to promote the objects of the glorious Gospel of the blessed God, which is committed to our trust, in the most efficient manner. All the elements of efficient organization in their simplest form, should be adopted by us. The principles laid down in the New Testament should be rigidly adhered to. The objects for which we join ourselves together should be distinctly defined, so that they can be understood by all. The terms of membership should be distinctly stated. The officers should be named, how to be chosen, how long to hold their office, and their duties defined. The rules by which we will be governed, as an organized body, and a plan of finance based on a righteous equality, according as food has prospered us, and which shall provide how to determine this equality. We should then pledge ourselves to each other in the most solemn covenant, that we will faithfully perform the duties contemplated in our organization.

We should yield ourselves to the work of carrying out the objects of our association, with the same devotion, the same ability, the same judgment and discretion, and the same faithfulness and skill, that we have been accustomed to do in our associations for other objects.

I have thus briefly described in the light of our text, how we ought to serve God in our individual and associated capacities, and perhaps the simplicity of this subject could not be better expressed than it is in the language of the text. As you have yielded your members, as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin, so now yield your members, as instruments of righteousness unto God.

The River of God.

The river of God, how serenely it flows!
An antidote sure for our cares and our woes;
How refreshing the draught from its blossom-lined side,
Giving beauty and strength, that will ever abide.

Poor travelers we, on this desert plain,
Where comes but too seldom the plentiful rain,
Let us turn our weak steps to this river so near,
And banish each doubt, and each withering fear.

Blest river of God; by thy side will I stay,
And hear thy dear music as life wears away;
I would join in thy song with a calm trusting heart,
Till I to the clime of the holy depart.

And there, where is flowing the River of Life,
Where comes no sad thought, and no wasting strife,
I shall see the fond friends of my spirit once more,
As they roam in the light of Eternity's shore.

Oh, these most transporting! a heavenly home,
Where earth's weary children shall partition,
Where a host of the shall cluster each know,
As before God's bright throne they adoringly bow.

Lot—An Indictment and Defense.

A hasty and inconsiderate writer in our paper in a criticism on my article in relation to Sodom, ventures to bring charges against the character of Lot, which a regard for the purity of morals and the integrity of the Holy Scriptures, demands should be disapproved. The object of thus maligning the character of this remarkable man is clear. I argue that the Sodomites had an abundance of moral light; and for proof, give, among other reasons, the fact that "righteous Lot" dwelt among them, and must have been as any righteous man is, compelled by the very force of his moral nature to be, "a preacher of righteousness." That is if he was righteous he must have protested against the horrible flood of vice which was bearing everything before it. To have held his peace would have been to approve their crimes and become a partner in their guilt. But to get rid of this moral light it must be put out; and so the indictment is read which charges him with the foul crimes of his companions, from whose fate he was, therefore, unjustifiably preserved. But how stands the indictment?

"He taught by precept and example the reverse of purity."

"But as far as purity and chastity were concerned, his moral status was very low."

Proof. "He even offered his own daughters for purposes of prostitution and was subsequently guilty of incest with them."—J. M. Stephenson.

Truly, this is a most fearful charge, and the evidence ingeniously applied. It would be worthy the acutest and foulest disciple of Tom Paine. And inasmuch as the same book, which records without note or comment the series of the events from which the proofs of the indictment are gathered, also calls him "Just Lot," declares that he was vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked. "For that righteous man dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing, vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds;" 2 Pet. ii. 7, 8; the charge against Lot is also an indictment of the apostle Peter, and by implication, of the Bible itself. For Lot is nowhere condemned in its pages, but positively and commended by inspiration itself, in Peter's words. If, therefore, "his moral status was very low," then the moral status of the book which commends him is also very low. Such serious charges as these cannot be lightly passed over. They savor too much of giving aid and comfort to the enemies of the Bible, to be allowed to pass in silence. I, therefore, take it upon me to defend Lot from his inconsiderate accuser. Let us then carefully examine the counts in this fearful indictment.

I. "He taught the reverse of purity by precept."

Now what does this writer mean by precept? Of course he uses it in its common invariable sense. He means by it what every writer and speaker in the world, who uses the English language, means by it. And he understands what that is, or he would not use it at all. Let the authority in that language then tell us what the writer means by saying that Lot taught impurity by precept.

Webster defines the word to mean "Any commandment or order intended as an authoritative rule of action, especially a command respecting moral action." He gives as synonyms the following words: "Commandment; injunction; mandate; order; law; rule; direction; instruction; doctrine; principle; maxim."

Lot then taught the Sodomites to be unchaste. He instructed them to commit adultry. He directed them to practice fornication. He commanded them to practice Sodomy. This was his principle, doctrine, maxim, rule of moral action; and he taught it by words and commands; and Peter declares that he was "just," "righteous," and had a righteous soul. Could Tom Paine desire a clearer case against God's book. Surely now his soul must rest in peace as the cause he listed has been slain in the house of its friends.

But what are the proofs. None are offered. Not a word he ever uttered, not a command, not a doctrine, maxim, rule, precept or law can be produced sanctioning such horrible crimes. The charge then is as baseless as it is abominable, and as abominable as it is false. But he not only taught it by precept, he practiced it himself; for the second count in the indictment is that "He taught impurity by example." The proofs offered of the whole charge is directed alone in support of this count. "He even offered his own daughters for purposes of prostitution, and was subsequently guilty of incest with them."

Now let anyone read the nineteenth chapter of Genesis, and he will doubtless find the fact stated that Lot did under certain circumstances offer his daughters a victim to the lust of the Sodomites. But his accuser claims that he did it feloniously and with evil intent. He did it in pursuance of his doctrine. He did it in illustration of his teaching, in enforcement of his rule of life, in support of his instructions. He did it because he believed and taught that it was right and proper so to do. In a word, "He offered his daughters for purposes of prostitution." Now what are the facts? It is stated that on the evening of the day of the angel's visit "Lot sat in the gate of Sodom." Now why is such an apparently trivial circumstance mentioned? Evidently because such was his custom. But what is there about the custom demanding record? Because he sat there for purposes of hospitality. He sat there as Abraham "sat in his tent door in the heat of the day," and for that reason was ready to welcome and entertain the strangers who spent the night with Lot.

But why did Lot sit in the gate of the city rather than in his own door. Evidently that he might be the first to accost any traveler and take him to his own house. By who so anxious to entertain travelers and strangers at his own expense? Evidently that he might save them from the fate which would befall them if they lodged in any other part of the city. This is further shown by the fact that "He pressed them greatly when they are at first refused to accept his hospitality, but announced their intention to "abide in the street all night." He evidently supposed them ignorant of the real character of his neighbors, and being greatly solicitous for their safety "pressed them greatly" till they consented. It is also finally decided that such was his object by his own recorded words, when the men of Sodom demanded the strangers who lodged with him: "Unto these men do nothing, for therefore came they under the shadow of my roof." But we may here ask how were they safer under the shadow of his roof, if "he taught impurity both by precept and example?" But it is recorded that he sat in the gate of Sodom for another reason also. The judges of the people in those times had their seats of justice "in the gate of the city," and here is proof that Lot was a judge of the Sodomites, and therefore a teacher and instructor in righteousness. This view of the case is confirmed, when on that memorable night he stood between "the men of the city, both old and young, from every quarter," and their intended victims. Doubtless they had often listened to his rebuke and instruction in silence, that they might reap the benefit of the justice and impartiality of his decisions, and silently endured while they hated him; but when he stood at the door of his house and held the whole city back from the gratification of their damnable lust on the persons of those whom he was bound by what was by him considered as the most sacred of rights, the right of hospitality; to protect to the utmost of his power, they openly repudiated his authority, and said in open defiance and rebellion, "This one fellow came in to sojourn, and he will needs be a judge; now we will deal worse with thee than with them."

But he not only waited for the strangers, and took them under the shadow of his roof for the purpose of protecting them from violation, but he openly rebuked the midnight marauders, and besought them "not to do so wicked," risking his very life in their defense. Now in this junction "he even offered his own daughters"—for what—"for purposes of prostitution." Palsied be the tongue that utters such a gross slander.

He offered his daughters as Christ offered himself, to save strangers. But "He was subsequently guilty of incest with them." Well, the account certainly says that his daughters had each a son by their father. But the account certainly throws the blame of the matter wholly on the daughters. Their father was old and doubtless stupified by the terrible blow that had just befallen him. Properly, home, wife, children, all were gone except the two daughters who were with him. And it is not improbable that he might ever have shared the misapprehension of his daughters that the whole world had shared the fate of the cities of the plain, and that besides himself there was not a man upon the earth. Now thus sitting solitary, sombre, and sad, stricken to the very earth with grief and fear, his daughters persuaded him to drink wine. Doubtless they made him believe it was for his stomach's sake, to recruit and strengthen him about his great calamity. They had, however, another purpose, which though laudable, or at least justifiable, under their views of the case, that by the direct judgment of God, their father was the only male on earth, was nevertheless literally incest. But of this purpose and its accomplishment, Lot was equally ignorant and therefore was innocent. His wrong (if it was a wrong) was in drinking too much wine, and in that alone. Of all else in the transaction he was, and will be, held innocent by the verdict of heaven itself, who by the mouth of Peter pronounced him "just" and "righteous."

Thus all the counts in this fearful indictment fall utterly and without remedy in every proof offered. And we trust such inconsiderate words will be withdrawn by their author, and the fact that Lot was a living protest against the awful crimes of his cotemporaries recognized. Surely a man whose privilege it was to entertain angels unawares, and he suffered to escape with all connected with him, even his ungodly sons-in-law, to whom the offer of escape was allowed to be made, when all about him were consumed with fire, and "made an example to them that should afterward live ungodly," must have been as Peter calls him, "Righteous."

Of the fate of the children consumed in that awful destruction, I shall have further to speak in another article.

The Other Side.

Brother Simonds calls for "a correct Scriptural view of church organization," from some one "who thoroughly understands the subject." I hope the many in our ranks who do understand this simple matter, will pour a flood of light through the paper into his mind. He seems very anxious for light, yet one would think from his course, that his great concern was to convert as many as possible to his well settled views, by a continual agitation of the subject. But, we will assume that he wants light on the subject of "Church Organization," that he, as well as others, may know how to act. Well, what is it to organize a church? Is it to bring a church into existence, or to "set things in order" in a church already existing? The Bible says nothing about organizing a church, any more than it does about "getting religion." How much better it would be to use Bible phrases to express Bible doctrine. If it is held that a church comes into existence by organization, then, we can easily know how the apostolic churches were organized. How did Jesus build his church on "this rock," so that "the gates of hades should not prevail against it?" Did He systemize an uninspired creed for his disciples? Did He sum up all his doctrines in a theological set of articles, and number them and require a formal assent to them as tests of membership? He did no such thing. He taught his disciples, by a great variety of illustration, the great truths that constitute his Gospel. When they showed by their works that they believed those teachings, they were in full fellowship. Every man who heard his sayings and did them, built his house upon the rock where the storms of the last day will not disturb them. Thus were they united to Christ and to each other. We read of no formal organization of the fishermen into a church. The ties of faith, hope and love, bound them to the Master and each other. These proved stronger cords and bound them more "compactly" than any mere human creeds they could have got up among themselves. They were content with the teachings of Jesus as He taught them, and we have the same teachings in the very words of the Teacher who "came from God." Are they not a sufficient creed? Do we need any additional creed beyond the one given by Christ to the original disciples? On the day of Pentecost, before the descent of the Spirit, we read that "the number of the names (of the disciples) together were about 120." Perhaps those names were written—enrolled. It seems to be an example for enrolling the names of those who become Christians now, as they did then. But as they were not then written below a human creed, they should not be now.

Read the history of the churches everywhere brought into existence by the preaching of the apostles, and you will see that in no instance were they organized on the basis of a human creed, but rather on the Divine word which "defines" itself. According to the Divine plan, when a believing, repenting sinner was "baptized into Christ," he "put on Christ,"—"was baptized into his death." So that became available for his forgiveness. In this way a forgiven sinner gets into Christ and by getting into Christ, gets into his church. This was the mode of "joining" the church on the day of Pentecost. "As many as gladly received the word, were baptized, and "the Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved." When the Lord adds to the church, shall man undertake to say, they don't belong to the church—that there is no church? In this sense of organize God organizes every true Christian church by the means He was ordained to bring men to believe the Gospel, repent of sin, and be baptized into Christ, and wherever few or many believe and obey the Gospel—do not forsake the assembling of themselves together, but meet to exhort each other and keep the ordinances, they are a church in the New Testament sense. When any are added to the church, God adds them, through the same faith on their part as the primitive converts.

But, if organize means to "set things in order" in existing churches, do it as the apostles did. "Ordain elders in every church," appoint other Scriptural officers and make the necessary regulations in respect to meetings, etc., and have the "number of the names," if you please. But, shall we not agree on a creed or declaration of the faith that we will support? Yes, let us agree to take the apostolic creed—not the one adopted by the Romans and Episcopalians, but the genuine article found between the lids of the Bible—all the Scriptures given by inspiration of God. But the Bible is not plain and definite enough,—we must subscribe to man's definition of God's word. Paul says: "That we might know the things which are freely given us of God." Which things also, we speak, not in words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth, comparing spiritual things with spiritual." We have the same words which the Holy Spirit taught the apostles—they are plain and definite, and by comparing these words, we gain a divine definition of the faith, and "he that runs may read" and understand the numerous definitions of the Gospel found in the great storehouse of truth. It is objected that all say they believe the Bible, but when we try them by our standard, they don't really believe it. We reply, those who "wrest the Scriptures to their own destruction, could just as easily twist your creed and not go to destruction either" The Divine creed is sacred,—the human is not. If you add or take away anything from the word of God, you expose yourself to the plagues written in the Book, but you may take away all the human creeds in existence and God will be pleased. Now, for the questions.

"Is it the duty of Christians to organize themselves into churches at all? Yes. "set things in order." Should they have names enrolled? A. Yes. "Is it right for them to pledge to each other that they will take the whole Bible as the rule of faith and practice, or a particular faith that is revealed in the Bible as their guide?" etc.

I say, take the "whole Bible," not "a particular part." Is it right to pledge to work together for a definite faith? Yes. That exceedingly definite one found in the Scriptures of truth. Is it right to insist on a test of membership? Yes, the word of God. Is it right to maintain discipline? etc. Yes, by the word. The Bible is our only Book of discipline. Does the Lord add members to the church without the action of the members and the church. A. Just such action on the part of both as is described in the 2d chapter of Acts, and so of exclusion. Follow the word. "Is the church, as now organized, as efficient as it ought to be?" A. God's organization is good enough. Set things in order if order is lacking, and wake up the church to duty if they are asleep, and don't organize them to death. You may have the perfect "form of godliness" and deny the power. Human creeds are "sufficient" to divide. The questions that follow are so plain that they need no answer. No matter whether reforms begin with the few or many. Creed-making is not a reform, but has always deformed the church and been its greatest curse. Is it not wrong to make a "statement" of the object of uniting together on the conditions of membership, if your statement and conditions are only what the Bible requires? God has given us a perfect plan of finance. No other is of any authority. "As a man purposes in his heart, so let him give," "not grudgingly" —"the Lord loves a cheerful giver,"—"he that soweth bountifully shall reap bountifully." These instructions are plain enough, and, with other similar rules, constitute the law of Christ on that subject. The per cent. laws all belong to the old dispensation, when they had "to tithe their mint and cummin" which they scrupulously did, to the neglect of the weightier matters of the law—"judgment, mercy and faith." "The law of liberty" demands no per cent., but makes every one his own judge of the amount and object of his gifts, he or she being accountable to God alone for complying with the above revealed principles of giving.

Again, he inquires, "if to proclaim the faith of the Gospel, as taught in the Bible, is the object of being joined together, is it wrong to state and define this faith?" Define the faith of the Gospel as much as you please when you proclaim it, or write it, but it is wrong to make your definitions of the Gospel the basis of a church organization and compel all to accept of them, and subscribe to them or remain outside of the church. The words of prophets and apostles constitute the foundation of the true church, while Jesus, in his sayings, is "the chief corner-stone" of the edifice. Another question: "Is it enough to say that we take the whole Bible or Scriptures as the object of our Union?" Most emphatically, yes! "Can we show what our object is" in reading the Bible alone?" Yes, "The Scriptures are able to make us wise unto salvation." They do "thoroughly furnish the man of God for every good work,—not for any bad sectarian work. A man is furnished for that kind of work by the multitude of creeds extant, around which are rallied selfish, contending parties, doing most effectually Satan's work of dividing the people of God, and thus rendering the world infidel. We had supposed that 680 sects were enough to suit his Majesty, till the 681th was born! And, now, men and women in these parts, are actually pursuaded to arise in public assembly and withdraw from the "church of God," set in order years ago, for the purpose of joining this new sect, which its founder calls "the church at Grand Rapids," or "Jamestown." I admire the consistency of not calling it "the church of God."

As the Father, spiritually, of most of these seceding brethren and sisters, I would earnestly beseech not to divide "the living child." F. Hoyt.

Matthew XXIV: 3.

Tell us when these things will be? and what will be the sign of thy presence, and of the consummation of the age?

Verse 25—Remember, I have foretold (or forwarned) you.—Diaglott.

It has long been a well established axiom that the best way to interpret scripture is to interpret scripture by scripture; and although our Savior did not apparently give a direct answer to the above question, he did in reality give positive answers.

Then "God has revealed even to us through the spirit. For the spirit searched all things, even the depths of God." 1 Cor. ii: 10.

"What will be the sign of thy presence?"

The 29th verse is usually quoted to show what the signs are, which is manifestly wrong: "Sun obscured, moon withheld her light, stars fall, powers of heaven shaken." The 30th verse says "The sign of the Son of Man will then appear." After the above events, and distinct from them. Where will that sign be seen? In Heaven.

What was his sign in his first appearing? Matt. ii: 2. "We have seen his star," which, although observed by astrologists, was a positive sign, no equivocation, we have seen and come to worship, is the simple but positive declaration. As nothing else is given to embarrass our minds, we should take this without hesitation.

Now, nowhere in the Bible or elsewhere, do we find a miracle where the common course of nature will suffice, and it is the positive conviction of that able and good man, Dean Alford, that this star of the Magii was simply a conjunction of the two largest planets, which, when critically examined, appears to answer all the purpose of pointing to him who was born king of the Jews.

For the moment, I wish to make a digression. Instead of the editor apologizing for the length of the pyramid article last April, I do most heartily thank him for it.

If, as I am willing to endorse, the conjunction answered the purpose, to point out the infant King in his humility, what should we expect when he comes in power? If we have to do with facts, not miracles, in this case, why not examine them?

As in the first sign there were several conjunctions of Jupiter and Saturn during the year, so we find on the same astronomical calculations that during the years 1881 and 1882, there will be such a conjunction [illegible] has not occurred during [illegible] dispensation, to-wit: the whole planetary system will be on one and the same side of the sun,—a thing that would be most assuredly contemplated by intelligent men with apprehension, had it not occurred before without destruction to the whole solar system.

I wish for a moment to draw the attention of the readers of the RESTITUTION to another subject, the recent discoveries of the physical nature of the sun. For the last six or eight years more has been learned about the sun than all that was ever known before. The visible face of the sun appears to be composed of the most intensely heated gasses, and forever convulsed and agitated in the most violent manner. Jets of hydrogen gas are thrown up for 200,000 miles, at the rate of 12,000 miles per minute. Such violence in nature has never been contemplated before; figures fail to give anything like an idea of such amazing convulsions. Again, it has been noticed that terrestrial magnetism is affected by these commotions of the sun's photosphere. Every mariner's compass throughout the entire globe has been known to be disturbed simultaneously with these outbursts of the sun's surface.

Again it is believed by those competent to judge, that earthquakes are sometimes produced by the same cause that is, terrestrial magnetic disturbances produced these terrible convulsions of the sun.

This brings to light the hidden mystery of the sun spots, which have of late appeared to have been periodical and these periods have appeared to coincide with planetary conjunctions, and these periods correspond with unusual seasons, affecting the crops and health of the world. So we begin to see "our interest," not only "in the pyramids of Egypt," but in the disturbed condition of the hydrogen gas of the sun.

Now, if the whole surface of the sun, perhaps down to a large portion of the sun's body, is susceptible of such violent disturbance, and that the position of the planets effect largely this disturbance, what may we expense when the entire solar system is thrown entirely out of balance?

Does this throw light on those mysterious words of our Savior, "the powers of heaven will be shaken"?

Especially, when our Savior says, "the sign of the Son of Man will then appear in heaven." Notice "will" not, "shall;" he has nothing to do with it, does not decree it, simply says "it will." If the conjunction of two caused a sufficient sign, how much more conspicuous will be the conjunction of all the planets.

Don't forget the immediate connection of the powers of the heavens being shaken, and the sign of the Son of Man in the heavens." Joined together, how significant the idea!

The circumstances of our Savior's second advent will be many, and our fault is in bringing them to one point instead of spreading over much time and space, yet we have some sure landmarks, and I think we have in the above a distinct landmark as well as in Matt. xxiv: 14.

"These glad tidings of the kingdom will be published in the whole world for a testimony to all the nations, and then will the end come."

This is surely a good landmark.

The above speculations, for they are nothing more, correspond with those of the great pyramid.

Brethren of the waiting kingdom, such things are not accidents. If we God, as is most certainly the case, that the political heavens are red and lowering, shall we be justly called hypocrites for not discerning the signs of the times?

Do not the most able statesmen in Europe represent the nations as sitting over a magazine ready to burst at any moment? And are not the crowned heads actually preparing for such a catastrophe? This is not sensationalism but simple fact.

Brethren, at some unexpected hour there will be a cry, "Behold the Bridegroom, go out and meet him." "And they that will be ready, will go with him to the marriage." But oh, think of it, and the door will be shut to all who are not ready.

THE RESTITUTION
Plymouth, Indiana.
Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the Restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His Holy Prophets since the world began. It also advocates as a matter of the first importance the Second Coming of the Messiah, the Christian King of Kings, and in connection therewith as joint heirs with Him in the age to come of the saints, the resurrection of the just, the literal resurrection of the dead, the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked, root and all, and through Christ, and many other kindred truths, advocates the only belief of the Gospel, acceptance, and conversion as prerequisite to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as prerequisite to final salvation.

CORRESPONDENTS.—The Editor will not be held responsible for the sentiment contained in articles by correspondents, nor articles so designated will be distinctly stated. Each writer is also responsible for his article bearing his own signature. If the teaching of any writer is understood, an article setting forth the views of the party differing may be furnished. Free discussion of the subjects on it after will be allowed, but the Editor reserves the privilege of affixing these comments editorially which he may consider a belief and doubt, or the Gospel as a means of salvation, or which under no circumstances.

Materialism.

The present article was suggested by hearing a presiding elder of the M. E. Church—Doctor Kee—make some statement relating to materialism in his discourse. I cannot conjecture as to the subject in alluding to it, unless it was to stigmatize the doctrine and those who [illegible] it, it was curiously [illegible] to the subject at his discourse; as a text being, "Fear not little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." It was well known that I had spoken in the Christian Union Church the same day, and also what my views were, and hence I considered it my duty to disclaim any connection with modern scientific views concerning man sent to deny his general allegations publicly. In his remarks he made the sweeping declaration that materialism was a great temptation, and that all men had been tempted to as Eve it. David, the psalmist, was tempted in the same way, but rose triumphantly above it, and some learned Bible scholars thought that when Jesus was tempted to fall down and worship the devil by the offer of all the Kingdoms of the world, it was a temptation of his character. Now, as no temptation is from God, but from the adversary, or our own sinful desires, it follows that this "great temptation" to materialism is of evil origin if his ipse dixit is to be believed. But I think the statement to be erroneous, and shall endeavor to briefly show that it is entirely groundless. He also characterized those who held it as possessing a "low type of mind," which can be successfully denied. Again, that it was a "mushy pashy kind of theology." I think when a man uses such slang expressions, they are at a loss for an argument. That it was a "hybrid or cross between French materialism and the Gospel," hence but little better. I propose, however, to show how greatly he was in error in making such an absurd statement. Once more, "that in believing man to be unconscious between death and the resurrection, and that a large portion of the human race would be as though they had not been, it was degrading to his manhood." That man is unconscious between death and the resurrection can easily be proved from the Scriptures, and in regard to it certain class that "are to be as though they had not been;" his objection is against the Bible, and does not affect my opinions in the least, and he will have to amend Obadiah 16th, if the wishes to remove that degrading belief from the minds of those who believe the Bible. This applies to all others who refuse to believe the same statement of Scripture. Leaving at present the object of and his object [illegible] we will briefly [illegible] the doctrine of materialism.

[illegible] quirers [illegible] us to ask, what does the word, as [illegible] mean? "Great bigness, great [illegible], weight, substance or anything." Materialist: "One who denies the existence of spiritual substances." From this brief definition, we learn that material out of man; for, when applied to material substances and that's matter; but is "one who denies the existence of spiritual substances." This latter definition, when looked at from a theological standpoint, is rather too arbitrary, as it is [illegible] generally claimed that God is a being "without body or parts" and therefore, intangible, and that when man dies, he too becomes a spirit entirely without form, and hence, it is difficult to apply the expression "spiritual substance" to those spirit beings as the term, substance, expresses the existence of material in some form. There being a presence extended to the faithful of being made spiritual beings at the resurrection, I believe in their spiritual existence at that time, though in a bodily form, and therefore according to Webster, am not a materialist, but waiving the technical meaning of the term, we pass to a definition of the term, immaterial, and find it defined, "not consisting of matter," from this it follows that as everything that exists must have some property, and it to identify it to prove its existence, and as it could not be so in that it existed without being composed of matter of some quality or quantity, therefore, an immaterialist must be one that denies the existence of material things," and in beings "not consisting of matter," and therefore, in some sense, [illegible] to reduce the definition to a mere simplicity. I would define an [illegible] as something and immaterial as nothing, hence a materialist is one who believes in something, and by a parity of reasoning an immaterialist is one of which we in nothing; therefore I prefer to use the title [illegible] which indicates a materialist. I wish now to show that a great difference and wide contrast exists between the views of one class of modern materialists and here of er, although the person I am reviewing, tried to show there was a close connection between the two. He alluded to French infidelism, and as they believe "that death is an eternal sleep" and we believe that "man lieth down and riseth not till the heavens be no more, they shall not wake," it or be raised out of their sleep," which will be at the time th "heaven are rolled together like a scroll" or, the resurrection when the "earth shall disclose her dead and no more cover her slain, "therefore, our view is only a modification of theirs. I would be justified in calling his assault to the intelligence and learning of many able and eminent Christian men, but pass it by and will now make some observations on a progressive class of materialists, who claim to be scientists of the school of Darwin, Tyndall & Co. I shall quote also the language of an able writer, H. S. Hastings, of Boston, Mass., in the progression of there scientific men.

PROGRESSION.

"Man is held to be progressive in his tendencies: the age is progressive; the world is progressive; and, in a little while the "great time" will have come, and the world will be saved without a Redeemer, and renewed without a God. Of course, a discussion of the progression of the race involves the question as to their primal condition,—their starting point. Hence certain ones—philosophers, too wise to believe in the existence of a creating Deity, and too shrewd, to accept any article of faith which is not perfectly reasonable to them—have in some way learned or concluded that man originally was a marine creature, a mollusk, an oyster, a clam or something of that kind. After ages of "progression" the race improved, until the ancestors of these sages arrives at the high estates of tadpoles or tadpoles, and at length attained to the superior dignity of the amphibia, in the shape of full grown bullfrogs. Proceeding upward, the next grade led them within the confines of monkeydom, where after assuming the various relations of "freedmen," "copperheads," "priests and rulers," or lords, ladies, sages, courtiers and [illegible] they [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

THE RESTITUTION.

PLYMOUTH, IND.....Nov. 24, 1875.

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.

☞Brother Chaplin spent last Sunday with the church in brother Messimore's neighborhood, in Kosciusko county. He reports that an excellent interest is awakened in the community, and a great anxiety exists to hear the word of truth.

☞Moody and Sankey have closed their evangelical labors in Brooklyn, and commenced meetings in Philadelphia. It is reported that many thousands of people assembled in the city of brotherly love to hear these men expound their views of religion. So far as we can learn the moral condition of Brooklyn is not much improved by the "revival movement." These men are undoubtedly in earnest and mean to do good, but they should not forget that religion has an intellectual as well as an emotional side. That they have been instrumental in awakening the emotional nature seems evident, but there seems to be a sad lack of intellectual expansion. Men must be taught the principles of truth as set forth in the Gospel, and then, when all excitements are past, they will have something to stand upon besides their feelings.

☞Our meetings at Argos were very interesting, and resulted, we trust, in much good. The meetings commenced on the evening of the 9th, and continued until the 19th, during which time ten discourses were delivered. The people turned out liberally and seemed much pleased. Five were added to the congregation and many more became satisfied that we have the truth upon the subject of the Christian life and hope. During our stay in Argos we were called upon to preach the funeral discourse of Mrs. Nortie Hudson, of Lincoln, Ind., who died while visiting her parents in Argos. Funeral services were held in the M. E. church. A large concourse of people assembled to express their sympathy with those in bereavement. Many attended the funeral who have had more or less prejudice against our views, but we trust that the simplicity and [illegible] of the Christian hope [illegible] at present. The brethren in Argos feel much encouraged to push the work forward. We shall arrange to return as soon as convenient and hold another series of meetings. Let us all work while the day lasts and thereby be prepared for that eternal future just before us.

✶ Getting Religion.

How much we hear in these days about "getting religion," as though it was some gift entirely outside of man. It is also said there are definite times when you can get religion, as though it were something that came with the seasons of the year and went away again. We must confess that we have not so understood the words of the Great Teacher. To us it is plain that religion is not a miracle, in the sense of obtaining it, neither are we to infer that men get it by some peculiar excitement of the nerves. Religion is a system of truth, unfolded to us in the Divine word, and illustrated to us in the lives and examples of Christ and the apostles. It is intended to educate the understanding, to enlighten the intellect, and to teach men how to live. It reveals God as our Father and Christ as his Son. It also presents promises, inspires hope, and opens before us the possibilities of the eternal future. To say that the whole religious idea can be born in the soul at once, or that a man can experience religion in a moment seems to belittle that sublime conception of its magnitude and importance, so clearly expressed in the Word of God. We can understand how men get an education, and how they become good. Getting religion is upon the same natural principle. Faith comes by hearing the Word of God, it changes our views of duty and responsibility. We are to transfer our allegiance from sin to righteousness, from the adversary to God. Men may be so wrought upon by the Gospel of Christ as to flee at once for refuge in Divine love, but this is the beginning, not the whole of the new life. The man who becomes a soldier must do more than enlist; he must go through the drill and endure the discipline necessary for the campaign. So it is with those who become quickened by the all-powerful word of God.

Indeed, there is no such phrase as "getting religion" to be found in Scriptures. The apostle informs us in brief what pure religion is. And let it be noticed that this definition of religion carries it far beyond a mere excitement of the emotions. "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is [illegible]

Origin of Marginal Readings and Scriptural References.

Many persons who heartily accept of what is called "The King James Translation of the Scriptures," and believe the translators to have been, if not completely inspired, guided at least by a special providence, reject the marginal readings. That this is frequently done by not knowing the origin of these references and marginal readings I am fully satisfied. But that we do not possess all the work of the King James translators without these references and readings will be seen from the following extract which we clip from The Christian:

"In order to facilitate a knowledge of the Scriptures, it was among the instructions to guide the translators of our present Bible, the so-called "King James Version," begun in 1607, and printed at London in 1611; that marginal notes should be affixed, explanatory of Greek, and Hebrew words that could not be briefly and fitly explained in the text. References also to parallel places were to be set down in the margin.

"It cannot be said therefore that we have the version of the forty-seven able, and Christian scholars, who made the version in the reign of James I, in its entireness, without the marginal readings, if not the references. They regarded them as a component part of their work, and the readings to be of equal authority with the text. And yet a very small proportion of all the Bibles printed contain these readings, and references. They are however of very great value to the student for ascertaining the precise meaning of any text. It is wonderful how much light is sometimes thrown upon a doubtful passage by turning to other [illegible] cated by the references; and some of the marginal readings are by able critics said to be better than those in the text."

The following from the same article will serve as an explanation of the marks pointing to these references, and show to some extent their value:

"These marginal readings, as printed by the American Bible Society, and as distinguished from the marginal references, are of two kinds. One is indicated by a dagger (†), and gives a more literal translation of the original Hebrew, Chaldee, or Greek. Thus for example, 1 Sam. xxv. 5. In the text, "Go to Nabal, and † greet him in my name." In the margin, † Heb., "ask him in my name of peace." In Job. v. 7. In the text, "As the sparks fly upward." In the margin, † Heb., "the sons of the burning coal lift up to fly."

Another mark, parallel lines (‖), represents in the margin a possible different rendering from the text, where the sense of the original is from any cause doubtful. Thus, 1 Sam. xxii. 6. "Saul abode under a ‖ tree in Ramah," is in the text; but the margin has, "‖ Or grove in a high place."

We also find that both these marks ‖ are used to designate the different renderings and meaning of proper names; and sometimes precede the word "Or," and "That is," in the margin, as exceptical of the text.

Thus for example, Gen. iii. 20. In the text, both marks precede † ‖ Eve. In the margin, † Heb., Chavah. ‖ That is living. In Gen. iv. 1. In the text, Cain. In the margin, † That is, gotten, or acquired. In Gen. iv. 2. In the text, † Abel, † Keeper. Margin, ‖ Heb., Hebel, ‖ Heb., a feeder. In 1 Sam. xxv. 25. In the text we read, Let not my Lord † regard this man of Belial. In the margin, † Heb., lay it to his heart. Text, ‖ Nabal is his name. Margin, ‖ that is fool.

In Ruth i. 20. In the text, "Call me not Naomi." In the margin, that is pleasant. Text, "Call me ‖ Mara; Margin, that is, bitter.

"The ‖ law, (or doctrine, margin) of the Lord is perfect, ‖ converting (or restoring, margin) the soul, the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple." Psalm xix. 7.

We have followed in these illustrations what seems to be the plan of the American Bible Society. In some editions, as the Oxford, the figures 1, 2, 3, are used to refer to the marginal readings, and in Bagster's Bibles the letters of the Greek alphabet are employed for that purpose.

It is our desire in these suggestions, to recommend the daily use of the reference Bible to all who desire to know what God has revealed to us by his inspired messengers. These references are indispensible in the study of the Bible. It is the testimony of Dr. Scott, after years of experience in preparing his comentary of the Old, and New Testament, that "consulting well selected marginal references, forms one of the best helps for fixing the word of God in the memory, leading the mind to a just interpretation of it, and in [illegible] rendering it more affecting [illegible] as they now read, is [illegible] find the best commentary in the margin."

To the above collection of marginal readings we append the following, showing the importance of these readings. We give the textual readings enclosing the marginal reading in parenthesis immediately after the word differently rendered.

1. Gen. i. 20. And God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life, (soul) and fowl that may fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven.

2. Gen. i. 30. And to every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to every thing that creepeth upon the earth, wherein there is life (soul) I have given every green herb for meat: and it was so.

3. Num. xix. 11. He that toucheth the dead body of any man (soul of man) shall be unclean seven days.

4. Job xxxi. 39. If I have eaten the fruits thereof without money, or have caused the owners thereof to lose their life (caused the soul of the owners thereof to expire, or breathe out.)

5. Job xxxvi. 14. They die (their soul dieth in youth and their life is among the unclean (Sodomites.)

6. Psa. xlix. 19. He (the soul shall go shall go to the generation of his fathers: they—the soul—shall never see light.

7. Job xxvii. 3. All the while my breath is in me, and the spirit of God is in my nostrils. (the breath which God gave me, is in my nostrils.)

8. James ii. 20. For the body without the spirit (breath) is dead, so faith without works is dead also.

9. Heb. xi. 4. By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that he was righteous, God testifying of his gifts; and by it he being dead yet speaketh (is yet spoken of.)

For the value of references we refer our readers to the careful reading of the texts and contexts pointed out by the letters from i to g. Isa. ix. 6, 7; p to s, Isa. xxiv. 21–23; e to k, Jer. xxi. 5–8; l to s, Dan. vii. 25–27; e to h, Obd. 20, 21, and n, b, Luke xxiv. 27–29. These references are a grand key to the entire Bible, and of special importance in reference to the nature of Christ's Kingdom.

Just received at this office, in the last few days, a large assortment of English Bibles, containing these references and marginal readings.

Alexander Campbell on the Restoration of the Jews.

PROPHECY CONCERNING THE JEWS.

The predictions concerning the Jews are so very minute, literal and graphical, extending through the greatest lapse of time, and occupying the largest number of prophets, living through many centuries, that it is most astonishing that any rational being can examine these and the history of this people, and doubt the inspiration of these prophets. Even Moses, in the thirty-second chapter of Deuteronomy, gives the whole prospective history, reaching down to the times yet unborn.

We may, perhaps, call your attention to this prophecy. But at present we shall pass on, with two or three brief notices, to other matters of more direct bearing.

Jeremiah xxxi. xxxii. expressly declare that the national constitution under which they then stood should be vacated, and a new one of different provisions instituted. But in connection with this explicit promise and prediction, the Lord declares that sooner will the sun, moon and stars cease to exist, than Israel cease to be a nation or people before him. His words are: "Thus says the Lord who gives the sun for a light by day, and the ordinances of the moon and stars for a light by night; If those ordinances depart from my presence, says the Lord, then the seed of Israel shall cease from being a nation before me forever." Thus adds the Lord, "If heaven above can be measured, and the foundations of the earth can be searched out beneath, I will also cast off all the seed of Israel for all that they have done, says the Lord."

This prediction is now nearly twenty-five hundred years old; and the children of Israel remain, even in their dispersion, a separate and distinct people. They have not amalgamated with any nation, nor can they.

It is now nearly four thousand years since God made promise to Abraham, concerning his seed, which have been accomplished, and are still accomplishing. They continue a separate and distinct people; and although the great and mighty empires of the Assyrians, Persians, Macedonians, and Romans have wasted away, still the seed of Abraham remains a people.

That the Jewish Scriptures which contain these prophecies, read before [illegible] as they now read, is Philadelphus was completed nearly three hundred years before the birth of the Messiah; and thus the Greeks were in possession of these oracles as well as the Jews. The version of the seventy Jews was read in all the synagogues of the Jews where the Greek language was spoken: they were public property ages before Jesus Christ was born. John the Baptist or any of the persons recorded in the New Testament history. No person could have any motive to interpolate them in favor of these persons. They wanted motive as well as opportunity. Admitting, then, these oracles read before the coming of the Messiah, only one hundred years before his birth, as they read now, no man can with any pretensions to rationality, resist the claims and pretensions of Jesus Christ. For he is as obviously the scope, drift and termination of these prophecies, as ever did a conclusion flow from any premises. Now that these oracles were universally read by Jews and by Greeks, as they now read, ages before the birth of Jesus, is as well established as any historic fact in the literature of the world. It was then read and known centuries before the birth of the Messiah that God had said that the sun, moon, and stars would cease to shine in the heavens sooner than this people cease to be a nation. No conquest nor dispersion, then, could ever annihilate their [illegible]. They yet continue; and if there was not another prediction, this one alone is sufficient to convince them that are not so blind as not to see the force of reason, nor to judge of the weight of testimony beyond all rational objection.

It would appear that nothing is wanting to gather this people into their own land, but the destruction of the Ottoman empire. This the prophecies seem to indicate. They are ever prepared to return. Their expectation is to return; and who can say that evidence in favor of such an event is at all doubtful, or the event itself improbable?

"Blindness," says Paul, "has happened to them in part, till the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled" (or over), then all Israel shall be saved; then the Jews shall be consolidated, and shall become the light of the whole world. And so all Israel shall yet be saved. "For if the casting of them away has been [illegible] reconciling the nations to the love of God, what shall the restoration of Israel to the favor of God be, but, as it were, life from the dead?" Then shall the funeral song of infidelity be sung. The destruction of the Mohammedan and antichristian kingdoms, and the restoration of the seed of Abraham to the favor of God, are all that is necessary to the introduction of the millennium. And that these events are upon the eve of being born, no man acquainted with the present history of the world, or with the Christian prophecies, can doubt.—Our Rest.

The above excellent article recently republished in Our Rest, concerning the restoration of the Jews to Palestine, their much-loved and long-desired home, is from the pen of Alexander Campbell. Many articles from the pen of this great man appeared in his Millennial Harbinger, published at Bethany, Va., fifteen to thirty years ago, relative to the gathering of the Jews to their land. And it was with great interest that he watched the movement of the European powers, during the Crimean war in 1854-5-6, bearing upon the Eastern question, the settlement of which he regarded as necessary before the Jews could re-inhabit their land.

Nor was Father Campbell alone in the Christian church in the advocacy of the replanting of the Jews in their land to be pulled up no more. Elder John T. Barkley who was selected and sent as missionary to Jerusalem, wrote many articles which appeared in the Harbinger, as expositions of prophetical declarations pointing directly in the same direction. And in a work published by Elder Matthews, of Bedford, Ind., entitled, "The Western Preacher," there appears a discourse upon "The Kingdom of the Heavens," by Elder James Challen, ably written, advocating the same doctrine. In this discourse Father Challen says that the Savior's reply to Peter's question, "what shall we have?" has never been fulfilled, and never will be, till Jesus returns to Earth, collects the Jews, and establishes his kingdom. He further remarks, that such a thing as a spiritual millenium was hardly thought of in the church until in the days of James Whitby, of the church of England.

These articles we heartily recommend to our old brethren of the Christian church, with whom we for more than fifteen years stood identified, for their careful reading and study. We [illegible]

the apostles and prophets, but have you not departed from the teachings your elder brethren? "Remove not the ancient land-marks."

Expository Notes.

1. We are come to . . . the spirits of the just men made perfect. Heb. xii. 22, 23.

This passage, properly read, says nothing about the perfecting of spirits, whatever may be here meant by the term, but the perfecting of just men. A glance at the original shows this, and a more correct, because unambiguous rendering would be (the spirits of perfected just men") (pneumasi teteleiomenon.)

There is, therefore, no ground here for the teaching of the Westminster confession, that "the souls (which, by the way, are not the spirits) of believers are at death made perfect in holiness."

The perfecting of just men, all scripture declares, will not be attained before "the resurrection of the just." The perfecting alluded to, moreover, being thus still in the future, it is evident, that the words "ye are come" must be understood either in a secondary sense, meaning "ye have to do with," or as spoken by that Divine anticipation, so frequent in the Scripture, of that which by and by will be attained.

2. I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren the prophets, and of them who keep the saying of this book. Rev. xxii. 9.

This saying of the angel who showed John the things which he recorded (verse 8), has been sometimes used to support some strange speculations. I have known it appealed to as a decisive proof that good men go to heaven at death. Others, more scripturally instructed on the state of man in death have found in the angel the prophet Elijah, who, centuries before, had been carried up into heaven without tasting of death.

Now, both these theories go on the assumption that the angel (or messenger) declares himself to be of the human race; but a slight consideration should suffice to show on what slender grounds this is assumed.

Be it observed that, in order to get this idea from the passage, a slight addition is tacitly made to the angel's words, and he is understood to say "I am one (or of the number) of thy brethren the prophets. I do not think that the construction of the original will admit of this addition, but on this point I am open to correction. It is worthy of notice, however, that in such passages as Matt. xxiv. 73—"Thou art one of them"—and Rev. xvii. 11—"of the seven",—where such an addition is admissible and requisite, the construction is entirely different from what we have here. In both of those passages we have the preposition ek; in this it is wanting.

But waiving this point, any English reader may see that if we must have some addition to the angel's words, there is another ready to our hand in the passage itself, which is just as likely to be the proper one. Supplying it, the saying would be, "I am thy fellow-servant, and fellow-servant of thy brethren the prophets." That such is the real sense, I have no doubt whatever, more especially when the Greek is found naturally to run thus, without any addition whatever: "I am a fellow-servant of thine, and of thy brethren the prophets.

This could well be said of one of the angelic host. He disclaimed the offered worship, being no more worthy of it than the apostle himself, or his brethren the prophets, or any other servant of the Almighty, to whom alone such homage was due.

There is a passage in Rev. xix. 10 very similar to the one now considered, and these remarks may apply equally to it.—M. W. Strang, in The Rainbow.

Perversions and Denials of Scripture.

It is a perversion of Scripture to affirm that when God created man he made a living and immortal soul within a body of dust, and that that same earth-compounded body was but the shell in which the true man lived.

The Mosaic account of man's creation says nothing of the kind. On the contrary, it clearly relates how God made man out of the dust of the ground, and by breathing into him the breath of life, the earth-formed man became a living soul or person.

2. It is a perversion of Scripture to affirm that it is this breath, or spirit of life, as possessed by man that gives him pre-eminence over all creation besides, inasmuch as the very birds of the air and beasts of the field share this spirit of life in common with man. Gen. vii. 22. So also, according to Moses, the beasts of the earth and the fowls of the air possess souls as well as man. See Gen. i. 20–30.—Marginal reading.

Paul also affirms man to be "of the earth earthy," in contrast with that [illegible] Scriptures, man is regarded as a physical organization, mortal and perishable as the grass of the field, fleeting as a shadow that continueth not.

3. It is a perversion of Scripture to assert that because man is said to have been made in the image of his Maker, he is therefore immortal as his Maker. Scripture no more predicates immortality of man in his present condition than it does omniscience or omnipotence. Immortality is said to pertain to God alone, and hereafter to be bestowed on some who will be raised out of their graves. Bible immortality for man is made to pertain to the raised body, and is never said to be an attribute of the soul as distinct from the body.

4. It is not merely a perversion of Scripture to affirm that man is or has a never-dying soul, or that he must live forever; it is a flat contradiction of the plainest Scripture statements. It was Satan who first dared to assert that man should not surely die, when God had said he should. Again and again do we read, "the soul that sinneth it shall die." See Ezek. xviii. and xxxiii.

5. It is a perversion of Scripture to say that because death is sometimes applied to man in his present moral or judicial condition before God, therefore the death threatened as the wages of sin is also a condition of living existence. Death as the wages of sin is explained by God Himself when He first declared—"Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return."

Also by the apostle Paul, in Romans, wherein he shows it to be the consummation of his moral condition, and as much a physical death as that our Lord experienced. Rom v. vi. vii. and viii.

It is a fearful perversion of Scripture to affirm that when God threatened death to Adam, He meant by it, not destruction of his being, but the endurance of unheard-of suffering in hell torment.

6. It is a denial of Scripture to affirm that the threatened destruction of sinners does not mean as literal a destruction of their physical being as that experienced by those destroyed by the flood, the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah, or those on whom the Tower of Siloam fell. Our Lord tells us the destruction will be as real and absolute as theirs.

7. It is a denial of Scripture [illegible] sert that the substitutional sufferings of Christ were not as much of a physical nature as of soul-suffering at the Hands of His Father before bowing His head in death. However terrible the soul-suffering might have been, the very essential element of the atonement consisted in death itself. Without the shedding of blood there could be no remission of sins. "He gave His flesh"—"Himself"—"poured out His soul unto death,"—"gave His life" as a ransom for many. "We are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all."

8. It is a denial of Scripture to assert that when Christ comes again He will not burn up the wicked like chaff or stubble. To affirm that He will keep them alive forever in the burning, is to deny the general teaching of the whole Bible. The Scriptures everywhere teach that "the Lord preserveth them that love Him, but all the wicked will He destroy." Like the morning cloud and early dew will they pass away, "be as though they had not been."

9. It is a denial of Scripture to assert that because the fire is said to be unquenchable, and that the worm dieth not, therefore the fire will not consume, or that the sinners will live on as well as the worm. God says, sinners shall be consumed and that they shall die. To say that they shall not is to make God a liar.

10. It is a denial of Scripture to affirm that after the first death the ungodly are to be raised in order that they should be cast into the lake of fire to experience a second life there; on the contrary, their doom is to be a "second death. So say the Scriptures.

11. It is a perversion of Scripture to accept parables and scenic representations in a literal sense, when by so doing they are made to contradict the obviously literal and most distinct utterances of divine inspiration. Parables, symbols, and allegorical representations can only be understood in the light of the more apparent Scripture teaching.

Friend—Consider the things you have been reading. Do not pretend to accept as a part of your creed that which to believe would be to madden. Do not be misled by the apparent meaning of two or three misunderstood texts, when these texts, as usually interpreted, prove subversive of the plainest Bible truth. Do not accept for doctrines the commandments of men. "Prove all things, hold fast that

O, I would live always, when carnage shall cease,
When strife shall be hushed in the silence of peace;
When trouble shall vanish, and sorrow be o'er,
And the accents of mourning be sounded no more.

O, I would live alway, when Eden shall bloom,
And fragrance delightful the air shall perfume;
When robes of rich verdure shall mantle the plain,
And beauty transcendant, unceasingly reign.

O, I would live always, triumphant o'er death,
Where life is unending, and not a mere breath;
A dying creation no longer shall groan,
Where age is as childhood, and death is unknown.

O, I would live always, when Zion shall sing,
With renewed enraptured to Jesus its King;
One Lord shall be crowned for the empire of earth,
And the ransomed of ages attain the new birth.

O, I want to be ready when Jesus shall come
To gather his people to Eden their home;
O, let me be numbered amid that bright throng—
Salvation and glory, the conqueror's song.

The Seed of Abraham According to the Flesh, and According to the Promise.

BY J. C. KINSEY.

The question, Whose is this great nation or kingdom that is to be a blessing to all nations?—has, I must confess, been answered more consistently by the other sects than by the Adventists. The others answer, The church; but the Adventists say that the Kingdom is to be set up on the earth, and then just when the blessing could flow out from this center to all nations, they stop the wheels and dry up all the fountains of life. At this point their machine stops. But that does not annul the covenant of God any more than the blunder that the Jews made, and they stumbled at that stumbling stone of the faith, overlooking the fact that their covenant of Sinai did not annul the faith, they sat it by works of law alone, and not by the hearing of the faith.

Was their fall a finality? Yes, say ten thousand gentiles, and Paul's voice echoes along the line of the ages, saying, God forbid,) but rather through their fall salvation is come to the Gentiles to provoke them to emulation.

But in what sense is the church the kingdom in the present or future and prospective? Peter does say to the church, Ye are a chosen race. More clearly taught in the Book than that the kingdom was due to them when the seed should come. John, the messenger of the Messiah, meant just what he said to them, that is, The kingdom of heaven is at hand. Jesus meant just what he said when he came out of Galilee, and said to them, The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom is at hand; as much as to say, The kingdom is due to you. Suppose they had accepted the seed, and the kingdom had been set up, could not Christ have still been a light to the Gentiles and the glory of God's people, Israel?

I am aware that it is argued that God, by his foreknowledge, foresaw that they would reject the Messiah. But it is not necessary to make mean dodges. The plan of Deity was laid in wisdom. The covenant made with Abraham concerning the blessing to all nations, that made with David concerning the throne and the dominion of all nations, could have been carried out had the kingdom been then set up. The covenant of the law that secured to them the kingdom and priesthood on conditions was appointed on account of transgressions till the seed should come to whom the promise related, was made with them as a body. The entire house of Jacob in mass, entered into the covenant. From that time forward the Lord dealt with them in so far as the covenant is concerned as a body, as a house, as a race. Moses was over this house of Israel, and he was faithful in all this house, for a witness. But Christ is a son over his one house, which house are we. If now we have two houses, two families, two bodies, —and this is dealing fairly with those who differ with us—as body they entered into the covenant of the law. This was appointed to hold them as a house till the seed should come. This covenant of Sinai, on condition, gave them the kingdom and priesthood, but did not give to them the land.

We are forced, then, to go back and look up the old record, and see where and in whom the title to the land is vested, and see where they stumbled and fell. In doing this, I submit to the consensus of opinion in the [illegible] curse of the law, being made a curse for us: for it is written, Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree: That the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ: that we might receive the annunciation of the Spirit through faith.

In this same chapter Paul affirms that the blessing to the nations, the blessing contained in the Abrahamic covenant, is in Christ—that the law issued 430 years afterwards did not invalidate the promise. For if the inheritance be by law it is no longer by promise, but God gave it to Abraham by promise.

The cross ends thus: "Blessing for the nations and the inheritance of the land are in Christ. The blessing is not due till the land is given in possession.

What was it that Christ redeemed us from? The law, the curse of the law; for it is written, Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them. It was written, Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree. They that were under the law were under the curse. They were all under the law, having as a body annexed to the law. They were all held and firmly bound by the law of sin and death till an offering should be made that should take away their sins. For this purpose Jesus was made out of a woman, made under the law, in order to redeem them that were under the law. Isaiah said, All we like sheep have gone astray, and the Lord hath laid on him (Christ) the iniquity of us all. The "us" of this prophecy embraces the whole house of Israel. All went astray, and the Lord made the iniquity of all to meet on him. As for thee also, by the blood of thy covenant I have sent forth thy prisoners out of the pit wherein is no water. Zech. ix: 11. And I took my staff beauty, and cut it asunder that I might break my covenant that I had made with all the people, and I cut asunder mine other staff binders that I might break the brotherhood between Judah and Israel; and I said to them, If you think good, give my price; so they weighed for my price the thirty pieces of silver. Here we have two shepherd staffs broken and three shepherds cut off in one month; the priest in his official relation to the people was a shepherd; so was the prince and king, and so was the judge. These three officials held the offices in the commonwealth of Israel, and we will find the priest and the judge in the restored kingdom of Israel.

The Jew turned up his orthodox nose at the Gentile dog, and the Gentile turns up his at fleshly Israel.

The fact is established that Christ was under the law, and this being the case, if he makes an offering at all he must make it according to the law, and the law was not taken out of the way; it was not annulled till he was nailed to the cross. The law required that the offering should be brought to the priest; the law required that every male that opened the womb should be redeemed with a price. Christ, when eight days old, was redeemed by his mother and Joseph, with a turtle dove. From that time forward, if he keeps the law in its true spirit and intent, it has no claim on him, and he is entitled to the things of this covenant—to the kingdom and priesthood. But the commonwealth was under the curse of the law, for they had not continued in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them. The kingdom and priesthood being under the curse of the covenant, must be redeemed. No one annuls or adds conditions to a covenant previously ratified. So said Paul. The covenant made with Abraham concerning the inheritance of the land was ratified by blood; but that clause in the covenant securing the blessing to all nations was ratified by the oath of God. That made with David, securing to the seed the throne and dominion of all nations, was ratified by the oath of the Eternal. The covenant of the law of Sinai, that secured to them, on conditions of obedience, the dominion and priesthood, was ratified in blood.

Who can add conditions to those two covenants ratified by God's oath? The inheritance and the blessing to all nations were based on the faith of Abraham; that faith was perfected by works of obedience, not obedience to the law made through Moses, but to the commands of the law under which he lived.

The same things were included in the covenant of the law, but on conditions that they kept the law. The law did not set aside the conditions of the previously ratified compact, and that was the faith.

In order then, for them to have secured the things of the covenant, it was necessary for them to have the faith of Abraham had, that is, to be doers of the law: for by works of the law no flesh is justified: not the hearers of the law but the doers of the law are blessed. It is clear that the law alone did not secure the blessing, but the faith of Abraham before the law, then the faith and obedience of the law whilst it had a legal standing. When that was taken out of the way, we fell right on the old line of faith again, independent of the law. Hence they that have the faith of Abraham are counted for the seed and heirs and heirs according to the promise. The promise is, that God will curse Abraham and his seed a great and mighty nation, and make this seed, this great nation, a blessing to all nations. Has it been done? Yet where is this great nation? From what center does this blessing flow out to all nations?

Correspondence.

DEAR BRETHREN:—I am at home again. Found all well as common. I held meeting at New Philadelphia one week, with good effect, although there were no additions. The Campbellites closed their house against us this time, but our brethren got a hall, and we had a good meeting. The Methodist minister was out one night, and by invitation talked about half an hour, finding fault with my position, that the saints would inherit the earth, and in support of the texts that are usually quoted to prove that people went to heaven at death. I met them all fairly, and he left the house before I had got quite done. From Palestine I went to Indianapolis, and held meeting over the next Sunday. I held meeting in the senate chamber. The weather was bad, but still we had a tolerably good hearing. The little few in the city are determined to let their light shine. There had been kept up an interest in the Park ever since I was there in August last. One Bro. Griggs has had a controversy with a Methodist minister for some time, and the Methodist minister finally quit. Brother Griggs is an able man, and the brethren are quite well pleased with his efforts. Since I left all the brethren at Dyson's, I visited the brethren at Brother Mossimore's, and held some meetings some four miles from Brother J. L. Wince's, with good attention. Brother and Sister Wince were present. May God bless them and all the dear ones, in that part of the country.

BRETHREN:—I wish to inform you of a preaching tour I made through a portion of this state and Missouri.

I left home June 3, and returned Nov. 4. Preached sixty discourses, baptized twenty-seven persons, and organized two churches—one at Wildcat and the other at Hiea. I also had three debates, one with a Campbellite on the immortality of the soul. I took the position that immortality was through Christ only, and he that souls are immortal and can never die. The next with two preachers at Hiea—one Methodist, the other Baptist. After three days they left the field, and I baptized sixteen of their members and one Roman Catholic.

When I returned I found that my little girl, four years old, had died, but if I am faithful I expect to greet her in the kingdom.

Brother Ryland is contending for the truth against great opposition. He is now sixty-four years old, but he still meets with the brethren every Sunday to break bread, sing, read the Word, etc. Brother Ryland was the first man to organize a church in this state, and the only one who has succeeded in keeping one together. I am going to Hiea to stay a year.

Your brother in the faith of the kingdom.

Questions.

1. When the time comes for Christ to reign over the house of Jacob forever, Luke i: 32, 33; Isa. ix.: 7; and the saints to reign with him, 2 Tim. ii. 12; Rev. xx. 4, 6, will not the saints also reign over the house of Jacob?

2. And if so, as we read that the saints are to be joint heirs, Rom. viii. 17; to have power over the nations; Rev. ii. 26, 27; to sit with him in the throne; Rev. iii. 21; to be kings and priests; Rev. v. 10; how can the house of Jacob and the saints be identical? Will some of our scribes answer?

Soothsayers and Necromancers.

It would be surprising to most people to know how many ancient superstitions still survive under new forms and a new nomenclature.

We laugh or shudder at the outbreak of Salem witchcraft and its melancholy consequences. But probably every element of that sad delusion is still in full force in every town in the land, excepting possibly the one point of belief in Abraham's bosom. That [illegible] of the air. Let the belief in a personal and malignant devil again be revived, to such an extent that he is imagined as a constant and powerful enemy of mankind, to whom men and women may deliver themselves for the sake of advantages which they desire, or by whom they may be taken captive to execute his evil designs, and we still have at hand all the other materials out of which to manufacture another delusion as revolting as any recorded in history.

There are now [illegible] wise intelligent, who still [illegible] openly believe in magical incantations, in obsession by evil spirits, in revelations, in ghosts, and astrology. There are those who expect to see evolved from the "stark ooze of nature" and the mysterious beforehand of the unknown useful and [illegible] witchcraft and every other form of astrology and soothsaying which will commend themselves to the wide-awake, practical mind of a free times and vastly enlarge the resources of the intelligent operator.

No defect or disappointment has power to disenchant the mob-beguiled public for sensations. It is with a queer sensation that one reads the newly-found record of ancient and wonderful superstitions which have had power among long-forgotten savage tribes and then stumble upon the same [illegible] in full force in some hidden nook almost at his door.

We once attended at court where evidence was brought to show that the plaintiff must be of unsound mind because he had conducted his business for years by advice of the necromancers. The plaintiff testified that he had done so, but had learned to his sorrow that he had never profited by such advice because the spirits of the dead would not allow themselves to be used for his temporal advantage. He was now stripped of all of his possessions; but although ruined by his relations with the dead, he avowed still his implicit confidence in them.

Here is a problem which must have patient and wise treatment for many years before we can boast of our civilization and enlightenment.—Liberal Christian.

The Refiner.

'Tis sweet to feel that he who tries
The silver, takes his seat
Beside the fire that purifies,
Lest too intense a heat,
Raised to consume the base alloy,
The precious metal to destroy.

'Tis good to think how well he knows
The silver's power to bear
The ordeal to which it goes;
And that, with skill and care,
He'll take it from the fire when fit
For his own hand, to polish it.

'Tis blessed—yes to know that he
The place he has begun
Will not forsake till he can see—
To prove the work well done—
An image by its boldness shown,
The perfect likeness of his own.

But ah! how much of earthly mould,
Dark relics of the mine,
Lost from the ore must he behold;
How base must be refine,
Ere in the silver he can trace
The first faint semblance of his face.

Thou Great Refiner, all thou by,
The promise to fulfill:
Move but thy hand, beneath thine eye,
And melted at the will,
O, may thy work forever shine,
Reflecting beauty pure as thine?

Who will not be Blessed or Saved?

BY R. V. LYON.

Upon my return from Canada, where I have been preaching the past two months, I found upon my table a magazine, advocating what a certain few who would be wise above what is written, a "fair-chance" theory, the universal salvation of the entire human family. And as some of this class have claimed to be taught by the same spirit with the opposite of this, namely, the non-living of the wicked—the transgressors of civil and divine law, I have concluded that it was my duty to not let my pen lie any longer silent.

That the number saved will be innumerable, as I have shown in my published works, I firmly believe; but the Bible justifies no one in harboring the thought that all the human family will be saved, or that those who knowingly reject either civil or divine law, will ever have a resurrection to life, in order that they may have another chance to be saved, or that the Lord may know whether they are goats or sheep.

In Gen. iii. we have a record of the penalty of a law which Adam and Eve transgressed, a part of which I will quote:

"And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel. Unto the woman he said, I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children; and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee." Verses 15, 16.

Here we have positive testimony that there was to be a race born that never would have been, if sin had not been introduced into the world—a surplus seed—two distinct families, two kinds of children: the seed of the woman, and the seed of the serpent; consequently not related to each other. A surplus race that never would have been born, if man had not sinned, hence a part of the curse! Therefore they are not embraced in the plan of salvation, from the fact that God has put enmity between them. And the seed of the wicked one was to bruise the heel of the woman's seed, by taking the animal or blood-life! And it has done it in putting to death Jesus and the martyrs; but the woman's seed was to bruise the serpent's head, or utterly destroy the surplus seed—the children of the devil.

It is said of Cain, the eldest child of the serpent's seed, that he was of that wicked one and slew his brother; "because his own works were evil, and his brother's righteous." John iii. 12. Therefore he was an enemy of the woman's seed; and it is recorded "that they shall be cut off" from life, "from among the children of men," the children of God. Psa. xxi. 10; xxvii. 28.

Their depravity is graphically portrayed in Psa. xiv. 1–4; Isa. i. 5, 6; Rom. i, 18–32.

"The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God. They are corrupt, they have done abominable works, there is none that doeth good. The Lord looked down from heaven upon the children of men to see if there were any that did understand and seek God. They are all gone aside, they are altogether become filthy; there is none that doeth good, no, not one. Have all the workers of iniquity no knowledge? who eat up my people as they eat bread, and call not upon the Lord. Why should ye be stricken any more? ye will revolt more and more; the whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint. From the sole of the foot even unto the head there is no soundness in it; but wounds, and bruises, and putrifying sores; they have not been closed, neither bound up, neither mollified with ointment. * * * * And even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient; being filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness; full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity; whisperers, backbiters, haters of God, despiteful, proud, boasters, inventors of evil things, disobedient to parents, without understanding, covenantbreakers, without natural affection, implacable, unmerciful; who knowing the judgment of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them."

David informs us, Ps. lviii. 3, 4, that "The wicked are estranged from the womb; they go astray as soon as they are born, speaking lies. Their poison is like the poison of a serpent; they are like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear; which will not hearken to the voice of charmers, charming never so wisely." Because they have no innate love of truth and righteousness; have no aspirations for anything that is heavenly or God-like! No desire to be associated with the pure and blessed of all past ages, in the world to come. No eligibility to eternal life. They are not of God, therefore they cannot hear his word. John viii. 47. Hence Jesus is to them, "as a root out of dry ground; he hath no form or comeliness, no beauty, that they should desire him." Isa. liii. 2. Consequently they have a strong aversion to him. And when "the Ethiopian changes his skin, or the leopard his spots, then may ye also do good, that are accustomed to do evil. Therefore will I scatter them as the stubble that passeth away by the wind of the wilderness." Jer. xiii. 23, 24.

Solomon considers them as having no pre-eminence above a beast. And he asks God to manifest them, that they might see that they are beasts! That one thing befalleth them; that they die alike; because they have no hope of a resurrection. They have one breath—spirit. They are vanity, they all go to one place, they are all of the dust, and they all turn to dust again; and that is the end of them. Eccl. iii. 18, 19.

David, in speaking of them, says they are "like the beasts that perish." And "like sheep they are laid in sheol, the grave, they shall never see light." Psa. xlix. 12-20.

Are beasts to have a resurrection and be saved, or to be put on trial, in order that the Lord may know that they are beasts? Jesus calls them "tares," and "goats," "children of the wicked one." And no man makes himself a tare or a goat. That they "were of their father the devil." Matt. xiii. 38; xxv. 32; John viii. 44. In Matt. iii. 7; xii. 34, he and John the immerser, calls them "generation of vipers."

Respected friends! Can you make a sheep out of a goat, or wheat out of tares, or disciples of Jesus out of vipers?

Here comes in the unerring foreknowledge of God, who knew the end from the beginning; therefore he knew his own children. Isa. xlvi. 10. Trial, therefore, is not to add to his knowledge. So in the ages to come, there can be no need of putting any on trial whom he knows is not eligible to salvation. What folly to resurrect a goat, or a tare, or a viper to put on trial to see if they would not turn out to be a sheep, or wheat, or a child of God.

Trial does not create a character, it only develops one which already exists in embryo. If a person possesses the latent germ of rectitude, trial will bring it out into the likeness of God in Christ Jesus. Matt. xii. 20. But there is no way known by men or angels, neither has God revealed any way to get that out of a man which is not in him; or put that into him which he has no capacity to receive, appreciate, or retain.

Peter and Jude have given a vivid description of their character and final doom, leaving them in the empire of death, without any hope of life, either limited or eternal, in the future. 2 Peter ii. 10-17; Jude 10-13.

"But chiefly them that walk after the flesh in the lust of uncleanness, and despise government. Presumptuous are they, self-willed, they are not afraid to speak evil of dignities. Whereas angels, which are greater in power and might, bring not railing accusation against them before the Lord. But these, as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things that they understand not; and shall utterly perish in their own corruption; and shall receive the reward of unrighteousness, as they that count it pleasure to riot in the day time. Spots they are and blemishes, sporting themselves with their own deceivings while they feast with you; having eyes full of adultery, and that cannot cease from sin, beguiling unstable souls; an heart they have exercised with covetous practices; cursed children; which have forsaken the right way, and are gone astray, following the way of Balaam, the son of Bosor, who loved the wages of unrighteousness; but was rebuked for his iniquity: the dumb ass speaking with man's voice forbad the madness of the prophet. These are wells without water, clouds that are carried with a tempest; to whom the mist of darkness is reserved forever." * * * *

"But these speak evil of those things which they know not, but what they know naturally, as brute beasts, in those things they corrupt themselves. Woe unto them! for they have gone in the way of Cain, and ran greedily after the error of Balaam for reward, and perished in the gainsaying of Core. These are spots in your feasts of charity, when they feast with you, feeding themselves without fear; clouds they are without water, carried about of winds; trees whose fruit withereth, without fruit, twice dead, plucked up by the roots; raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame; wandering stars, to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness forever."

If this is to be their character and condition, you ask why are they to blame? I answer in the language of St. Paul, Rom. i. 18-25; ii. 12-15. "For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness; because that which may be known of God is manifest in them; for God hath shewed it unto them. For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse; because that when they knew God, they glorified him not as God neither were thankful; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, and changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and fourfooted beasts, and creeping things; wherefore God also gave them up to uncleanness through the lusts of their own hearts, to dishonor their own bodies between themselves; who changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, who is blessed forever. Amen."

Thus we learn "that the invisible things of God from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so they are without excuse." Therefore they will not be resurrected in order that "they may have an opportunity to reject Jesus, and die a second time, as some teach. For St. Paul has informed us, that "it is appointed unto us once to die, but after this the sentence."

Again he informs us that "as many as have sinned without law shall perish without law; and as many as have sinned in the law shall be judged by the law; for not the hearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified. For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves; which shew the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts meanwhile accusing or else excusing one another." Rom. ii. 12-15. The law was given to Israel, not to the Gentiles. Rom. ix. 3, 4. "Who are Israelites; to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises. And by it they will be judged; that is, it will be decided subsequent to the coming of Jesus, who among them have knowingly and willfully sinned in the law; and who among them have kept the law; the latter will be judged worthy of a resurrection: the former doomed to remain in the congregation of the dead! For Solomon has asserted by the authority of Abraham's God, that "The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead." Prov. xxi. 16.

And the Gentiles who have sinned without the revealed law of God, shall perish without it, for they show by their works the law written in their hearts, by instituting a penal code of laws, by which families and nations are to be governed. Therefore, they are a law unto themselves. And those who live up to this code, or try to, out of love to purity, and Godlikeness, like Socrates, the great Gentile philosopher, give indubitable evidence, that they would embrace the Gospel if it had been presented to them, or should be. Hence, they will be judged worthy of a resurrection to the same nature that Adam possessed prior to his fall, that they may embrace Jesus the life-giver, and the only be saved. But those who transgress this law knowingly; and for the want of innate love of truth, righteousness, holiness and Godlikeness, have rejected the Gospel in its purity and consistent fulness, in other ages the order had been forfeited.

2. The precepts are plain and positive as to the preaching of the word—repentance, faith, baptism, Lord's supper, and many points of Christian and social intercourse; and yet so much is left to the piety, judgment, and discretion of each individual or church that no leader or body has been able to formulate an authoritative system of church order, save in the apostasy, in Rome and her daughters.

The free spirit of the Gospel, "the simplicity of Christ," allies us to God. Its fellowship is with the Father and Son, Jesus Christ, 1 John i. 3. The effort of grace is to lift the believer, in spirit, out of "this world" and into sympathy with that "which is to come." And there is no need for much form, or show of official authority where professors "live in the spirit—walk in the spirit and have no confidence in the flesh."

The misery of our churches comes from their want of "the mind of Christ," and their excessive "confidence in the flesh." The Divine element is deeply wanting! The human is prevailing! Hence there can be no general change, till Satan shall be bound and the promised kingdom of Christ shall come, by the second coming of "the king of kings!" In Christian love yours,

To Brother R. V. Lyon.

Your exposition of Ezek. xvi. 53, has long been mine, and may be compared with Jer. xlviii, 47; xlix. 6-39, where Moab and Ammon, Edom and Elam (or Persia) are mentioned, as "Sodom and her daughters" are in that text, and subjects of restoration.

Nationalities are personified; and this personification (prosopopeia) embraces and applies to their geographical position!

The principle comes out in Isa. i. 2; Jer. xxii. 29; Ezek. xxxvi. 4; Micah i. 2. As to the earth—"Oh, earth, earth, earth! hear the word of the Lord!"

Let this fact stand. The earth may be addressed under the figure called personification! Then, what follows? This follows of course: "All things spoken by all the prophets" shall be restored. Then Judea and all the surrounding nations, or geographical localities, and "the earth," as a whole, will be embraced.

This leaves other texts to teach the judgment of God on individuals; and classes of the human race. There is no truth that collides with truth; but it is often as "high as heaven" above our still darkened minds.

J. B. COOK.

To Brother Joel A. Simonds.

Your questions as to church government may be easily answered; as I think. But as others treat the subject, it has not been, nor never can be, answered. Many have reasoned out an answer from analogy, based on the old dispensation—on our republican system—or on the general principles of human precedence; and thus, all Christendom is filled with schism.

The difficulty lies in not taking "the revelation of God," and being governed by it, in regard to the edifying of "the body of Christ." Eph. iv. 11-14. Let the epistles of Timothy and Titus; with the commission, (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20; Mark xvi. 15-16; Luke xxiv. 47, and the acts of the apostles, Chron. ii. etc.

In early times, the rules to govern in divine worship and service, were given with particularity and precision. The altar, the sacrifice, the priesthood, the tithes, the sanctuary, and the temple ritual, were matters of minute and legal exactness.

But under "the Gospel—with unveiled face,—beholding the glory of the Lord," it is not so. Now, our apparel; our place of worship; our gifts to sustain and extend it; our assembling of ourselves together, to exhort and edify one another; our frequent or infrequent observances of the ordinances, (as in 1 Cor. xi. 23-26, "As often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup, you do show the Lord's death till he comes!") Our appointment of officers to conduct the services, "decently and in order;" our church edifices "upstairs or down-stairs," or in the tented grove—with no edifice—seem left on purpose to be decided by the spirit and providence of God, and the "wisdom and prudence" of the brotherhood. It may be that the strongest and prevailing test of our loyalty to Christ, lies just here—in our loving "obedience of faith" to him, with no specially prescribed rules as to much of the details in Christian life an labor. We all may know something of the multitude of professors who fall and fall below the Gospel standard, while yet there is no absolute law by which to convict and condemn them. Thus it is with congregated churches, of all orders and varied names, from Rome to Utah, in the Rocky mountains of America. There is great diversity as to doctrine and discipline, even in Rome; in the Church of England, and other ecclesiastical bodies; so that discipline is made difficult in dealing with single churches, as well as with individuals.

The cause (aside from human frailty) lies in the two fundamental facts:

1. There is no act of church organization and government recorded in the New Testament, [illegible]

2. The precepts are plain and positive as to the preaching of the word—repentance, faith, baptism, Lord's supper, and many points of Christian and social intercourse; and yet so much is left to the piety, judgment, and discretion of each individual or church that no leader or body has been able to formulate an authoritative system of church order, save in the apostasy, in Rome and her daughters.

The free spirit of the Gospel, "the simplicity of Christ," allies us to God. Its fellowship is with the Father and Son, Jesus Christ, 1 John i. 3. Reflections.

The Lord is a rock—a sure foundation, which no political revolution can shake, no waves of persecution overflow. He is the foundation of truth, of right and of power. The believer in Jesus builds on this foundation and shall abide forever. And when the wicked are in power, and the ungodly taunt him as one that is without refuge, or the timorous advise ignominious flight and resort to earthly defences, he can say, "In the Lord put I my trust: how say ye to my soul, Flee as a bird to your mountain! For lo, the wicked bend the bow, they make ready their arrows upon the string, that they may privily shoot at the upright in heart."

There are times when the people of God are in extreme peril, secretly assailed by the wicked, and without redress or protection from the rulers of this world, who subvert the principles of justice for earthly gain, and regard not the rights of man nor the laws of God; times when the righteous seem to be shut up and delivered over to oppression and slaughter, and the question seems pertinent enough, "If the foundations be destroyed, what can the righteous do?" Nothing; they can do nothing but in well doing commit the keeping of their souls to God as unto a faithful creator. And that they can confidently do; for, "The Lord is in his holy temple, the Lord's throne is in heaven; his eyes behold, his eyelids try the children of men." All are under his inspection; all are subject to trial. Few think of God at all or remember that he searcheth their hearts, and taketh account of their ways. But "the Lord trieth the righteous;" for their good, careth for them in their afflictions, and will save them through trial; "but the wicked and him that doeth violence his soul hateth," and though now prosperous they are not blessed, for their end is destruction. "Upon the wicked he shall rain snares, fire and brimstone, and a horrible tempest; the portion of their cup." Ah! what a portion! How terrible their doom! How fearful the examples! In the days of Noah they disregarded all warning until the flood came and took them all away. In the days of Lot they practiced their ungodly deeds till the Lord rained fire and brimstone upon them out of heaven: and so shall it be in the last days; they shall say, peace and safety; but sudden destruction shall come upon them and they shall not escape.

But as Noah was saved from the flood which overwhelmed the wicked; and as Lot was saved from the fiery tempest which destroyed Sodom; so the righteous shall be saved from the perdition of the world; "for the righteous Lord loveth righteousness; his countenance doth behold the upright." They shall be hidden in the day of his anger; in the secret of his tabernacle will he hide them.—J. G. W.

The Second Coming of Christ.

"And as he sat upon the Mount of Olives, the disciples came unto him privately, saying, Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the signs of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" Matt. xxiv. 3.

The "coming of the Son of Man" and "the end of the world" are two of the most solemn and awful subjects found in the word of God. In the text, the disciples associate the coming of Christ with the end of the world, and enquire of the signs which shall foreshadow these events, substantially asking the questions: 1. When shall Jerusalem be destroyed? 2. What shall be the sign of thy return to the earth? 3. When shall be the end of the world?

[illegible] the destruction of Jerusalem to all [illegible] clouds and with the holy angels, but that he will not return to the earth; that he will set his throne in the air, there summon the universe before his tribunal, and, after burning up the earth and pronouncing the sentence of eternal punishment on the wicked, he will gather his saints and take them to heaven from whence he came, and thus come and go without having set foot upon the earth.

The Scriptures assures us that Christ is to return to the earth, that he shall stand upon the earth, that "he shall reign with his saints upon the earth." He is to return to that from which he departed. He did not depart from the air, but from the earth. Here on this earth, where he was born, where he lived thirty-three years, where he died, and from which he ascended, to this very earth he is to return, not to annihilate it, be to pass it through its baptism of fire, and bring it out a "new earth." This earth that gave him a manger will, upon his return, give him a throne. This earth that drank his tears and blood will by acclamation proclaim him "King of kings and Lord of lords. And in such an hour as we think not will he come.—J. H. Lightbourn.

The Coming of the Lord Draweth Nigh.

The imminent necessity for the world's reformation and purification I take as a proof of the fact that "the coming of the Lord draweth nigh."

That God is coming with his judgments among the nations I cannot doubt. Look at the floods on both sides the sea. France going down under the wave; the wealth of nations swept off in a day; harvests, vineyards, villages unmoored. Look at the insectiferous assault which was first considered hardly worthy of a small item in a newspaper; but the grasshopper, and the Colorado bug, and the army worm have gone on until public fasts have been declared, and the Lord Almighty invoked to arrest the public calamity. Look at the marine disasters and hear the voice of the shipwrecks. Listen to the roar of the unparalleled conflagrations in Chicago, and Boston, and London. See the toppling over of great commercial establishments everywhere. I tell you that God's controversy with the nations has begun. "The coming of the Lord draweth nigh. T. De Witt Talmage.

Dangers are most fatal when least feared.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.
THE RESTITUTION advocates the "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the speedy coming of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and its immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations: the restoration of Israel; the literal reserve during the Millennial age; the universalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other Apostolic truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and conversion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Communications.—The Editor must not be understood as endorsing all the sentiments expressed by correspondents whose articles are inserted under this head. Each writer is alone responsible for the article bearing his own signature. If the teachings of any writer do not edify us, as scriptural, forth the views of the party differing may be forwarded. Free discussion of Bible doctrines on all sides will be allowed, but the Editor reserves the privilege of rejecting those communications which antagonize a belief and obedience of the Gospel as a means of salvation, or which undermine its principles.

The Seed of Abraham According to the Flesh, and According to the Promise.

BY J. C. KINSEY.

I ask all candid Adventists, and I am sure that there are many such, to take their stand and tell us which death expires at the time spoken of by John. The covenant of law legally expired when Jesus cried, "It is finished," and gave up the ghost, and the vail of the temple was rent. It began at Sinai, and it ended at the Cross. If the death spoken of has an end, it must also have had a beginning. Jesus did not give to the disciples the cup, the token of the new covenant, until after Judas had bargained with the chief priests, to deliver him up, and that covenant was to this effect: You are they that have continued with me in my trials, and I covenant for you a kingdom, even as my father hath covenanted for me a kingdom, that you may eat and drink with me at my table, in my kingdom, and sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel.

Covenants ratified by blood are firm, and this is the only one of which we have any account that Jesus made with his disciples. This is the blood of the new covenant, "this cup shed for you and for many, for remission of sins."

The law is clear. He that runs may read. This cup belongs to the one body that are seeking positions in the kingdom. Israel did not obtain it. The thing sat a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for a purpose. See 1 Peter 1: 5: "Ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ."

This house is to be builded of living stones—stones that have life—for the Father has life in himself, and gave to the son to have life in himself, and to give to the son authority to give eternal life to as many as he wills. The Son says, "I will give to him eternal life, and will raise him up at the last day,"—the last day of this age.

This life is due to the heirs of the promise. Then they who have the faith that Abraham had will constitute this spiritual house, this royal priesthood, this people for a purpose—and that purpose is that through and from them the blessing to all nations shall flow out.

"For I have said, Mercy shall be built up for ever: thy faithfulness shalt thou establish in the very heavens. I have made a covenant with my chosen, I have sworn unto David my servant, Thy seed will I establish forever, and build up thy throne to all generations." Ps. lxxxix: 2-4.

But how can this be done, if generation ceases at the time of the Lord's coming? At that time the throne lies in ruins.

I also will make him, the first-born, higher than the kings of the earth. My mercy—ah, mystery to the theologian—also will I keep for him for ever more. My covenant shall stand fast with him. His "seed" will I make also to endure, and his throne as the days of heaven. They shall "endure as long as the sun and moon endure throughout all generations." Com.

Do the generations of the present age bear him?

"He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth." Ps. lxxii: 8.

Dominion over whom? Let Advent folly answer.

The kings of Tarshish and of the Isles shall bring presents. The kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts; yea, all kings shall fall down before him. All nations shall serve him.

But whom?

And he shall speak peace unto the heathen, and his dominion shall be from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth.

"Sing and rejoice, O daughter of Zion; for, lo, I come, and I will dwell in the midst of thee, saith the Lord. And many nations shall be joined to the Lord in that day, and shall be my people; and I will dwell in the midst of thee, and thou shalt know that the Lord of hosts hath sent me unto thee." Zech. ii: 10, 11.

What! are many nations to be joined to the Lord in that day when he comes to dwell in the midst of the daughters of Zion? Is this one of the Adventists conditional prophecies? See Zech. ii: 12:

"And the Lord shall inherit Judah, his portion in the holy land, and shall choose Jerusalem again."

Let us look at the Lord's portion in the holy land. See Ezekiel xlv. 1:

"Moreover, when ye shall divide by lot the land for inheritance, ye shall offer an oblation unto the Lord, a holy portion of the land: the length shall be the length of five and twenty thousand reeds, and the breadth shall be ten thousand. This shall be holy in all the borders thereof round about."

But this is one of their conditional prophecies; and thus makes Isaiah and all the prophecies conditional, for all are linked together.

"It was round about eighteen thousand measures: and the name of the city from that day shall be, The Lord is there." Ezekiel xlviii. 35.

"And it shall be said in that day, Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us: this is the Lord: we have waited for him, we will rejoice and be glad in his salvation." Isa. xxv: 9.

"Then the moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously." Isa. xxiv: 23.

Unless all in the Book is conditional, then, after the Lord comes and dwells in Zion, many nations will be joined to the Lord (in covenant). No nation has been joined to him since that of the Hebrews was joined to him at Sinai; and as a nation they were broken off, and the only question that honest men can raise is, Will they be one of the many that are to be united?

If the Book does not settle this in the affirmative, then I shall call upon Adventists to settle it for me. Not one of the Gentile nations has been joined to the Lord, as a nation. It is true that they are joined to the harlot of Rome: but not to the Lord of hosts, who is to reign in mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and in the presence of his ancients gloriously.

The Gentiles were visited to take out of them a people for his name. If it is a fact that the forfeited kingdom of Israel and the promised territory of the kingdom was purchased by the blood of Jesus Christ, which was forfeited by the natural seed, was redeemed by the one seed of the promise, Jesus did not, or could not, minister to the nations till the covenant with Israel was abrogated. Hear him:

"For the Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which is lost." "I am not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel."

Not one of the Gentile nations ever did or ever will exist as a commonalty under any one of the covenants. They have had and will continue to have an existence until the second Adam shall come. Under the old Adamic creation and the Adamic law they are an ordinance of God under the old creation.

But the kingdom of Israel did exist under the covenant of God made at Sinai, and all of God's covenants have to do with the promise. The kingdom of Israel set up at Jerusalem is the restored kingdom. The seed after the flesh forfeited the inheritance, and the judgments [illegible] and the Gentiles [illegible] gain that which was lost.

The twelve tribes were there in their high organizations, when the kingdom of Israel established also the kingdom of God was established, and Christ sat on the throne of the Lord and reigned in dominion over all Israel. And now for the restoration of his kingdom.

1. The throne:

"He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest: and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end." Luke i: 32-33.

"And I will restore thy judges as at the first, and thy counselors as at the beginning: afterward thou shalt be called The city of righteousness, the faithful city." Isa. i: 26.

"And I will cause the captivity of Judah and the captivity of Israel to return, and will build them as at the first." Jer. xxxiii: 7.

And this is to be in the day that God performs that good thing promised to Judah and to Israel. And at that time the branch of righteousness is to grow up to David, and to execute judgment and righteousness in the land. Jer. xxxiii. 14, 15.

"Considerest thou not what this people have spoken, saying, The two families which the Lord hath chosen, he hath even cast them off? thus they have despised my people, that they should be no more a nation before them." Jer. xxxiii: 24.

The Adventists have said this thing. This is just what is said right. Testily Israel that [illegible] and David [illegible] pain till now, waiting for the adoption and the redemption of our bodies; for the creation itself shall be freed from the slavery of corruption into the glorious freedom of the sons of God. The seed of Adam, from Cain to the latest born, is the creation. The old creation, the children of the promise, are the re-creation, constituted the sons of God by resurrection and regeneration. This body is the blessing to all nations, promised in the Abrahamic covenant. Then those who may live under the living dominion, will live or die, as their actions may determine. The moment you resurrect the Adamic dead, they then become the re-created, and are not the creation that groans and is in pain to be delivered.

There is one straight line of truth in God's Word; and I earnestly hope that those who have this truth, and who have the means and ability to set it before the people, will spare neither time nor means in the great work. The conflict will soon end: and then, beyond the expiring groans of falling thrones and dominions, the peace, joy and light of the new-born creations will flash from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth.

Amen.

Fierce Opposition to Christ at his Second Coming.

BY D. PITCAIRN.

"Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing? The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against the Lord, and against his anointed, saying, Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us. He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh: the Lord shall have them in derision. Then shall he speak unto them in his wrath, and vex them in his sore displeasure."—Psa. ii. 1-5.

Nothing that happened to the Lord Jesus Christ himself, during the short period of his first advent; and nothing that has befallen his true Church since that period, during the many centuries which have elapsed, has fully realized or accomplished the events and circumstances which are prophetically described in the opening verses of this psalm.

We know that kings and people, both Jews and Gentiles, did confederate against Jehovah and his Christ, and did succeed in bringing the Son of God, the King of Zion, to an ignominious death. And inspired apostles have assured us that what God spoke of old by the mouth of his servant David, prepared them for the persecuting opposition which was made to Christ himself, and likewise to themselves, and to other believers, because of their connection with him. But the occasion on which this psalm was written, and the subject of which it treats, in its historical reference to the literal David, must be our guide in fixing the time and the events in the history of the spiritual David, when, and in which, its predictions shall be exactly and awfully fulfilled.

None of the persecutions that David suffered at the hand of Saul, after Samuel had anointed him to be King, at all answers the descriptions given in the psalm. No, Saul the Benjamite, was a solitary persecutor, and David, in the life time of Saul, was living as a private individual. And in like manner after the death of Saul, when the tribe of Judah acknowledged and anointed David again as king at Hebron, we read, "Now there was long war between the house of Saul and the house of David; but David waxed stronger and stronger, and the house of Saul waxed weaker and weaker." 2 Sam. iii. 1. In the first instance, Saul himself, and afterwards the house of Saul, waged a ceaseless warfare against the anointed of Jehovah. But up to the period when all the tribes united once more in anointing him as king of Israel, we hear of no hostile movements among the heathen against David. And without doubt, David was so manifestly a type of Christ in his character of the mighty warrior—the militant king, we may be certain that these three different anointings which David received, and these three different conditions into which these anointings brought him must be typical of some corresponding circumstances in the development of the royal power and prerogatives of David's great Antitype.

The Son of Jesse did not at once and immediately come into the possession and exercise of the sovereignty to which God had chosen and anointed him. And Israel, indeed, was the count of his power, and the extent [illegible] preparation going forward for that great confederacy of kings and peoples which the psalm so graphically describes.

1. Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing?

2. The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against the Lord, and against his Anointed, saying,

3. Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us.

Here is not only a description of kingdoms in commotion, and of armies congregated, and of rulers and statesmen consulting together, against Jehovah and against his Anointed; but the question is asked, "Why?—why are all nations thus raging, and all things thus taking counsel?" And whilst the inspired reply does not directly explain the reason, yet it unfolds the results:—

4. He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh: the Lord shall have them in derision.

5. Then shall he speak unto them in his wrath, and vex them in his sore displeasure.

We must now turn to the pages of unfulfilled prophecy, for additional proofs that events of such magnitude and importance, as we suppose the Psalmist here predicts, are really to be expected in the last times of this existing dispensation; and especially in connection with the promised coming of the Lord Jesus to "make all things new." But the passages which might be quoted are so numerous, we can only select a few, and on these our remarks must be limited.

"The Assyrian," of whom Isaiah prophesies—(chap. x. xiv.)—was in his day the head of what has been designated an universal monarchy. His one sovereignty embraced a multiplicity of tribes and states, of kings and princes. This mighty monarch, this king of kings, was the instrument in the hand of God for overthrowing the kingdom of Israel; and on him in his turn the judgments of heaven were foredoomed. If time and space permitted, it might be shown that these predictions have as yet received only a partial or inchoate fulfillment, and that this Assyrian is the type of a still future head of many nations—the great personal antichrist of the last days, under whose auspices there will be a still greater confederation of kings and peoples against Messiah and the saints of God, than that which assailed Samaria of old; and that his end shall be awful beyond what any Assyrian monarch ever personally experienced. "The Lord of hosts hath sworn, saying, Surely as I have thought, so shall it come to pass; and as I have purposed so shall it stand: that I will break the Assyrian in my land, and upon my mountains tread him under foot." This judgment, it will be observed, is to be executed by Jehovah himself; and it is to be executed in that locality which he calls "my land," and "my mountains." And when the Assyrian is thus broken, it is added, "then shall his yoke depart from off them, that is, the people who inhabit the land and the mountains which Jehovah claims as his, and his burden depart from their shoulders." Isa. xiv. 24-25. Now, it is notorious that never since the Assyrian destroyed the cities of Israel, and carried the inhabitants away as captives to other countries, have the Israelites (the ten tribes) been delivered from the yoke of burden and their oppressors, or have been permitted to return to their land, which God calls his, and which he gave to them. This prophecy must, therefore, have reference to a deliverence yet to come; and, that the prophecy embraces other lands besides Palestine, and other peoples besides the Israelites, is obvious from the verse which follows the quotation already given: "This is the purpose that is purposed upon the whole earth; and this is the hand which is stretched out upon all the nations."

In the writings of the same prophet, we also find many things predicted of Babylon and Tyre, and Edom, of which it cannot be affirmed that an exact and perfect accomplishment has yet taken place. All of these, at some particular period, or in some particular way, were the powerful enemies and oppressors of God's ancient people. And in that character we seem to be warranted in viewing them as types of enemies and oppressors yet to be revealed, the fierce opponents of God's anointed King of Zion, and of all his subjects, the natural and the spiritual seed of Abraham. But with them it shall fare as it did of old with Babylon, and Tyre and Edom. The Lord will hold them in derision. He will laugh at their vain attempts to defeat his purposes, and will overthrow them with an everlasting destruction.

To undertake an explanation of any of these most important prophecies comes not within our present intention, and would occupy far more space than can be afforded. It may, however, be well just to notice that the king of Babylon, over whose fall so remarkable a proverb or taunting is taken up, is named, "Lucifer Son of the Morning;" (Isa. xiv. 12) and then the strongest statements are made of his proud and blasphemous aspiring. In the margin, the word "Lucifer" is translated "Day-Star." And surely in this very extraordinary title we can not fail to perceive an assimilation to the real "Morning-Star," a title which the Lord Jesus Christ takes to himself and promises to his faithful servants, when he is about to be manifested in his kingly glory—when he comes to terminate the long night of misrule and oppression, and injustice, which has brooded over our sinful world, and to usher in the brighter and better day of heavenly rule among men. So, likewise, whether this title is assumed by the king of Babylon, or merely conferred upon him by his admiring and lamenting votaries, it plainly intimates such an ambitious desire to stand in the stead of Christ himself, as may well befit the personal antichrist of the perilous times which are coming upon the world.

Better a thousandfold sacrifice elegance than fervor; better have the outward forms of devotion imperfect and inartistic, than lose the spirit that alone gives them value; better that music should be discordant than soulless, the prayers broken and rugged than cold and undevout, the altar bare and unattractive than the fire that ought to burn on it extinguished.

We learn that a disastrous conflagration has occurred in Memel, Russia, principally inhabited by Jews, of whom 8000 have been rendered homeless; many Jews have been burnt to death, and hundreds injured. The German Jewish journals are publishing appeals for rebuilding the synagogues and schools which have been totally destroyed.—Jewish World.

THE RESTITUTION

PLYMOUTH, IND.....Dec. 8, 1875

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.

☞ Some of our brethren have now had a free and fair opportunity to express their views upon certain questions bearing upon the destiny of the ancients. Enough is as good as a feast. Here the matter ends. It is a matter to be regretted that we should be so much concerned about the destiny of the ancients, of the heathen, when the fields all around us are ripe for the harvest. Men are perishing to-day. All we can say or do, will not effect the dead. Our mission is to help men now. We sincerely hope that our brethren will give us articles upon living truths. Let dead men and dead subjects alone. Christ said: "Let the dead bury their dead; but go thou and preach the kingdom of God." He taught questions and speculations which lie beyond the plain, "thus saith the Lord," should be let alone. This is especially true as regards those subjects which do not concern men who are now dying for want of the Gospel of life. Give us God's truth in the love and fear of Christ, and let hobbies alone.

Moody's Doctrinal Views.

Mr. Moody is a strong believer in the personal coming of our Lord. The following extract from the Christian Union will show he stands upon one of the most important doctrines of revelation. It appears that nearly every earnest worker for Christ is looking for the coming of him who is the Way, the Truth, and the Life:

"The fundamental idea of Mr. Moody is, that Christ is to come a second time to reconstruct the world, and that that coming may be at any hour—this year, this month, to-morrow, perhaps, that the world will never be made any better by any or all human influences, and will go on from bad to worse till Christ comes with power to destroy and rebuild; that all labor in building up society as such, and all laws, governments, industries, institutions, will fail to ameliorate the condition of the great world which 'lieth in wickedness,' and that we can do no more than to snatch as many as possible from impending ruin, without any thought or waste of time upon human society. To him the world is a wreck, fast foundering. It is no use trying to save it. Its leaks cannot be stopped. It is steadily settling. It can never be towed into harbor. It must inevitably go under. All that can be done is to get a life boat to it, and save as many of its passengers as possible. Everything else is labor thrown away

Opposition.

Nothing is more natural than to dislike being opposed. All men like to have their own way because they think their way is the right way, and it is very natural, indeed inevitable, that they should regard those who oppose them as opposing the right. With this fact before us, it is easy to see whence arises all the bitterness of controvesy. It is ill honest; the noble protest of the right against the wrong. They who maintain the wrong thinking it the right, are noble in exact proportion to the energy and zeal they manifest. Paul in persecuting the Christians was commendable for the zeal he showed, and so are all men to be praised, who zealously pursue what they think is right, whether it really is so or not. More than this, a man is to be dispised, who, believing himself in the right, will not maintain it. Now, let us consider that we are unable to determine a man's motives by his acts, hence we are compelled to regard every one as honest in his profession of faith, till, by his conduct, we are able to determine otherwise. If we do this, we will be compelled to regard with admiration every honest opposer; and the greater his zeal the more we should admire. What then is to be condemned in controversy? Not zeal, not earnestness, energy, or activity; but—want of charity. This is evidently the reason for the injunction to "speak the truth in love." Men are ignorant, and have a zeal for God which is not according to knowledge. Let us then contend earnestly for the truth, but do it in love. "Be patient toward all men, apt to teach."

A Protest.

I herewith enter my solemn protest against the idea, that because the Bible records the faults of its heroes that, therefore, it endorses them. Some things done by Old Testament worthies, cannot be justified by the New Testament standard of morals, polygamy, concubinage, the idolatry of Rachel, the adultery of Rahab, Sampson and Judah, the conduct of Lot and David, are recorded in the Bible without being endorsed. From Genesis to Revelations, the Bible condemns fornication, adultery, incest and idolatry. Custom, ignorance and hospitality, may be urged in palliation, but never in justification of these sins. No man has ever done these things, or endorsed them in others without either committing sin of being accessory to their commission in others. I enter my protest against any argument or inference, that, because Lot was hospitable, that therefore, it was a virtue or right for him to offer his innocent daughters to be defiled by foul libertines. Or, that a realization of the great loss he had sustained would justify him in getting drunk a second time, and committing that awful crime of incest. To attempt a justification of the guilty daughters is still less excusable. I have no fellowship with any book, paper, or man, who justifies such conduct. We cannot close our eyes to the fact that God permitted things in the old dispensation, which he will not permit under the clearer light of the new. J. M. S.

1 Corinthians XV. 29.

BAPTISM AND THE RESURRECTION.

Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead if the dead rise not at all? Why are they then baptized for the dead?

Mr. D. P. Kauffman writes: "I am a reader of the RESTITUTION, and a believer of the great truths it advocates, although I have not yet been buried with Christ in baptism. I am yet praying at the gates of light, trying to force them open that I may know my duty, and perform it understandingly.

"1. Will you please give an explanation of the above Scripture, 1 Cor. xv. 29?

"2. Is the proposition "for" correctly rendered? In the German it is over (uefer) the dead.

"3. What is the relation of baptism to the resurrection?"

To answer one of the above questions is to answer all of them, and to give an explanation of the Scripture cited.

The Greek preposition in the text is huper—huper—and by Greenfield is said to mean, upon, above, over, concerning, respecting, in respect to, in relation to, for, in behalf of, on the side of, in the place of, instead of, etc.

For the correct word or adjunct to insert in the text, we must, out of the thirteen above given, select according to the sense and influence of the text, the context and the general scope of Scripture. And perhaps the immediate text, after the traditional ideas have been forced upon the minds of the world from youth to manhood by the Catholic teaching that "the living saint is to be baptized for the benefit of the dead friend or relative who had neglected the ordinance," is easier to explain in that way than any other. But that such is not a correct exposition of the text, I offer the following reasons:

1. God has never, by any lawgiver, prophet or apostle, authorized worship by proxy.

2. God promised anciently mercy to those, and only those who loved him and kept his commandments. Ex. xx. 6.

3. Jesus bases an admission into the kingdom upon obedience and that obedience by the party who enters. Matt. vii. 21–25.

4. Peter bases an admission into the kingdom upon a culture of the Christian graces by every one who enters. 2 Peter i. 5–11.

5. The act of the father cannot affect the character and standing of the son, nor the act of the son affect that of the father. But the soul that sins is to die. Ezr. xviii.

6. In the commission as recorded by Mark, xvi: 15–16. Baptism is required of every party who believes.

7. Peter, upon the day of Pentecost, replies to the enquiring multitude, "Repent and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins. Here the act is distributed to every party. It is just as reasonable that one should repent for another as to be baptized for another.

8. We all must appear before the judgment seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in his body according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad." 2 Cor. v. 10. Here judgment is based upon the action of the party himself, and not upon an act done for him by another.

A second position in explanation of this Scripture is, that it is a baptism upon the part of a proper candidate in behalf of, or for, Jesus who was crucified. But this hardly fills the language of the text. Notwithstanding Jesus had been crucified, yet at the time Paul addressed the Corinthians, Jesus had revived, and was living at the right hand of God. Again, baptism upon the part of the candidate is not in behalf of Jesus in any sense, nor can it be said to be for Jesus, or for the benefit of Jesus, only indirectly, just as faith or repentance upon the part of a prospective heir of God, and joint heir of Christ can be said to be for Jesus. These acts when performed are directly for the benefit of the candidate; but as the candidate when prepared, perfected and glorified, enters directly into the work appointed by the Savior, it may indirectly be said that the preparatory acts are for him. But we think that this indirect work for Jesus is too remote to fill the demands of the text, and therefore for a better explanation we look further.

Every descendant of Adam on account of his relationship to him, is, as Adam was, placed beyond access to the tree of life, with the principles of ... naturally implanted in his constitution left to work out their result—death. Thus all rest under the penalty of the Adamic law—condemned to death—and are said by the figure of speech—prolepsis—to be dead. That death is thus used in a prospective sense in Bible language, see Ex. xii: 33; x: 28; 1 Kings ii: 36.

It is then for the candidate himself, who rests under the Adamic penalty—death, and is by prolepsis dead, that he is to be baptized.

Now Paul's argument in the text is in line with his conclusions stated in verses 12 to 22, drawn upon the supposition that the dead do not rise. If the dead (candidate for baptism) is not to have a resurrection from the dead, why is he then baptized? As much as to say, that there would be no necessity for the baptism if he was not to have a resurrection. Thus we see that the two acts stand related to each other; the last made dependent upon the former, as he argues in his letter to the Roman brethren, telling them that if they have been planted together in the likeness of his (Christ) death they shall also be planted together) in the likeness of his resurrection. Rom. vi. 5.

Now this would seem to be making this act of baptism of vast importance; but we understand that this act in and of itself, without the necessary antecedents—faith and repentance—is of no benefit whatever, and thus administered to him is of no value. But when administered to one whose heart is properly prepared by faith and repentance, it introduces the candidate into the death of Christ, Rom. vi: 3–4. And thus being introduced into the death of Christ he is brought in contact with his blood, (for it was in Christ's death that his blood was shed) and therefore obtains remission of sin, and is quickened emblematically to new life, Col. ii: 13, "all trespasses having been forgiven him."

It is by faith, and faith working by love that the affection to the old state of sin is destroyed and the heart in its desires is purified, it is by repentance, bearing forth its fruits that the old state—man—of sin is destroyed in action. Thus we have an emblematical death to the old or Adamic state, but not an actual, till death in its primary sense comes upon the man.

In baptism we have an emblematical burial and putting off of the old man of sin, or Adamic nature, but not an actual till we come to the tomb itself. We have in the act an emblematical quickening together with Christ to a new life, but not an actual until the trumpet sounds and the dead are awakened. Ezek. xxxvii: 9, 10; 1 Thess. iv: 13–18.

We have also in the act an emblematical resurrection to walk in a new life; but it is a walk by faith.—not by sight. 2 Cor. v: 7. It is a death and a life by faith, not actual yet. Rom. vi: 8, 11. The heirship also is not actual, but prospective, and made contingent. Rom. viii: 17; Luke xx: 36. Thus we have the one cluster of acts emblematically representing the other, and the last cluster, so far as scripture brings the matter to view, made dependent upon the first.

Now no one alone, nor all of the first cluster of acts combined, depositv, or begets in the man any physical principle that will enable him at the last day to come forth from the valley of death, as the chit in the grain of corn or wheat enables it when subjected to the laws of vegetation to send forth its stalk. There is no physical connection whatever, so far as the human mind with the present development of science, can reach, existing between the first and second cluster of acts. Human nature and science do not reveal the possibility of a resurrection. The chasm must be bridged by faith. The relation then existing between the two clusters of events of which we have been writing is not a physical relation, but a legal one; the first cluster of acts standing as a great naturalization law, or law of adoption into the family of God, and therefore made heirs of Abraham and of the promise. Just as the naturalization laws of the United States, when complied with by a foreigner, brings him into a legal relationship to the government whereby he can claim recognition and protection of the government, so do these acts—faith, repentance and baptism—bring one into that legal relationship to God where he promises to recognize them and to bring them up in the great day of reward.

Expository Notes.

"We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body and present with the Lord." 2 Cor. v. 8.

I always turn to "The Berean Casket" with pleasure, and I am invariably edified by its contents. This month's casket contains some specially good things, and in common with many of your readers, I perused with interest your able remarks on the text at the head of this letter. I have, very recently been led to see the fallacy of the dogma of of man's inherent immortality, and I rejoice in the comforting assurance conveyed in the words of our Savior to Martha, as recorded in John xi. 25–26: "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth on me though he were dead yet shall he live: and who-never liveth and believeth in me shall never die;" i. e., shall not die forever.

I quite agree with you that "absolute certainty as to what was in the minds of the sacred writers in every sentence they wrote cannot be reached;" and that for the reasons assigned by you (375 ante). I have heard 2 Cor. v. 8 quoted again and again, to prove that the soul of the believer quits the body at death an., is immediately present with the Lord in its disembodied state: and although I have been, for some months, convinced that the soul is in its own nature mortal, this text has puzzled me exceedingly.

You rightly say that "whatever these words really mean, that meaning must be in harmony with the general teaching of Scripture;" and I would venture to suggest that the meaning of the apostle Paul may be most satisfactorily ascertained by reference to others of his epistles, and to other portions of this—his first to the Corinthians.

Eph. i. 22–23 reads: "And hath put all things under his feet, and gave him to be the head over all things to the Church, which is his body, the fullness of him that filleth all in all."

1 Cor. x. 17: "For we being many are one bread and one body."

Rom. xii. 5: "So we being many, are one body in Christ, and everyone members one of another.

1 Cor. xii. 27–28: "Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular. And God has set some in the Church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healings, helps governments, diversities of tongues."

Eph. iv. 11–12: "And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ."

Eph. v. 23: "For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the Church: and he is the Savior of the body."

Col. i. 18 and 24: "And he is the head of the body, the Church: who is the beginning, the first born from the dead; that in all things he might have the pre-eminence. Who now rejoice in my sufferings for you, and fill up that which was behind of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for his body's sake, which is the Church."

From these texts and many others which I forbear to quote, because I am desirous not to trespass on your valuable space, it is clear, I think, that, by "the body," the Apostle Paul means "the Church," and we find the same apostle referring to his absence from the Church to whom he was writing, and of his being sometime present with them.

2 Cor. x. 1 and 11: "Now I Paul myself beseech you, by the meekness and gentleness of Christ, who in presence am base among you, but being absent am bold toward you: let such an one think this, that such as we are in word by letters when we are absent, such will we also be in deed when we are present."

2 Cor. xiii. 2 and 10: "I told you before, and foretell you, as if I were present, the second time; and being absent now, I write to them which heretofore have sinned, and to all other, that, if I come again, I will not spare: therefore I write these things, being absent, lest being present, I should use sharpness, according to the power which the Lord hath given me to edification and not to destruction."

Phil. i. 27: "Only let your conversation be as it becometh the gospel to Christ; that whether I come and see you, or else be absent, I may hear of your affairs, that ye stand fast in one spirit, with one mind striving together for the faith of the Gospel."

Gal. iv. 18–20: "But it is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing, and not only when I am present with you. I desire to be present with you now, and to change my voice, for I stand in doubt of you."

From these texts it appears to me that when the apostle wrote of being absent from the body he had no thought of the separate existence of his soul after the death of his body, but refered to his bodily absence from the Church; and this view is entirely in harmony with Phil. i. 23–26: "For I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart, and be with Christ, which is far better. Nevertheless to abide in the flesh is more needful for you. And having this confidence, I know that I shall abide and continue with all your furtherance and joy of faith; that your rejoicing may be more abundant in Jesus Christ for me, by my coming to you again."

1 Cor. xv. 16, 17, 18, 32: "If the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised, your faith is vain, ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished. If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not? Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." Modern theologians would not use this language. If what is almost universally taught us from the pulpit be scriptural and true, we should have expected the apostle to say, We shall indeed be benefited in some way by the resurrection, seeing that then our bodies will be re-united to our souls; but should there be no resurrection, our frail bodies only will perish, our disembodied souls, being immortal in their own nature, can never die; we will therefore hope that, whether there be a resurrection or not, we may spend a blissful eternity in heaven.

What disparagement is this of the glorious doctrine of the resurrection as taught by our Savior and his apostles! How different from the language of the apostle Paul!

The verse immediately following the text at the head of this letter is also confirmatory of this view; the two verses taken together are very forcible and full of meaning: "We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and be present with the Lord. Wherefore we labor, that, whether present or absent, we may be accepted of him." 2 Cor. v. 8–9.

The Christ In Reason.

When the Greek artist undertook to represent on canvass the tragic scene of the sacrifice of Iphegenia, he employed every secret of his talent in heightening the expression of grief upon the faces of the assistants; but when he came to that of Agamemnon, he drew a vail over it, for he felt that the depth of a father's despair under such circumstances was beyond the reach of the pencil.

There is one other character, gentlemen, in Scripture, which should be presented to you now as a summary of all that I have said, but I dare not make the attempt. What language can delineate, or pretend to give an idea of perfection? What early maturity! While yet a child, he astonishes the wisest by his learning. What docility to his parents! What affection for his friends! What indulgence to the fallen! What sympathy with female weakness and infant innocence! What faultless purity of life! With all this gentleness, what unshrinking severity for vice! With all this innocence, what unerring sagacity! In this lowly condition, what power of thought, what elevation of sentiment, what elevation of sentiment, what grace and what charm of language! "Never man spake as he spake." In his doctrine, what before unheard of, unthought of wisdom—the wisdom not of books, but of the heart! "I give unto you a new commandment, that ye love one another." In conduct, what unaffected self-sacrifice! "Father forgive them; they know not what they do." Whence, then, comes this moral phenomenon, still more strange, and, on ordinary principles, more inexplicable than the one just alluded to? If the history be true, how happens it that the most unpropitious circumstances have brought out this grand result? If false, how is it that a few illiterate persons have invented a character, which to invent would be, in one form to realize? Answer, once more, infidelity! Answer, once more, skepticism! Infidelity, skepticism, have answered. The force of truth long since tore from the lips of one of their ablest champions the reluctant confession. Hear it in the words of Rousseau:

"Socrates lived and died like a philosopher; Jesus Christ lived and died like a God!"

Correspondence.

BROTHER REED:—Brother Miller and myself are still battling for the truth, and I think we are gaining ground. The M. E.'s have just closed a two week's meeting here, which was unsuccessful in the extreme, not getting a single convert. The preacher taught that sanctification was prerequisite to gaining heaven. And the sanctified (?) ones believed it all! Begone, with such doctrine. This is my idea of sanctification: I think the apostles were baptized with the Holy Ghost, and sanctified or set apart for a special work. They were authorized by Christ himself to go into all the world and preach the gospel, and baptize all who believed. And in order for them to accomplish the most good, they were invested with power to talk with tongues, cast out evil spirits, cure all manner of diseases, and if necessary, to raise the dead.

It was essential that the apostles should have that power, and by receiving it, they were enabled to place things more forcibly before the people. It was for them to establish the fact that Christ was not an impostor, and that he died, came to life again, was with his apostles forty days, and then ascended to his Father. They established the fact. Consequently we have no need of such power; hence it is not essential.

But when the blessed Jesus comes to claim the kingdom as his own, then he will raise up, immortalize us, and sanctify us, or set us apart to execute his laws and judgments. Then we shall be instruments in his hands, in breaking to pieces all other kingdoms, and establishing our great, glorious, and universal kingdom. Then we shall see the king in his beauty, and we shall be like him.

I requested the preacher to oblige me by preaching from this text: "The righteous shall receive their recompense of reward on the earth, much more the wicked and the sinner." He, as a matter of course, wished to be excused. I think there is a good opening for good to be done in the name of Jesus, at this place, if we had a suitable worker.

SOMERSET, Ind.

DEAR BRETHREN:—The tabernacle was set up in the wilderness of Lano, Lano county, Texas, in 1850, by persons mostly of Kane county, Illinois, and the truth has since radiated to the surrounding counties of San Saba, Burnett, Blanco, and Kerr, and there are many scattered here and there, in Travis, Bastrop, Fayette, Caldwell, Bexar, Bandera, Williamson, and Lampasas counties. Most of these counties have Austin for their terminal point, which place may be reached by rail from all parts of the United States, with mail track lines to most of the other counties.

From over fourteen years residence in Texas, I think the state offers a good field for sowing the seed of the kingdom, as there are many good and honest hearts there. Let no one be afraid of the bad character of the people, as represented by political newspapers. I think the good, in that state, are as good as can be found in any state; but the bad are as evil as the worst, any where. But if a preacher, in that country, will live up to his profession of religion, morally, and confine himself within the sphere of his vocation, the evil men will not only not molest him, but, such is southern chivalry, many of them would be disposed to protect him.

J. W. Oatman (whose letter appeared in a late number of the RESTITUTION), reports good success at Flatonia, Fayette county,—five immersed and prospects still good. Also a great lack of preachers or lecturers in Texas. The cry there seems to be: "Come over into Macedonia and help us." Clement Oatman is old, very infirm, and cannot preach much, if any longer. Except him, there is no other preacher in Southwest Texas, but L. W. Oatman, who is very young, and just commencing. If Brother William Orea, or some other forcible, or logical speaker, or speakers will go into that country, I think they might do much good, and be sustained as well, if not better, than elsewhere.

It seems to me that the time is short in which "to turn many to righteousness;" that the harvest is great, the laborers few, and hurry is necessary. I believe that the fig tree putteth forth leaves; nay, that "the sign of the Son of Man" doth now appear in the political heavens; and the true believer ought to hear the admonition, "Behold I come as a thief in the night," and ought ever to pray, "Come Lord Jesus."

Let us keep our garments white and clean, and have oil in our lamps, that we may be counted worthy to stand before the great King, at the marriage supper.

It would be a strange sight to see the Mormons, moving from America to settle in Palestine, yet Dr. Manning, the general manager of the London Tract Society, writes from Utah that "the project is a serious one and is not unlikely to be consummated. One of the last acts of the late Geo. A. Smith, First Vice President of the Mormon church and state, was to visit Palestine, in company with the Mormon Superintendent of emigration. They were reported to be well received by the Turkish Viceroy, who doubtless has no special prejudices on the polygamy question. It remains to be seen whether such a project can be carried out, even if it is undertaken."

Land of Promise.

We are waiting, sighing, mourning,
For the blessed resurrection morning,
When the earth shall be restored,
And the saints all safely moored
In the land of promise.

When the field shall bloom afresh,
And the saints shall be at rest,
We'll sing his praise on harps of gold,
When all are gathered home once for all
In the land of promise.

In the land the Lord has trod,
In the city of our God,
Where the tree of life shall grow,
Where the river of life shall flow,
In the land of promise.

The nations with their kings—
Shall their glory and honor bring,
And lay their offerings at his feet,
When the saints of ages meet
In the land of promise.

Eden then will be restored,
And God Himself alone adored:
The curse of sin will never blast—
The earth, the same—as home at last,
In the promised land.

Great Britain appears to be girding up her loins to be ready for any emergency which may arise out of the Eastern question. The Mediterranean squadron has been strengthened, and the vessels stationed at Malta have been ordered to cruise in the Adriatic. Diplomacy of late years, especially since the seizure of Danish territory by Prussia, has been so uncertain that the British are apparently unwilling to be caught napping on the present ominous occasion.

The fact has been long and well known that the Congregational churches in New Hampshire, Vermont, and Maine are dying out. In a large number of towns where Congregationalism once existed in great power, the old houses are closed and deserted, or worship is maintained by different denominations, often including Universalists and Spiritualists. Some of the churches in Maine are, for the first time in fifty years asking aid, and it is feared missionary work in the west will be contracted, and the funds spent at home.—Examiner and Chronicle.

It is said that in the midst of the changes wrought by the hard, stern pressure of the present times the Golden Age, the paper started by Theodore Tilton when he left the Independent, has disappeared from view. It was sold by Tilton some years ago, and has made no mark since. The five thousand dollars which Mr. Beecher advanced to Mr. Tilton, in the days when he was keeping that gentleman afloat, has gone into the gulf, and has also helped in the dissemination of some very pithless and unattractive heresies. "Free Religion" finds it a desperately hard task to keep an "organ in existence."—Presbyterian.

The first regular and complete census of India which has ever been taken was in 1871. British India, including the feudatory states, was found to have an area of 1,450,744 square miles, or about one-third the area of the United States, and its population was 238,830,958, or about six times as large as that of the United States. There are in India vast tracts of forest and waste land, so that the vast density of population in the inhabited districts is greater even than would be indicated by the above figures. In Bengal the average is 397 persons to the square mile; for the northwest provinces, 430, and for Oude 468. The population per square mile in Great Britain and Ireland, taken together, is only 295. Therefore, it may be readily imagined how crowded India is.

The deepest sea soundings yet effected were obtained by the Challenger this year in the abysses of New Guinea, depths which leave occasioned a sharp line of demarcation between the fauna of Asia and Australia. The "lead" weighed 4 cwt., and struck bottom at the tremendous depth of 4,429 fathoms, or about 26,700 feet. The bottom net, by which specimens of the bottom are brought up, was full of mud, and both the thermometers that had been sent down were smashed to atoms by the enormous pressure of the superincumbent water. A previous unsuccessful attempt to reach the bottom, out in which 4,345 fathoms were sounded, showed the temperature at that depth to be 35½ degs. Fahr. uncorrected.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey have made an excellent beginning in Philadelphia. At the opening service, Sunday morning, Nov. 21st, the great building prepared for the meetings—formerly used as a freight depot, and now seating 10,000 persons—was filled, in spite of a chilly rain. The great audience sang, "All hail the power of Jesus' name," and Mr. Moody read the fourth chapter of John, finding that his voice could fill the great hall without difficulty. His sermon was upon "the fields white already to harvest." At the afternoon meeting it was estimated that 15,000 people sought admission in vain. In Brooklyn, special services are continued since the departure of the two evangelists, including the "young men's meetings" which have been markedly successful and which will now be under the charge of George S. Hall, of the Y. M. C. A. in Washington. The Sunday afternoon meeting at the Rink showed very little diminution in numbers. The general comment upon the work in Brooklyn seems to be that its effect has been most conspicuous among church members, in heightening their fervor, and uniting members of the various denominations and churches in a wonderful harmony and enthusiasm. Mr. Moody, it is said, altogether declined to attempt any numerical estimate of the conversions—another instance of his admirable sense. Notwithstanding the great publicity given to his work, nothing is more noticeable than his avoidance of sensationalism of every kind. There is, on his part, no boasting of results, no artificial excitement of any sort, but a genuine and earnest concentration upon real work. —N. Y. Witness.

Russia and the Turkish Revolt.

Advices from the Turkish provinces are not so indicative of a speedy adjustment favorable to the Turks as they were a week or so ago. At that time the best authorities seemed to unite in regarding the Herzegovinian affair at an end, whatever might be the result in Servia, but the dispatches lately changed their character, and it now looks as if the insurgents would be able to hold out for an indefinite period. It is also said, moreover, that voluntary subscriptions in aid of the insurgents have suddenly increased, especially in Russia, so that quite a large amount has been placed at the disposal of the Russian consuls for the aid of refugees and kindred purposes. This may account for a late dispatch stating that the Herzegovinians have received a thousand breech-loaders from Montenegro, and have convoked an assembly for the purpose of organizing a national government. This does not look like the Turks were to have their own way, and the telegraph confirms this version by announcing that Austria has been invited by the northern powers to name the guarantees which, as the most interested of the great nations, she thinks should be required of the porte. It is believed that Turkey will be unable to suppress the insurrection, and that by a general consent Austria will be authorized to interfere within a few months. —Christian Union, Nov. 10.

It is at least an odd coincidence that the Russian sympathy with the revolt in Northern Turkey should have received an impetus almost simultaneously with the following imperial order, issued at St. Petersburgh, Nov. 8th:

"The territory on the right bank of the Syr-Darin, from the Russian frontier to the river Nareen, hitherto belonging to Khokand, is annexed to Russia."

Of course this will arouse more or less panic in England, for although the territory in question is of no special importance, its formal annexation is a step toward the favorite Muscovite plan of rectifying the southern frontier, and threatens indirectly the jealously guarded British possessions in Northern India. At the same time a religious war is on the point of breaking out at Perak, on the Malayan peninsula. The British presidency has been attacked, and there is every prospect that force will be required to reduce the natives to submission. If this should happen to grow into a religious war, the Prince of Wales and his friends may have a chance to distinguish themselves.—Christian Union, Nov. 17.

Another Great Tunnel.

This decade seems to be an era of great feats in engineering, in which Europe and America strive in emulation. Now we are informed that a submarine tunnel is proposed to connect Europe and Africa under the Strait of Gibraltar. The excavations are to begin three miles from the sea on each shore, in order to provide convenient approaches. This is necessary, because the cliffs on either side are over 3000 feet high, while the channel itself is 1000 feet deep. The tunnel, it is thought, will have to be bored at least 1000 feet under the bed of the sea. The route proposed is from Tarifa and Algesiras, in Spain, to Tangier, on the Morocco coast. While the actual length under water is but nine miles—not half that of the proposed English channel tunnel—yet it is said the cost of this work will be much greater, on account of the difficulties in constructing the approaches. This may be a mere suggestion on the part of some great contractor who wants a job, as such a tunnel seems scarcely needed for the trade at present between Spain and Morocco. Africa, however, is comparatively a new field for enterprise and development, and possesses grand possibilities, whose maturity might be hastened by such a tunnel.

The Coming One.

The fact that Christ will literally return from heaven to earth, is evident from many passages of Scripture. Both the Old and New Testaments abound with promises of his second coming.

It will be my object in this short article to examine the testimony relative to the second advent of our Lord, showing that his appearing will be real, literal and visible; and not that he comes at the death of a righteous man—termed, by some, a spiritual coming.

I will first introduce the angel's testimony, Acts 1: 11: "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus who is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Here we have a plain and positive declaration that the same Jesus should come as he was seen to go away.

About forty days after his resurrection, while being assembled, for the last time till he shall return again, with his disciples, he was taken up; and a cloud received him out of their sight.

Daniel beheld in a vision, "One like the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven;" and John, "behold he cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see him, and they also who pierced him; and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him." Dan. vii. 13; Rev. i. 7.

These testimonies are all to the point, viz: that the same Jesus is to come back again; that he is to come as he went away, "in the clouds of heaven," and his coming will be a real, literal and personal appearance, so that "every eye shall see him."

If he comes spiritually, at the death of a good man, how could every eye see him? and would that be coming as he went away?

The prophets foretold Christ's second coming; his teachings tell of his coming again; and after he left the earth, the apostles wrote of his coming again.

I will leave what the prophets say for a future article, and come at once to the New Testament. Christ says: "Watch, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come;" and "be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh." Mat. xxiv. 42. He told his disciples that it was needful for him to go away, but he would come again; to be ready; to watch; keep sober, and not to say that my Lord delayeth his coming.

And so Paul wrote, "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven," and to the troubled ones, "to rest with us when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven;" and to the Hebrews, "unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation." Also James would exhort his brethren to be patient "for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh."

Hence, we can see that the coming of Christ is a reality; that all those having crowns laid up will, like Paul expected, receive them then; that not one will be rewarded till Jesus does come; and that at his coming he gives his followers eternal life.

May we not, then exclaim, as John did, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

Pulpit Joking.

There is a time to weep a time to laugh, and a time for wit. Just how much wit is admissible in the pulpit, is difficult to decide. Temperaments differ, and with some the most serious address will sinctillate with quaintness, action is a bait upon the sharp hook Pat is flung out to catch souls. It is not well for those who lack wit to censure those who overdose with it. Neither is it well for the latter to allow it to become lawless and unbecoming. No ex cathedra can be taken but the counsel of Dr. John Hall, in his Yale lectures:

"A certain gravity is expected," he said, "through a right human instinct in ministers. Not that the particular attitude of the facial muscles is of any spiritual significance, one way or the other, but men feel that when handling grave and most serious matters we ought to be serious. Did ever we see the pilot take a slip through a perilous passage? He is grave. Have we seen the surgeon's knife drawn across the limb where an error of an inch would have been a terrible mistake. He was grave. I have heard a conscientious judge weigh and set out in the utmost fullness the evidence in a murder case, as earnestly bent on putting everything fairly as if his own life depended on the issue. Any levity here would be out of place; and on the same principle, by the average of mankind, gravity will be looked for in us who deal with matters of life and death, and speak for God."

A Child's Paper at Last!

I have decided to issue a paper for our children. The subscription price will be 50 cents per year, in advance. Postage has been demanded and received by the publisher for some of the issues of the sole but full threads, and of course the publication will be discontinued.

No. 1 proposes to issue a paper for the first of monthly, beginning with the next year, Jan. 1st. Seventy-five copies will be printed, and if by the publication which will not feel the loss like the publications referred to proceed to make it a success.

The first number will be issued early in December and those will be sent to every subscriber for the first issue. This will give all a chance to see the paper before subscribing.

Each subscriber in advance for shall try to issue a paper well worth the money asked for. If and every on the receipt of the paper he is.

But to succeed I must have a list of two thousand subscribers. This number can be obtained if all of our interested in the matter, we advocate taking hold at once and push it. A day or two spent by our young friends in canvassing for it after the first issue will, will more than repay the desired number of names.

It will be published at the Disciples office, Plymouth, Ind., under the management of the Christian Publishing Association; but all communications for the paper, and all subscriptions must be sent to the undersigned, Fort Atkinson, Jefferson Co. Wis.

The price of the paper will be about 12 16 inches, folio, of 4 pages, size of Apollo-Gazette and pages of music in the usual manner. I can afford it for 50 cents per year, and hope the paper will enable me to be enlarged at the price before the second year.

For the present, however, it will be sent at the following rates:

5 minute copy, 60 cents a year; and at the same rate for any no ber of copies under ten.

Ten copies, and any larger number under forty, one to one address, 50 cents.

To Canada subscribers at the same rate.

Contributions for its columns are solicited from all of our friends old and young. Bible questions, puzzles, enigmas, odds and ends, anecdotes, etc., all will be welcome. I intend to try to make it a spicy, entertaining, instructive and welcome visitor to our young folks every where.

The New Life.

Buried with Christ, and raised with him too,
What is there left for me to do?
Simply to cease from struggling and strife,
Simply to walk in newness of life.

Risen with Christ, my glorious Head,
Holiness now is the pathway I tread;
Beautiful thought, as I walk therein,
He that is dead is freed from sin.

Living with Christ who dieth no more,
Following Christ who goeth before,
I am from bondage utterly freed,
Reckoning self to be dead indeed.

Living for Christ, my members I yield,
Servants of righteousness evermore sealed,
Not under law, I'm now under grace;
Sin is dethroned, and Christ takes its place.

Growing in Christ; no more shall be named
Sinful things whereof I am ashamed,
Fruit unto holiness, now will I bear,
Life everlasting, the end shall I share.

Questions Concerning Church Organization.

"Neither pray I for these alone; but for them also which shall believe on me through their word; that they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee; that they also may be one in us: that the world may believe that thou hast sent me. And the glory which thou gavest me, I have given them; that they may be one even as we are one."

Is this prayer for all who believe in Christ through the apostle's words? Is it that they may all be one as Christ and the Father are one? Is it that they all may be one, that the world may believe? Has the glory of being one, even as Christ and the Father are one, been given to those who believe the Gospel?

Will they all be one, because Christ prayed that they might be one? Or, will they be one through their faith in the Gospel? Do all who believe the Gospel, believe it so that there is "nothing lacking in their faith?" Then, are they one as Christ and the Father are one? Are all Christians one in this sense? Ought they to be one? Is it the duty of all Christians to be what Christ prayed they might be? Can they be one farther than they believe the Gospel? Did Christ pray that they might be one in any other way, than through their faith in the Gospel? Can they be one without using the means necessary to bring them together? Can many become one without being joined together? Can many members work in one body without some sort of organization? Will not the degree of their efficiency, depend upon the degree of the completeness of their organization?

Then, as the oneness of Christians should be the closest and most intimate known among men; and as its object is the most important, even the salvation of men. Is it not their duty to join themselves together in the most efficient way possible, in order that the world may believe and be saved?

"Unto the Church of God which is at Corinth, to them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus, called to be saints, with all that in every place call upon his name,—I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment."

Is not this exhortation of the apostle, in perfect harmony with the prayer of Christ? Does he not address all the saints in every place? Does he not urge them by the authority of our Lord Jesus Christ, that they all speak the same thing, in relation to some subject? And does he not urge them to be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment, in reference to the same subject? Does the apostle ever manifest more earnestness than he does in this exhortation? Can such a union as this be attained without a very complete organization? For what object are all the saints in every place to be thus completely joined together?

"Only let your conversation be as becometh the Gospel of Christ; that ye stand fast in one spirit, with one mind, striving together for the faith of the Gospel."

Is not "the Gospel of Christ,"—"the faith of the Gospel," the object for which they are to be joined together, and for which they are to strive together? Are they not to strive together in all the work necessary to be done to promote the Gospel? Can such a union be secured without an organization with especial reference to this work,—the striving together for the faith of the Gospel?

WERE THE CHURCHES THUS ORGANIZED?

"Ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." Of which building Christ was "the chief corner stone." 1 Pet. ii. 5, 6. "In whom all the building fitly framed together groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord. In whom ye also are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit." Eph. ii. 21, 22. "As we have many members in one body, and all the members have not the same office; so we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another." Rom. xii. 4, 5. Is not the church compared to a house built up of stones? With this difference, the stones of which their house is built are live'y stones? In a stone house, do not the stones mutually support each other? Without this mutual support of the stones, could there be a house built up of stones? Are not the saints represented as being fitly framed together, as being builded together so as to be a temple for the Lord to dwell in? Are they not compared with the members of the human body? as many members in one body? as members one of another?

Then, if the saints are fitly compared to stones built into a stone house, and to timbers fitly framed together in a wooden building, and to the members of a human body, which are so closely connected with the body and with each other, "that if one member suffer, all the members suffer with it, or, if one member be honored, all the members rejoice with it." I say if these comparisons are good, and represent what the church should be, were not the churches the most completely organized bodies known among men? Is it possible to attain to such a perfect union without a most thorough organization, and a faithful administration of wholesome discipline by those who bear the fruits of the spirit?

If the saints in every place are to be perfectly joined together, in the same mind and in the same judgment, and to speak the same thing, concerning the faith of the Gospel, that the world may believe, does it not necessarily involve the most thorough and efficient organization? If the saints have failed to become organized so completely as to reach that perfect union which is enjoined upon them, does this failure become the standard of organization, instead of the requirements of God?

But it may be said, "the Bible does not say that we must organize ourselves into churches, but it does say that we are all baptized into one body." This may be so. But, did not Paul say to Titus, "For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou should'st set in order the things that are wanting, and ordain elders in every city, as I had appointed thee." He does not tell us what things were wanting, or how to ordain elders. Does not this enjoin upon him to do just what we understand by organization? Was not this setting in order the things that are wanting, and the ordaining elders done after they had been baptized? Was the single act of baptism, all that was done to perfect the union of the churches? Does not the setting in order the things that are wanting, include everything that is necessary to perfect the union of the church, and make it efficient in its work?

It may be said further, "that we take the Bible as our only rule of faith and practice, therefore, we cannot do anything that is not distinctly enjoined upon us in the Bible." Then you will never set in order the things that are wanting, for they are no where stated in the Bible. But do we not do many things that are not enjoined upon us in Bible language? Do we not organize conferences, appoint officers, and executive committees not mentioned in the Bible? Do we not pass resolutions, and provide means to carry them out, not recognized in the Bible? Do we not make all our subscriptions for this cause, and attend all our general meetings without any plain direction in the Bible to do so? Do we not hold our prayer meetings, our conference meetings, our preaching meetings, and conduct them without any direct precept to do as we do? Do we not do almost all that we do, religiously, without any explicit direction from the Bible to do so? If, in so many things we act without special direction, why should we refuse to organize ourselves into compact working bodies in the best and most effectual way known among men?

Are we satisfied with the present organization of this cause? Are we satisfied that the churches are as well organized as they ought to be? Are we willing to remain as we are, without any effort at improvement?

The above is submitted to the candid, and earnest consideration of the brethren. JOEL A. SIMONDS.

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich., Nov. 19, 1874.

The Bible a Revelation from God.

That there is a being with life and intelligence who is the great creator and governor of all things, nature abundantly teaches. It cannot be otherwise. All the beauty, harmony, and majesty of nature could not possibly have come together by chance. It everywhere shows the work of intelligence and design; and where there is design, there must be a designer. Every effect is produced by some cause, and "like causes produce like effects." In a clock, or watch, or any other machine, we behold the effects of man's intelligence; effects of his inventive genius; and he now would be thought a fool, indeed, who should think, or say, that these simple things come together by chance, or were not designed and made by intelligent beings. How much more, then, ought we to think him a fool, who should say, that man himself, or any other of the wonderful works in nature, come together without the guiding hand of an intelligent being. Every part of our body is designed and made for some practical purpose, and that which is designed must have had a designer. There must be, therefore, a being greater than man, who has made him; and being his creator, has the absolute right to teach and govern him, and command his respect and obedience to his laws.

That it is possible for the Creator of our minds to communicate with them, no one will dispute; and it is reasonable to suppose, that, having created us beings of intelligence, capable of receiving instruction, understanding, and appreciating any communications which he might make, he would reveal to us his will for our guidance and instructions in those things which pertain to our welfare, and our duties to him as our Creator.

It is more reasonable to suppose that he has made such a revelation, than it is that he has not, and as no one can produce any positive proof that he has not, we are inclined to accept that which is not reasonable.

Nature teaches us that God is a being whose attributes are goodness, justice, faithfulness and love, possessing all power, all knowledge, and who is all wise. Man, as we behold him, is in a degenerate condition; his tendencies are to do those things which are hurtful to himself and to his fellow men, and dangerous to his peace and happiness. This being his condition, he is greatly in need of the interposition of some power, greater and better than himself, to lead him into a higher and better life. God knows this, and he must, as our Creator, have a desire for the work of his hands, and for him to allow that work to destroy itself without a word of remonstrance, or interposing a helping hand to save, would be contrary to those attributes of character which nature teaches us belong to him. Therefore, we conclude, that God has made, or should make a revelation to us, warning us against that which is evil and encouraging that which is right. Again, the nation, tribe or clan, of whatever grade of intelligence, whether savage, half-civilized, civilized, or enlightened, is yet to be found, who do not have some form of religion, and who do not worship something as a God. This interest, if it may be so called, is as universal as the race, and forms a part of our nature, and phrenologists will point out to you the organ of the brain from which it springs, which they call "spirituality." This instinct was placed in us by our Creator for some purpose; for he is all-wise and has made nothing in vain. It is true, it may be used for other purposes than that for which it was designed, just the same as any other organ of our body or mind can be. Our hands were made for a good purpose, but when we use them to take that which belongs to another, or to take the life of a fellow creature, we are using them for another purpose that for which they were designed. So with this organ of the mind. God has implanted it in our nature for the evident purpose that we might seek after and worship him. Having then designed this organ for this good and useful purpose, is it reasonable to suppose that he would leave us in total ignorance as to how it should be exercised, leaving it to grope about in total darkness, following after every superstitious fancy,—for worship something it must, if not the true God, it will invent gods of its own, and bow down to them. For God to do this, would be unjust and contrary to his attributes of goodness and wisdom, therefore we conclude, that he has made a revelation to us, for the purpose of teaching us that he, and he alone, is the object of worship, and also containing his law as to how we should worship him.

It being, then, probable that God has made a revelation to us, the next step is to find it and render obedience to its dictates. The Bible is the only book which claims with any degree of authority to be this revelation. Its claims then are all we have to investigate. If we find its teachings in accordance with what reason teaches us we ought to expect in a revelation from so great a being, then we must admit its claims and render obedience to its laws with humble submission, for they come from him who is the author of our being, and, consequently, has the right to rule, reward, or perish. If, on the other hand, we find them not in accordance with what nature and reason teach us, a revelation from God should be, then we will have to accept the alternative and conclude that God has left us in darkness and mystery, without a ray of light to guide our wandering footsteps.

To test the claims of the Bible, we must in the first place decide what kind of a revelation we would naturally expect, and then compare with the teachings of the Book. A revelation from such a God as nature teaches him to be, a God of goodness, wisdom, and love, must be in accordance with his character. As one of the reasons why we should expect a revelation from them is on account of man's degenerate nature, requiring such teaching to lead him to a higher and nobler life. We would, of course, expect a revelation in accordance with this idea, teaching men to practice the virtues and reject the vices, and to live pure and upright lives; to be kind to each other, love one another, and to follow after all those things which tend to produce peace and the greatest amount of happiness; to bring the character of man nearer to God's own pure and holy life.

If you, dear reader, are a man of honor, loving justice, goodness and faithfulness, better than life itself, and you have children, is it not your most earnest desire that they should grow up like you, and would you not, at every opportunity, try to stamp as firmly upon their minds the love of those virtues which you prize so highly, by the teachings that you, in your greater experience, and more mature knowledge, are capable of giving? Is God less righteous and loving than we are? All nature forbids the idea. A revelation from God, then, should be such a one as would strive to pursuade us to abandon sin, and live purer and holier lives. Does the Bible accord with this idea? Most emphatically, yes. All its teachings are efforts to induce men to lead lives nearer to the perfection of God's character. It strives to lift men up to a higher platform of morality, and make him better in every respect. This it does by the strongest motives that move men to action, viz.: the desire for reward, and the fear of punishment. It promises him, if he will only obey its teachings, the greatest possible rewards, so great, indeed, that the mind of man unaided by revelation, could never have conceived of them. They are the greatest rewards that man could possibly desire, and, what is more, they are exactly in accordance with our nature, what we most desire, it promises us. Men all desire wealth; it is promised in abundance if he will follow its teachings. Not such wealth as we receive at present, which, at the most, we can enjoy but a little season, and which we are liable to have taken from us at any time; but to use the words of the promise, it is "an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled which fadeth not away," and it is on this earth too: "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." Men all desire to live forever; you and I never want to die. This boon is also promised; to live forever, to enjoy this inheritance. Men all like glory, honor and praise; this is one of the promises of obedience, not such little, petty glory as men do so mightily strive after at this time, but "an eternal weight of glory." Again, we all desire to be happy; it is also promised, and, like the rest, it is not a temporary happiness to be stricken from us without a moments warning; but is eternal. There shall be no more tears, no more sorrow; "God himself shall wipe away all tears from off all faces." No more hunger or thirst; no more partings with loved ones stricken by the hand of death; death itself shall be destroyed. "O, think of these things, and decide if the mind of man could imagine such great rewards; eternal wealth, eternal life, eternal glory and eternal happiness. Can there possibly be greater inducements offered? Does not the very magnitude of the rewards teach that they were made by a being, who not only has the power to make, but to fulfill?

The Bible also accords with the idea that a revelation from God should condemn that which is evil; and those persons who persistently practice those things which are contrary to the peace and happiness of mankind; by its warnings against the wicked, of judgments to come; and, the more to convince men that its words of warnings are true, give examples of past punishments which have come upon them for their disobedience.

Another argument in favor of the inspiration of the Bible is found in its prophecies. We are all desirous of knowing what is to become of us in the great hereafter, and also, what is going to transpire upon this earth in future years; and, therefore, would naturally desire, and expect God, who having made all things, must know what he intends to do with them, to teach us of these things. We find that the Bible is in perfect harmony with this idea. It professes to reveal to man his future destiny, and also the future of the earth. By these glimmers of light we see, first, a dark and terrible picture, a time of "trouble for the nations such as there never was since there was a nation," the time of God's judgments upon wicked men, and the indications of the times seem to teach that these prophecies are true, and beginning to be fulfilled. There never was a time of peace when so many armed men were prepared to destroy each other, as are now massed in the nations of Europe. We might almost say to a certainty, that the prophecy of God is being fulfilled, "Beat your plowshares into swords and your pruning-hooks into spears; prepare war, call up your mighty men." Almost the whole energy of the nations seems to be directed to massing troops, and invention and manufacture of weapons of war; vieing with each other which can raise the largest armies and arm them with the most effective weapons of destruction. And besides this, the defiant and aggressive attitude of that terrible power, the "Church of Rome," all indicate that the predictions of this Book are faithful and true, and are the words of God. But beyond these dark days it shows us a bright and glorious picture. The Prince of Peace (Jesus, the Son of God) seated upon his throne in Mount Zion, the King of all the earth, backed by the almighty power and glory of the Creator of the universe, "teaching strong nations afar off," causing them to "beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks;" when "nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more;" fulfilling the promise of the angels at his birth "peace on earth, good will to man." It shows, also the righteous dead awaking from the sleep of death, clothed in the glorious robes of immortality, no more to die, but live forever to enjoy the glory and happiness which God has promised them. It also shows us the blessing of God upon the nations, which he promised centuries ago, should come through Abraham and his seed; when all mankind will be raised to that higher morality, and manhood, which a revelation from God should, and the Bible does strive to lead men up to.

AUSTIN, Ill.

What is Truth?

This is a very convenient heading for any subject we may choose to discuss. It was propounded by Pilate, a Roman governor over the province of Judea, at the trial of the Son of God! God is the author and the originator of all truth; Jesus the Christ, the Son of the Eternal Father, is the full embodiment of truth, for he was the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person—God the Eternal Father—is a positive. His fiat goes forth; his word is spoken, his purpose is accomplished; does the Son possess the attributes of the Eternal Father, positive, absolute, uncreated, original? If so, what are we to understand by Matt. xxviii. 18. "And Jesus came and spoke to them, saying, all power is given unto me in heaven and and in earth. Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and, lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world, (age, or dispensation,) Amen." It is not our purpose in this article to discuss the Sonship of Jesus the Christ; yet we believe it may be studied very much to profit by us as a people.

It appears very clear that all the power invested in the Son, is delegated by the Father; yet he speaks, or commands with authority; "go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, (or make disciples or Christians; margin), baptizing them in (or into) the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit," etc. Was this water baptism? We answer unhesitatingly, yes; and nothing else. The apostles were baptized in, or with the Holy Ghost, or spirit, that's the prerogative of the Eternal One—never delegated to mortals; they were commanded to tarry in Jerusalem until they were endued with power from on high. "And when he had said this, he breathed on them, and saith unto them, receive ye the Holy Ghost." John xx. 22. The apostles were anointed with the Holy Spirit for a specific work, viz.: to preach the Gospel, heal the sick, raise the dead, and do divers kinds of miracles, for a confirmative of their mission, viz.: to fill up the measure of Christ's sufferings, and write out the ballance of Divine revelation. This they did in the spirit of their Divine Lord, and to the full extent of the authority invested in them; and we repeat, that none but God anoints or baptizes in or with Holy Spirit. The Spirit proceeds and comes forth from the Father, in exact fulfillment of the promise of the Son; for the Father and Son are one in agreement touching this important matter. And those who are writing and teaching that Matt. xxviii. 19 is, or was a spirit baptism, and was fulfilled on Pentecost had be ter look a little more careful at the reading of the word. NEWELL BOND.

Words to Preachers.

Make no apologies. If you have the Lord's message, declare it; if not, hold your peace. Have short prefaces and introductions. Say your best things first, and stop before you get prosy. Do not spoil the appetite for dinner by too much thin soup. Leave self out of the pulpit, and take Jesus in. Defend the Gospel, and let the Lord defend you and your character. If you are lied about, thank the devil for putting you on your guard, and take care that the story shall never come true. Let your beard grow. Throw away your cravat. If you do not want to "break down," make your shirt collar an inch larger, and give your blood a chance to flow back to the heart. Do not get excited too soon. Do not run away from your hearers. Engine driving wheels whirl fast on an icy track, but when they draw anything they go slower. It takes a cold hammer to bend a hot iron. Heat up the people but keep the hammer wet and cool. Do not bawl and scream. Too much water stops mill wheels, and too much noise drowns sense. Empty vessels ring the loudest. Powder isn't shot. Thunder is harmless. Lightning kills. If you have lightning, you can afford to thunder. Do not scold the people. Do not abuse the faithful souls who come to meeting rainy days, because others are too lazy to come. Preach the best to smallest assemblies. Jesus preached to one woman at the well, and she got all Samaria out to hear him the next time. Ventilate your meeting room. Sleeping in church is due to bad air oftener than bad manners. Do not repeat sentences, saying, "as I said before." If you said it before, say something else after. Do not end sentences, passages of Scripture, or quotations, with "and so forth;" Say what you mean and stop.

Leave out words you cannot define. Stop preaching, and talk to folks. Come down from your stilted ways and sacred tones, and become as a little child. Change the subject if it goes hard. Do not tire out yourself and every one else. Do not preach till the middle of your discourse hurtles the beginning, and is buried by the end.

Beware of long prayers, except in your closet. Where weariness begins, devotion ends. Look people in the face. Live so you are not afraid of them.

Take long breaths. Fill your lungs and keep them full. Stop to breathe before the air is exhausted. Then you will not finish each sentence-ah with a terrible gasp-ah, as if you were dying for want of air-ah, as some good people do-ah, and so strain their lungs and never find it out-ah, because they are not told by their friends-ah, but are left to make sport for the Philistines-ah. It is easier to run a saw-mill with a full pond than an empty one. Be moderate at first. Hoist the gate a little way. When you are half through, raise it more. When you are nearly done, put on a full head of water.

Aim at a mark; hit it! stop and see where the shot struck; then fire another broadside. Pack your sermons. Make your words like bullets.

A board hurts a man most when it strikes him edgewise. A pound of feathers is a heavy as a pound of lead, but it will not kill a man as quickly. An ounce bullet will kill quicker than a sack of wool.

Do not condense too many words into a few thoughts. Make your sermon proportionate. If your talk is narrow and shallow, do make it short. If it is deep and strong, the stream may run longer. Do not think every brook is deep because you cannot see the bottom of it, nor call a man a deep diver because he brings up mud. Have a clear head, and your words will be clear. Know what you are talking of, and other will understand you.

Stand for God, if you stand alone. Keep out of the clutches of the party hacks and religious politicians. Preach a straight Gospel, and live up to it. Do not play with edge tools, nor fool with temptations. Look to the stars instead of weather-cocks for guidance. Be earnest, but not wild. Keep open ears and a close mouth. Make few promises. Learn to say No, sweetly. Keep out of debt. Do not feed bones to babies. Speak to the people like your master, as they are able to hear. Do not abuse them for believing what you once believed. Respect honest convictions. Judge no man. Be patient. Be cheerful with the young. Remember that each sermon may be your last, and the last your audience will hear. Keep the judgment in view. Please God, and you will please Christians. Let others praise you. Live for Christ. Preach the Word.—The Christian.

THE RESTITUTION,
Plymouth, Indiana.

Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Communications.—The Editor must not be understood as endorsing all the sentiments expressed by correspondents whose articles are inserted under this head. Each writer is alone responsible for the article bearing his own signature. If the teaching of any writer is not endorsed, an article setting forth the views of the party differing may be forwarded. Free discussion of Bible doctrines on all sides will be allowed, but the Editor reserves the privilege of criticising those communications which antagonize a belief and obedience of the Gospel as a means of salvation, or which undermine its principles.

Fierce Opposition to Christ at his Second Coming.

BY D. FITCAIRN.

"Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing? The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against the Lord, and against his anointed, saying, Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us. He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh: the Lord shall have them in derision. Then shall he speak unto them in his wrath, and vex them in his sore displeasure."—Psa. ii. 1-5.

But now I shall quote passages from some of the prophets whom God raised up subsequently to Isaiah, in order to show what gathering of kings and peoples, meditating hostility—what assembled multitudes, inwardly impelled to outward action against the work of God, and of his Christ, are to be looked for, especially in reference to the restoration and establishment of the Jews in Palestine. And I begin with Zephaniah. He wrote about 630 years before Christ, long after the kingdom of Israel had been subverted, and shortly before the fall of Jerusalem and the captivity of the Jews.

Zephaniah was commissioned to warn his countrymen of the coming judgment of heaven, on account of their continued iniquities and provocations. But whenever there is judgment denounced against the chosen, though erring people of God, we always find some cheering promises of mercy and deliverance. Thus in chap. iii. 8, the Lord himself addresses them in these gracious but awful words, "Therefore, wait ye upon me, saith the Lord, until the day that I rise up to the prey: for my determination is to gather the nations, that I may assemble the kingdoms, to pour out upon them mine indignation, even all my fierce anger: for all the earth shall be devoured with the fire of my jealousy." No doubt the nations and the kingdoms here meant are those who have set themselves in opposition to Jehovah and His Anointed. And the object for which this great confederation is determined by God, is to pour upon them "all his fierce anger," and to teach them what a vanity it is to fight against the king whom Jehovah has set on his holy hill of Zion. So when their enemies are spoiled and defeated, the servants of God—the subjects of God's anointed king, are invited to sing and rejoice: "Sing, O daughter of Zion; shout, O Israel; be glad and rejoice with all thy heart, O daughter of Jerusalem. The Lord hath taken away thy judgments; he hath cast out thine enemy; the king of Israel, even the Lord, is in the midst of thee; thou shalt not see evil any more" (vers. 14, 15). But who can say that this time of final deliverance, or this cause of triumphant rejoicing, has yet arrived? The return from Babylon did not fulfill this prophecy. For 1800 years past, Zion and Jerusalem have lain desolate, and their inhabitants have been in sadness and suffering—strangers to joy and gladness. But when Jehovah shall remember his covenant with Abraham, and arise against his enemies, and restore comfort to his people, "in that day it shall be said to Jerusalem, Fear not thou; and to Zion, Let not thine hands be slack. The Lord thy God in the midst of thee is mighty: he will save; he will rejoice over thee with joy; he will rest in his love; he will joy over thee with singing" (vers. 16-17).

Let us next glance at the prophecies of Joel. He lived about 800 years before Christ, and was raised up to speak in the name of the Lord at a time when the country was devastated by locusts. This was a great calamity; but he predicts much heavier calamities of a different nature, and warmly exhorts to repentance. Part of his prophecy is mentioned by St. Peter as having been fulfilled on the day of Pentecost, when the Holy Ghost was miraculously given to the disciples of Jesus. (Acts ii. 16-18). But of course we must conclude that the remainder of the prophecy was in nowise fulfilled up to that time nor is there any reason to think it has been fulfilled up to this hour; and indeed every portion of this prophecy is so linked with the other portions, that we may be confident, that, at some future period, the whole of it shall receive a plenary fulfillment, of which anything that happened at Pentecost can only be regarded as the droppings which precede a plentiful shower, or as the adumbrations of a glorious reality. How often does it happen that the spirit of prophecy leaps over long intervals of time, and in one sentence connects together the commencing and concluding events of a concluding age or dispensation! Of this we have an example in Joel; for whilst the out pouring of the Spirit, on the day of Pentecost, prepared the apostles and disciples of our Lord, in a supernatural manner, for the great work to which they were appointed, and added many to the number of those who believed in Jesus, the other part of the same prediction remains still to be accomplished. God says by his servant Joel, "And I will show wonders in the heavens, and in the earth, blood, and fire, and pillars of smoke; the sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come." (Joel ii. 30-31). According to the literal language, no such signs and wonders were displayed on that occasion, nor, even with a figurative interpretation, can it be said that the existing powers and authorities of the then world were overturned and annihilated. It is besides added in the prophecy, "And it shall come to pass, that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be delivered. For in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem shall be deliverance, as the Lord hath said, and in the remnant whom the Lord shall call" (ver. 32).

Now it is undeniable that the Jewish people have a principal concernment in this prophecy; and as they had not been brought into the great national tribulation on the day of Pentecost, so it cannot be said that at that time they experienced deliverance in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem. It is true that repentance and forgiveness were preached in the name of Jesus, even to those who with wicked hands had crucified their Messiah. In their fury against him they had cried out, "His blood be upon us, and upon our children." And that prayer was awfully answered forty years afterwards, when the Romans overthrew their temple and destroyed their city. From that day to this the wrath of heaven has come upon that people to the uttermost. But wonderful changes are in store for them, "For behold in those days and at that time," that is, when God pours out his Spirit in a miraculous way, and shows wonders in the heavens and in the earth, "when I shall bring again the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem," saith the Lord, "I will also gather all nations, and will bring them down into the valley of Jehoshaphat, and will plead with them there for my people, and for my heritage Israel, whom they have scattered among the nations, and parted my land." Again, "Proclaim ye this among the Gentiles: prepare war, wake up the mighty men, let all the men of war draw near," etc. (Joel iii. 1, 2, 9.) Here we have a scene similar to that described by Zephaniah,—a great gathering of "all nations." But Joel specifies where this gathering takes place. It is called "the valley of Jehoshaphat;" and afterwards in verse 14, "the valley of decision," or of threshing. "Multitudes, multitudes in the valley of decision; for the day of the Lord is near in the valley of decision. The sun and the moon shall be darkened, and the stars shall withdraw their shining." This is the place where the Lord will bruise and break in pieces the congregated and confederated multitudes of his enemies; even as the crowds of of Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites when they came up against Jehoshaphat king of Judah, as recorded in 2 Chron. xx. It is added, "The Lord also shall roar out of Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem." The Lord shall roar, not out of heaven, but "out of Zion." This is a remarkable prediction because it connects the actual presence of the Lord in Zion, with the time when his enemies are finally overthrown, and when "the Lord will be the hope of his people, and the strength of the children of Israel." Then, when these events synchronize, the strongest assurance is given that in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem shall be deliverance. "So shall ye know that I am the Lord your God, dwelling in Zion, my holy mountain: then shall Jerusalem be holy, and there shall no stranger pass through her any more." (vers. 16-17). And if we are rightly to understand the allusions to Zion in this and many other prophecies which relate to the battles of the Lord, previous to the kingdoms of this world becoming his kingdom forever and ever, it is necessary to keep in mind that, when the second Psalm was composed and chanted, not only was King David, as the typical representative of Messiah, sitting on Zion, but on that holy mount there had also been set up the ark of the testimony, which was the symbol of the gracious presence of the God of Israel.

The careful study of these prophecies of Zephaniah and Joel, at which we have merely glanced, will convince the unprejudiced reader that they refer to many events of the highest importance which have as yet not become historical; and that it is impossible to arrive at any correct Scriptural understanding of the nature of these events, or of the time and place of their development, unless in our interpretations we give to God's ancient people that pre-eminence which is given in them to the prophetic revelation of God's plans. Similar remarks are applicable to other Old Testament prophecies, and especially to chaps. xi. and xiv. of Zechariah, in which many particulars bear strong resemblance to the outline of events revealed in the second Psalm. But on those wonderful displays of the intended future dealings of God with the chosen seed of Abraham, and with the nations of the earth in connection with them, we cannot at present enter.

Questions Concerning the Finances of the Church.

Can the church fulfill its mission without funds? Are all the members of the church equally interested in the objects for which the funds are to be used? Is there any reason why every member of the church should not contribute to its funds equally according to his ability? Is there any more difficulty in doing this, (if there be a willing mind) than there is in paying our taxes according to our ability?

If one member has an income above his expenses of $20 a month, another $40, another $60, another $80, and another $100, is it difficult to see, that if the first member ought to pay $1.00 the next one should pay $2.00, the next $3.00, the next $4.00 and the next $5.00? Could this contribution be guessed off correctly without comparing the several incomes with a uniform rule? Then, is it not necessary to have in the church some rule by which to regulate the contributions of its members? And more, does not equal justice, and equal good will, demand that a rule bearing equally upon all the members of the church should be established? And does not our need of discipline demand that a rule be established that will require us to do unto others as we would have them do unto us in our contributions? Let us then, examine the Scriptures to see if this necessity of the church is provided for there.

"Neither was there any among them that lacked: for as many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them, and brought the prices of the things that were sold, and laid them down at the apostle's feet, and distribution was made to every man according as he had need." Acts iv. 34, 35.

Were the multitude of believers required to do this? Is it probable that they did this thing without previous arrangement and agreement? Did they not contribute equally according to their ability?

"Now, concerning the collection for the saints, as I have given order to the churches of Galatia, even so do ye. Upon the first of the week let every one of you lay by him in store, as God has prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come." 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2. Was it the duty of the church to make this collection? Was it the duty of every member of the church to do this? Were they to contribute as God has prospered them? Did not their prosperity consist in their income and expenses? Could this be ascertained without keeping account either in writing or in memory? Does not this rule require an equal proportion of their prosperity? Was not this contribution to be made statedly? And in order to have a fund on hand ready to be used when occasion should require? From this record may we not learn the principle upon which we should act in our contributions?

"How that in a great trial of affliction; the abundance of their joy and their deep poverty, abounded unto the riches of their liberality. For to their power, I bear record, yea, and beyond their power they were willing of themselves. Praying us with much entreaty that we would receive the gift, and take upon us the fellowship of ministering to the saints. And this they did, not as we hoped, but first gave their own selves to the Lord, and to us by the will of God. Insomuch that we desired Titus, that as he had begun, so he would also finish in you the same grace also. Therefore, as ye abound in faith, and utterance, and knowledge, and in all diligence, and in your love unto us, see that ye abound in this grace also."

Can the saints who have great affliction, have abundance of joy, and from their deep poverty, can they abound in the riches of their liberality? If, under such circumstances, they were willing to do all that belonged to them to do and more, too, who among us ought to complain? If the poor ought to abound in their liberality, how much more the rich? Did they not first give themselves to God, and to each other by the will of God? Did this gift include their property? Or was their property left behind? Although the church at Corinth abounded in everything, in faith, in utterance, in knowledge, in diligence, and in love to the apostles, yet they lacked the grace of liberality, and it was necessary that Titus should instruct and perfect them in this grace also.

"For, if there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not. For I mean not that other men be eased, and ye burdened. But by an equality, that now at this time your abundance may be a supply for their want, and their abundance may be a supply for your want that there may be equality.

Are not believers required in this passage to contribute by equality, so that one be eased and another burdened? Is not this right? Ought not all to be satisfied with this? Can there be any other rule given that ought to satisfy? If more than we have is required, would this be right? If an equal proportion of what we have is required of all, is it wrong? Would any other rule than this be right? If a less proportion of what we have is accepted, while a larger proportion of what others have is required of them, would not this be a just cause of complaint? Would any other rule than the one in the passage under consideration lead us to love our brother as ourselves, or lead us to do unto others as we would have them to do unto us? In what other way is it possible to make our contributions, so that one be not eased and another burdened? Is it not then, indispensible to have a uniform rule by which to compare the contributions of the members of the church if we would be just?

Again, the apostle said, "Ye have well done, that ye did communicate with my affliction. Now ye Philippians know also, that in the beginning of the Gospel, when I departed from Macedonia, no church communicated with me as concerning giving and receiving, but ye only. For even in Thessalonica, ye sent once and again unto my necessities. Not because I desire a gift; but I desire fruit that may abound to your account. But I have all, and abound; I am full, having received from Epaphroditus the things which were sent from you, an odor of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well pleasing to God," and will be fruit that will abound to their account. JOEL A. SIMONDS.

GRAND RAPIDS Nov. 23, 1875.

This Same Jesus.

"And while they looked steadfastly toward heaven as he went up, behold, two men stood by them in white apparel. Which, also said, ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." —Acts i. 10, 11.

Love to the Master is one of the grand characteristics of the disciples of Christ. When they thought that Jesus would be stoned to death in Judea, the time he went there to raise Lazarus, Thomas said, and probably his language expressed the feelings of the rest of the disciples as well as his own, "Let us also go, that we may die with him." And when Peter was questioned relative to the strength of his affection, by the Lord, he exclaimed, "Thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee." Hence, the two men clothed in white apparel—that stood by the disciples while they were watching their ascending Lord, spake as they did. Their words were not numerous, but certainly very suggestive.

"Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Here they are not only informed that their beloved Lord would return again to the world from heaven, but also, that he would return the "same Jesus."

From the language—this same Jesus—we learn that the royal personage who bears the honorable title, King of kings and Lord of lords, and who will return to the earth, accompanied with myriads of angels, in power and great glory, is the same being that in his first advent entered the world in the form of a human babe; that was a friend to publicans and sinners; that took little children in his arms and blessed them; that conversed with the woman of Samaria at Jacob's well; that in the house of Simon permitted Mary to wash his feet with her tears and to wipe them with her hair; that was baptized by John in Jordan; that went about doing good, in instructing the ignorant, in pardoning the guilty, in healing the sick, in raising the dead, and in comforting the distressed. His separation from the world, and his exalted position in heaven, at the right hand of the Father, will have produced no change in the character of Jesus.

When he comes "in flaming fire taking vengeance on those that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ," he will be the same Jesus that wept at the grave of Lazarus, and over the doomed city of Jerusalem, and that welcomed the heavy laden to him and refreshened them with his free and pardoning grace. Ages spent in the heavenly mansions and in the society of angels, by whom he will have been worshiped and adored, will not detract in the least from any of those traits of character which made our Lord, when on earth, the approachable friend and reliable Savior.

This same Jesus, is the Son of Man still, in all his glory and majesty. Joseph is classed among the types of our Lord. The story of his exaltation in Egypt is highly suggestive, and supercedes the necessity of any tales of fiction to paint the strength of a brother's love, under the most severe trials and temptations. "A brother is born for adversity." Psa. xvii. 17. Such a brother was Joseph, and such also was Jesus.

From the condition of a prisoner, Joseph was raised to a position, in Egypt, but little below that of the king himself. "And Pharaoh took off his ring from his hand, and put it upon Joseph's hand, and arrayed him in vestures of fine linen, and put a gold chain about his neck; and he made him to ride in the second chariot which he had; and they cried before him, Bow the knee; and he made him ruler over all the land of Egypt. And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, I am Pharaoh, and without thee shall no man lift up his hand or foot, in all the land of Egypt." Gen. xli. 42-45.

Such was the high degree of honor to which Joseph was promoted. But as his principles were those of genuine piety, they preserved him from vanity and revenge, though, he had strong temptations to these dangers.

Neither the unkind treatment which he received from his brethren, nor the distinguished honors he had obtained from Pharaoh, could chill the flow of brotherly affection that coursed through his tender heart.

Whether there is anything really typical, in this part of Joseph's history or not, it is suggestive. He was still the faithful "brother born for adversity," though exalted to the honors of a prince. So with our blessed Lord. Though he has gone far up into the heavens, and received a name above every name,

"His tender heart is still the same,
And melts at human woe."

As it will be the same Jesus that will come, in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory, that the disciples saw taken from them in a cloud, and that was with them all the time of his public ministry, performing the duties of the most devoted friends, and the work of an all-sufficient Savior, instructing the ignorant and pardoning the guilty; so it is the same Jesus that now occupies the mediatorial throne, and who still lives to save, that once was here on earth and who endeared so many to him by the miracles of mercy which he wrought, and by the words of eternal life which he taught.

While everything around us changes, he changes not. His love changes not. His power changes not. He still "hates iniquity," and "loves righteousness."

In the light of the unchangeableness of our Redeemer, what encouragement we all have to confide in him. We sometimes almost envy those who lived in the times of his incarnation, and who enjoyed the many advantages of his friendship. But what advantages had they that we have not?

He may be all to us that he was to them, since he is the same Jesus now, nineteen centuries after his ascension, that he was when on earth, and will be the same Jesus when he comes again that he was when he left.

CYNTHIA MESSIMORE.

WARSAW, Ind.

The Congregationalist has hit a folly in the churches in the following sentence:—"Spirit-tasting is an art carried, it is said, to great perfection, but only a few samples can be tasted continuously, as the organs of taste soon become blunted, and can only regain their power by an interval of rest. It would be well for vacant parishes to get a hint here for their guidance. Not unfrequently they keep on tasting candidates till all power of discrimination is gone."

THE RESTITUTION

PLYMOUTH, IND.....Dec. 15, 1875.

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.

☞Bro. Watkins writes us from Clayton, Mich., to the effect that there is a growing interest in the truth in that community. Bro. W. immersed two recently.

☞The stockholders of the Christian Publishing Association must not forget to be present at the annual meeting which convenes in Plymouth in connection with the quarterly conference, next week.

☞We held meeting with the society in Plymouth, on Sunday last. Preached two discourses to large and appreciative audiences. Four united with the Church. The out-look in Plymouth is very encouraging indeed.

☞Sunshine, the child's paper will not be ready until next week. Bro. Willcox has been delayed for a time on account of not getting the heading for the paper. We hope our friends will all take an interest in Sunshine, and give it a liberal subscription.

☞Bro Stephenson writes us that he will attend our conference in Plymouth, commencing Dec. 23. We hope our friends throughout the state will make an extra effort to attend. Ample provisions will be made to accommodate all who come.

☞Excessive labor in the Gospel field for the last six weeks has so exhausted our physical energies as to render it imprudent for us to attend the conference at West Irving, Iowa. We very much regret this, as we were very anxious to meet our dear brethren in that state.

☞The revival spirit seems to have taken hold of all classes of religionists down in Boston. The Unitarians, Universalists and Liberals are all holding revival meetings. Miss Smiley, the Quakeress, and Mrs. Van Cott, the Methodist, are besieging the Boston churches. Indeed all the great cities are under seige. It is to be hoped that good will result from the general agitation.

☞Our Brethren in the East have inaugurated a very commendable move. They propose to have a centennial conference in Philadelphia sometime in July or September of next year. We are glad to see this matter started so early as it will give us time to correspond and get matters into proper order. Our brethren West will be glad to co-operate with this movement, and will enjoy meeting those of like faith in the East.

☞Our meetings in Argos closed on Sunday evening last, having been continued nearly four weeks. The interest was excellent throughout. Persons who have not been in the habit of attending meetings for years came out to hear the word of life, and were deeply moved by the glad tidings of coming rest. Our brethren in Argos feel greatly encouraged to push the work along while the day lasts. Twenty came out on the side of the new life. Bro. Willcox was with us a part of the time and aided in preaching the word. He closed the meeting on Sunday evening, and left an excellent spirit among the people. Our prayer is, that the Church may remain steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord.

☞It is claimed that the soul remains in a conscious state between death and the resurrection, and yet that it will not be judged until reunite with the body. If this is so, then it is fair to presume that it has no fixed destiny until after judgment. Now as the soul is conscious and not yet assigned to its final state, why may it not have the benefits of faith and repentance, seeing that probation cannot end until the judgment? It must be clear to all that every soul should have the opportunity of being saved up to the time of judgment. The Catholics, therefore, would seem to have some reasonable ground for their purgatory, if the soul remains conscious between death and the resurrection. But the plain word of God sets this matter at rest, and shows that if "the dead rise not, then they which are fallen asleep ARE PERISHED."

The Ten Virgins.

Bro. Culveyhouse, of Ligonier, Ind., wishes to know whether the parable of the ten virgins can be made to apply to the advent movement of 1844,—as claimed by Sabbatarians. We answer most confidently that it cannot. The whole scene of the parable lies at the close of this dispensation, at which time the kingdom of God is to be established. Let us read the first verse: "Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins which took their lamps and went forth to meet the bridegroom." Matt. xxv.

The reader will observe that it is the kingdom of heaven that is likened unto the ten virgins. Now, Sabbatarians themselves do not believe that the kingdom is yet in existence, neither will it be until the coming of our Lord How, then, can the parable apply to scenes and events which have occurred long before the Kingdom does come? The whole system of William Miller proved false. He preached that Christ would come and destroy the world, and out of its ashes make a new world. All this was untrue. It is not said that the church is the kingdom, neither is it said that the movement of the church shall be compared to ten virgins; but the kingdom shall be likened to ten virgins. This must allude to events which take place in connection with God's kingdom.

If the parable applies to Miller and his co-laborers, why did they not go into the marriage feast? It is said, "they that were ready went into the marriage supper, and the door was shut." Did the adventists go into the supper in 1844? Were they not all on earth after the time passed? If Mr. and Mrs. White were among the "wise," why did they not pass into the marriage? "Then they were ready went into the marriage." Now, either the marriage has not taken place, or else none of the adventists is included among those who are ready. There is no escape from this dilemma. To us it is plain that the parable has reference to events yet future, in connection with the kingdom of heaven. At some future time we shall take up the parable and present the points in detail.

The Sanctuary.

Bro. Culveyhouse wishes to know what sanctuary is referred to in Dan. viii. 14. The text reads as follows: "And he said unto me unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." It is claimed by the Sabbatarians that the sanctuary here mentioned, has reference to the one in heaven, and that Jesus is to cleanse it by his own blood, etc. Let us for a moment examine this position. If Daniel refers to a sanctuary in heaven, he will certainly make it plain. By reading the 17th verse of the 8th chapter, we shall see what sanctuary is referred to. "Now, therefore, O our God, hear the prayer of thy servants, and his supplications, and cause thy face to shine upon thy SANCTUARY THAT IS DESOLATE, for the Lord's sake." At the time Daniel made this earnest prayer Jerusalem was in ruins, the people, or the best, were in captivity, and the sanctuary and the altar were desolate. He was solicitous about the future of Zion and Jerusalem. Daniel knew nothing about the sanctuary in heaven, neither does his questions refer to it. It was the sanctuary now desolate.

Again. The sanctuary to be cleansed is the one which was to be destroyed by the people of the prince or Roman power. This will appear plain from the angel's answer. "And after three score and two weeks shall the Messiah be cut off; but not for himself; and the people of the prince that shall come, shall destroy the city and the sanctuary; and the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war desolations are determined."

Here the city and sanctuary are both involved in a common ruin for a given length of time. No sophistry, no theory can evade. The sanctuary is none other than the one located in Jerusalem, and was destroyed by Titus, the Roman prince. The Jewish host was scattered, the city was destroyed and the holy house was made desolate as foretold by the prophet. Now, how long was this desolation to continue? The answer is at hand. "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed."

It is useless for men to evade by saying that some other sanctuary is intended. Our Lord alludes to the same series of events in Luke xxi. "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." When these times expire, and Jerusalem is redeemed from the oppressor, then will Daniel's prayer be answered, the host will again worship at the altar of the Lord.

Design of the Articles Forever and Eternal.

The design of the above named articles were not to prove that forever and eternal, are always used in an absolute sense in the Bible. Surely no one could be so short-sighted as to so understand our design. Criticism is always premature until a speaker or writer shall have reached his own conclusion. Our design has been to show that these words are uniformly used in the same sense, by Bible writers, when speaking or referring to the same things. If such were not the case, the use of the same words in different senses when speaking of the same things would be calculated to deceive the reader. We affirm, and appeal to the hundreds of occurrences of these words, and their synonims, to demonstrate this asseveration, that in every passage in which these words are used with reference to the existence or attributes of God, the promised life or reward of the saints, or the duration of the reign and kingdom of Messiah, these terms are to be understood in an unlimited sense. And in every occurrence in which they are used with reference to things that must pass away or come to an end, they must be understood in a limited sense. The duration of these words is not so much determined by their etymology as by the duration of the nouns, systems, persons or things to which they relate. Thus, the everlasting hills, the everlasting priesthood, and ordinances of Mosaical system, denoted periods which would continue just as long as these things would continue, and no longer.

Just so in reference to the punishment and destruction of the finally impenitent, the terms forever, everlasting and eternal, denote periods which will continue as long as their punishment or destruction will continue. If it can be clearly proven that God, his Son, his people, and his everlasting kingdom will cease to exist, or come to an end, then of necessity, all the words used expressive of their duration, must be understood in a limited sense, otherwise they must be understood in absolute or unlimited sense. Just so in regard to the duration of punishment of the wicked, if it can be proven by clear and unequivocal Scriptural testimony that the punishment of the ungodly will be limited or finally and forever terminate, then of necessity these words must be understood in an unlimited sense, otherwise they must by all the force of contrast with all the rewards promised the godly, be unlimited. The same words, or measuring line which inspiration has furnished to measure the duration of the rewards of the righteous, are used to measure the duration of the punishment of the wicked. The strong presumptive evidence therefore, is that where the same words used to denote the duration of the reward of the righteous are used to denote the punishment of the wicked, that they are used in the same sense and express the same idea. The moment we admit that a word is used in different senses we destroy the power of the etymology to prove anything. In such cases we are dependent upon the etymology of other words to prove anything. The onus of proof rests upon those who deny the endless punishment of the wicked to prove that their punishment will be limited or come to an end. We must have a definite rule by which to determine the duration of the words used hundreds and hundreds of times to express the immortality of God, Christ, and the saints. It will not do to affirm that these words are always unlimited, or always limited. Determine their duration by the duration of the persons or things to which they relate, and all is plain, but upon any other hypothesis all is conflict and confusion. The idea that the future life and rewards of the saints are limited in the hundreds upon hundreds times, these words are used with reference to them, is preposterous.

The Formula in Baptism.

Remarks on exposition of MATT. XXVIII 19; ACTS II. 38; VIII. 16; X. 48; AND XIX. 5. Why a different form of words used by the apostles than authorized by the Master? NEWELL BOOTH, Flat Rock, N. C.

All languages, from that of the most savage tribes, to that of the most highly civilized and polished families of earth abound in figures of speech. Some of these figures are Parables, Hyperbolies, Comparisons, both extended and suppressed, Metonymies, and Synechdoches. A Synechdoche is a figure where sometimes the whole of a thing is put for a part, and sometimes to the reverse, a part is put for the whole:

A few texts in which a Synechdoche of the latter kind occurs, we give below:

1. After the seven deacons (as they are commonly called) were selected in Jerusalem, it is said that "The word of God increased; and the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly; and a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith."

Here it is evident that the historian does not refer to faith as an act to which many of the priests became obedient, but to faith as a rule of action, meaning all the commands to be obeyed connected with the Gospel. We have the same word faith used by Synechdoche, and used as above, in Rom. i. 5, where Paul says: "We have received grace and apostleship, for obedience to the faith among all nations." And also, again in Rom. xvi. 26. "But now is made manifest, (the secret), and by the Scriptures of the prophets, according to the commandment of the everlasting God, made known to all nations for the obedience of faith."

2. "Beloved, when I gave all diligence to write unto you of the common salvation, it was needful for me to write unto you, and exhort you that ye should earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints" Jude 3. Here instead of the word faith signifying simply an act, by Synechdoche it comprehends all of the promises contained in the Gospel delivered unto the fathers and apostles.

3. Paul preaching to the Athenians, declared from Mar's Hill concerning their former ignorance that then God passed them by, but now he commands all men everywhere to repent. Acts xvii. 30. It is not to be understood that in this Scripture, repentance is used in its primary sense, signifying only a change of the heart, or the will, independent of faith preceding, or obedience following, but that it covers the whole ground of obedience from first to last.

4. Of the commission given by the Savior after his resurrection, to the apostles, we have the following records:

"As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you. And when he had said this, he breathed on them, and saith unto them, receive ye the Holy Ghost. Whosesoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosesoever sins ye retain they are retained" John xx. 21, 22.

Thus it is written, and thus it behooved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day: and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations." Luke xxiv. 46, 47.

"Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." Mark xvi. 15, 16.

Go ye therefore and teach (Margin—make disciples, or, Christians of all nations) all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." Matt. xxviii. 19.

Now it is evident that, repentance of sins by John, repentance and remission of sins by Luke, and, faith and baptism by Mark, are used by Synechdoche, and are equivalent to disciple all nations by Matthew. And furthermore, to comply with the requirements of the commission as given by one, is to comply with the requirements as given by all.

These examples prepare us fully for the case before us.

To baptize then "in the name of Jesus Christ," Acts ii. 38; "in the name of the Lord Jesus," viii. 16; xix. 5; and "in the name of the Lord," x. 48, is by Synechdoche, and by Synechdoche comprehends all that is in Matt. xxviii. 19. "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." While we are greatly in favor of order, and order appears to be God's first law, yet we cannot see that the formula pronounced in the administration of the ordinance effects its validity in the least. We cannot see as to the validity of the ordinance whatever, any difference in the accompanying expressions, I baptize you John Thompson, I baptize you my brother, or I baptize you. The validity of this ordinance is not made to depend so much upon the particular collocation of these words as upon the condition of the heart of the candidate. And while in the administration of the ordinance I use the full formula as given in Matthew, yet I would feel sad indeed if my coat was so small as to compel me to disfellowship all who use only "in the name of the Lord Jesus." We need more charity and less hair-splitting, and theorizing.

Further, Jesus says to the apostles, "He that heareth you, heareth me; and he that heareth me, heareth Him that sent me." Then to perform an act in the name of an apostle, is to perform it in the name of Jesus; and to perform it in the name of Jesus, is to perform it in the name of the Father. Thus the Father speaking and commanding through the Son, and the Son through the apostles, qualifying them by the Holy Spirit, interweaves the authority of the Father, Son, Holy Spirit and apostles in such a manner as to render them inseparable.

Variety.

Nature loves variety. Of all the innumerable objects of nature no two are exactly alike Each has its marked individuality. each, one or more peculiarities which distinguish it from all others of its kind. And this is as eminently true of man as of everything else; no two are alike. We each have (we hope) some good points, and each has his sphere of action. Perfection does not reside in the individual, but (if at all) it may be looked for in the aggregate. We each are but imperfect fragments of one perfect whole. And the very differences and peculiarities of each makes it possible for each to have a place in the one complete, grand temple of the race. It is this very variety of nature which constitutes its beauty. But again, it is this variety in the gifts and powers in man which renders progress possible. Without it the race would forever remain on the plane upon which it was first projected; be it high or low, there it would stay. The differences among us produce a clash of opinions, this clash of opinions invites controversy, investigation, a stirring up of the intellectual waters; hence discovery, progress. Those races or nations whose individuals or members most nearly resemble each other make the least progress in the world. China, whose citizens are almost as nearly alike as two rats, has remained nearly stationary for almost 2,000 years. Western Europe and America, where the population is a conglomerate of every race under heaven, leads the van in the world's progress.

What then can be more painful to a truly philosophic mind than to see irritation, bitterness, rancor, hate arise between two men or parties because of the existence of that variety which constitutes the beauty and value of both. But "it is only the strictly philosophical mind that can justly estimate another, and be content to accept him as he is. We all need to cultivate this philosophical reasonableness; we need to learn the lesson of toleration—nay, more, we should add to our code of morals that self-restraining principle which shall enable us to let each other alone. For toleration implies condescension, not unmixed with contempt, but 'letting alone'—there is no one word which answers the purpose—though it need not denote faith in the result, does imply trust in every man's ability to speak and act for himself. There is no religion in life that is not more perfect in proportion as each shows a thorough respect for the other's individuality. As we desire to be strong and self-reliant ourselves, so should we rejoice in the fearless independence of another."

Only let a loyalty to truth, truth, truth in the abstract, truth as such, be manifested, and the highest esteem, nay, the warmest affection is entirely compatible with the widest divergence, the greatest variety in thought, opinion or natural gift. Indeed this variety will connect affection and render our communion with each other the more agreeable. J. F. WILLCOX.

Expository Notes.

THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS.

Our blessed Lord just before he entered this parable, said, "that which is highly esteemed among men is abomination in the sight of God." Luke xvi. 15. He then proceeded to delineate in parabolic language this doctrine which was highly esteemed by the sect of the Pharisees; but which was abomination in the sight of God, concluding with a fearful warning against those by whom offences come. Luke xvii. 1, 2.

There is no authority for saying that the Jews believed the doctrine expressed in this parable before the Babylonish captivity; but it is a well-known fact that after their return, when the voice of prophecy was silent, they began to incorporate this heathenish doctrine into their traditions; and so marked that burning rebuke of our Master:

"Ye hypocrites, well did Esaias prophesy of you, saying, This people draweth nigh unto me with their mouth, and honoreth me with their lips; but their heart is far from me. But in vain they do worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men." Matt. xv. 7, 9.

Many regard this parable as shadowing forth the thrusting out of the Jews—for a time only—from the Abrahamic covenant, and the receiving of the Gentiles into all the privileges of sonship. There seem to be many powerful arguments in support of this supposition; but we think it can be so only in a secondary sense: its primary meaning being to condemn the popular belief of the Pharisees, in a parabolic representation of their own views; for we remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he bade the disciples to beware of the doctrine of the Pharisees (Luke xii. 1), a conclusive proof that he did not endorse this doctrine in the parable, "which was so highly esteemed by them.

We would here point out a few contradictions in connection with this parable, between the teachings of those who advocate the conscious state of the dead, and the teachings of the Holy Spirit, and of the Lord Jesus.

1. We remember that Isaiah, speaking by the Holy Spirit, said, "Doubtless thou art our Father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not." Isa lxiii. 16. This is a plain, literal statement. However, according to some these words indicted by the Holy Spirit could not be quite correct; for say they, Jesus taught in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, that Abraham was not—and is not—ignorant of his nation.

2. When our adorable Redeemer appeared to his disciples after his resurrection, they were terrified, and thought they saw a spirit; but he immediately corrects their error, saying, "Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself: handle me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have." Luke xxiv. 36-39. Yet in the face of this decisive testimony we are told by some that Jesus taught—although in direct opposition to his definition of a spirit—in this parable that immaterial spirits have eyes fingers, a tongue, and a bosom, and everything appertaining to a human body.

3. Again we are told by some, that our blessed Lord taught by this parable, that the spirits of good men are carried by angels "to the paradise of hades," and not "straight into heaven, as taught by others, as to "sudden a translation from earth's darkness to the full blaze of the Divine glory would be hurtful and injurious" to them. Alas! then, for those who are alive at the coming of the Lord Jesus, for they must of necessity be carried to the paradise of hades for a short time—instead of being caught up together with their risen brethren in the air to meet the lord of life and glory—to prepare themselves for "the full blaze of Divine glory." Surely this is enough to make "the heart of the righteous sad, whom the Lord hath not made sad.'

We see no authority in Scripture for the above sentiments, however soothing they may appear to the dying saint. The testimony of the holy Spirit is directly opposed to such teaching. "For in death there is no remembrance of thee: in Sheol (or hades,) who shall give thee thanks? Ps. vi. 5. "There is no work, nor device, no knowledge, nor wisdom in Sheol (or hades) whither he goest." Eccl. ix. 10. "None can keep alive his own soul." Ps. xxii. 29. Here are three passages out of numerous others, which state, in the most positive terms, that the inmates of hades or sheol, have no memory, neither can they give thanks; also that they have no knowledge, nor wisdom, and that it is impossible for any one to keep alive his own soul. What further proof need we of the unconscious state of the dead?

With this testimony we are pained to see in the words of a beloved brother, that of hades we "shall enjoy the beatific vision," and, doubtless, the frequent presence of our beloved and ever-loving Savior. It is likely that our adorable Savior will go on a visit to the land of silence and corruption, where there is no remembrance of him. We remember he told us that where he was we could not come until he came and fetched us; but nowhere remember that he said he would visit us in hades.

Besides which we remember that in the revelation he gave unto his servant John, he said, "and death and hell (hades) delivered up the dead which were in them." Rev. xx. How comes it then that when our Master says, all that are in hades are dead, any one should say that they are not dead, but still alive, waiting "in the bowers of paradise" in "ecstatic joys of expectant hope" for the resurrection—not of the body they once lived in, but another body expressly made for their immaterial soul; so that the body which endured many hardships in this life, gets no reward for service done for Christ, except utter annihilation, but has to give place for another body with which the immaterial spirit has had no acquaintance. Truly a soothing doctrine!

The divergence in the above teachings from those of the Holy Spirit are so wide as to need no comment what ever.

Our Master defined death as a sleep (John xi 11), which definition we can not do better than accept; for assuredly we cannot improve upon it. God forbid that we should in any way whatever wrest his words from their proper meaning; but we cannot see how in the face of this testimony there can be any wide-awake souls in hades.

I would conclude in the words of the apostle:

"Beloved, let us love one another; for love is of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God." John iv. 7.

Rev. E. E. Hale, in the Christian Union says:—"The difference between Universalists in America and Unitarians, so called, seems to be purely external or historical. I know no person who would attempt to divide the two communions by any doctrinal statement. In fact, there is constant interchange of pulpits between them, and all other tokens of common life and mutual sympathy.

Dr. Field writes from Rome to the Evangelist, that recent excavations at the Coliseum "have made fresh discoveries. The whole arena has been dug down many feet, and shows a vast system of passages underground, not only those through which wild beasts were led into the arena, but conduits for water, by which the whole amphitheatre could be flooded and turned into a lake large enough for Roman galleys to sail in; and here naval battles were fought with all the fury of a conflict between actual enemies, to the delight of the Roman emperor and people, who shouted applause, when blood flowed freely on the deck, and dyed the waters below."

Syria has suffered greatly from cholera. At Antioch, after the population had been reduced by panic to about 8,000, there were from fifty to eighty deaths daily. At Damascus, the oldest city in the world, business was almost suspended. The daily average of deaths were reported at 160, and yet it is believed the actual number was much larger. It is a cause for gratitude that none of the various missions in Syria have suffered seriously from the pestilence, further than the interruption of the work in their schools.

Dr. Cuyler in the Evangelist thus sums up the results of the labors of the evangelists in Brooklyn: "During these twenty-six days, over one hundred meetings were held. At a fair allowance for the frequent attendance of many, it may be estimated that three hundred thousand persons heard the pure gospel of Calvary preached or sung! This is equal to the whole population of a city like Chicago. The committee issued 125,000 tickets of admission during the last twelve days. Of the multitudes who thronged the Rink, the vast majority were church members. All the entreaties of Mr. Moody could not prevent thousands of Christians from packing the seats that were intended for the unconverted alone. Some consciences, by this time, ought to smart.

Intolerance.

The history of humanity is a history of intolerance. This spirit has manifested itself in all organizations whether Secular, National, or Ecclesiastical. This is the selfishness of humanity cropping out, and sometimes sapping the very foundations of liberty and freedom upon which these organizations profess to have been builded. It is the selfishness of man rising up and saying you must think as I think, and act as I act. It is the desire to be recognized as infallible. This is the history religiously of Paganism, Roman Catholicism and Protestantism. Wherever any party religiously or politically have felt themselves agrieved and oppressed by any creed, and these grievances have been deemed a sufficient cause for resistance and disentanglement, their subsequent history, however strange it may appear is but the re-production of the history of the former party.

As an evidence of this, we give below a part of the early code of Connecticut, known as "The Blue Laws."

Were it not for the principles above referred to, surpassingly strange indeed, it would appear how a people oppressed, and for conscience' sake driven from their native country, could so soon enact such a code. It is but the reverse of the moral ethics of the noble Nazarene, "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you."

Bible vs. Universalism.

An extract from the forth-coming "Reply to 212 questions without answers, by the Universalist preacher, Abel C. Thomas, by J. F. Wilcox.

QUESTION 184. Is it true that God punishes us "for our profit that we might be partakers of his holiness?" Heb. xii. 10.

Q. 185. Would endless punishment be for our profit?

Q. 186. Would endless punishment "afterward yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness unto them who are exercised thereby?"

Q. 187. Is there an afterward to eternity. Heb. xii. 11.

Answer 184 to 187 inclusive.

The argument involved in these questions may be briefly stated thus: "All divine punishment is designed to reform the sufferer, but endless punishment cannot reform the sufferer, therefore, no divine punishment cannot be endless."

The fallacy of this argument lies in the major proposition, which asserts that all punishment is corrective.

We deny this proposition and offer the following reasons for so doing.

1. That the Scriptures teach that God sometimes inflicts punishment with a view to reform is freely admitted; but such corrective dispensations are mostly confined to the people of God, in distinction from others. The passages quoted from Hebrews refer to God's discipline of His children; correcting their faults by chastisement, and hence do not apply to "the wages of sin which is death." Capital punishment is not designed to reform the criminal. But besides this chastisement of his believing children, it is freely granted that he brings various calamities on individuals and nations in this life for the purpose of reforming them. The Jews were often punished for their idolatries with a view to their reformation. But because God corrects his children to render them more faithful, or punishes sinners during their natural life to bring them to repentance, to infer from thence that all punishment under all circumstances is corrective, is to draw a conclusion much broader than the premises. The present dispensation of good and evil is designed to be disciplinary as a whole; but "He, that being often reproved hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed and that without remedy." Prov. xxix. 1. Destruction does not reform.

2. I object to the idea that all punishment is corrective because it entirely overlooks the sinner's desert. What the sinner deserves as a punishment for his sins, and what he needs as a remedy for his spiritual disease, are two entirely distinct considerations. To suppose that all punishment is designed to make the sinner better, is to say that he deserves no punishment as a remedy for his sin, but only needs it as a remedy for his disease. But this is to deny the true character of sin, indeed it is to deny its existence (for voluntary transgressions alone is sin), and to affirm that sin is only a misfortune, a disease. Hence properly there can be no such thing as punishment; what is called such is only medicine for the sick; and the amount of medicine he is to receive does not at all depend on what he deserves, but upon what he needs. But that this is a false view of the nature of sin, Universalists themselves admit, for they are continually telling us that the sinner will get no more punishment than he "deserves." And the Scripture uniformly represents the sinner as guilty and deserving of punishment, and that by faith and obedience of the Gospel he is saved from its infliction. Gal. iii. 13, "Christ has redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us." By the curse of the law must be meant death, "the wages of sin." But all die, therefore, it must be a future,—called by John, the Revelator the second,—death. But this death is only inflicted on those whose names are not found written in the Lamb's Book of Life, and is the reward of their crimes. Of those whose names are recorded there it is said, "On such the second death hath no power." "They shall not be hurt of the second death." Rev. ii. 11; xx. 6. Now, if punishment is designed only to reform; to be saved from punishment is to be saved from an effectual means of reformation; it is to be prevented from taking necessary medicine for our recovery, and Christ in "redeeming us from the curse of the law," has instead done us an ill turn. Rom. v. 9, "Much more then, being now justified by his blood, and shall be saved from wrath through him." Matt. iii. 7, "Who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come." 1 Thess. i. 10, "Jesus who hath delivered us from the wrath to come." In all these and many other Scriptures Jesus is represented as saving the believer from punishment. That is, from the Universalist stand-point, from the only efficient and gracious means for his reformation and recovery. But let us look at some of the threatenings of God against the sinner, and see how they will conform to this idea of punishment. 2 Thess. i. 9, "Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction." Mal. iv. 1, "Behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble, and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch." Matt. iii. 12, "He will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire." Isa. i. 28, "And the destruction of the transgressors and of the sinners shall be together, and they that forsake the Lord shall be consumed." Psa. civ. 35, "Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth, and let the wicked be no more." Psa. cxlv. 20, "The Lord preserveth all them that love him, but all the wicked will he destroy." 2 Pet. ii. 12, "But these as natural brute beasts shall utterly perish in their own corruption." Gal. vi. 8, "For he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption."

These will suffice as a sample of the way in which the Holy Scriptures speak of the punishment of the ungodly; and to affirm in view of them, and the scores of passages like them, that all punishment is designed to reform the sinner, is an insult to common sense and an inexcusable outrage on the Bible.

3. I object to this view of punishment because it overlooks the great means of the reformation of the sinner, which the Scriptures insist on and which the Universalist himself contends for, viz., the love and goodness of God and the moral power of the gospel. If punishment is converted to as a means of reformation, it must be only after all other means have failed. If this succeeds, then is punishment more efficacious than all other means. The gospel is preached without effect, its "exceeding great and precious promises" are powerless to reform; the story of "the great love wherewith he hath loved us," returns void to him that tells it; even the threatenings of coming judgment are unheeded and despised. Now if, after all this, the sinner is to be reformed by punishment, then must wrath do more toward winning the sinner than mercy; then must hell-fire be more efficacious than the blood of Christ; then will the great mass of the saved be more indebted to the pains of purgatory for salvation than to all other means put together, which God employes to bring men to repentance. But in contending for this principle Universalists are inconsistent with themselves and clearly abandon one of the main principles of Universalism, viz., that love is the only proper incentive to obedience. Now declaim so loudly against the idea that any man ever was or can be saved through fear of the punishment which await the ungodly; and yet by holding to the corrective design and nature of punishment, as they do, they make this very dread of punishment the strongest incentive to reformation which can be brought to bear on wicked man. "Punishment becomes the sinners last safe hope, which will surround him and force him in, when he shall have broken through every other barrier to ruin." Thus, while no class of people declaim so vehemently against the fear of punishment as an incentive to obedience, yet none depend so much upon its efficiency in securing the sinner's salvation. They must either cease to urge the corrective design of all punishment, or abandon the idea that love and mercy are the chief incentives to obedience and go to preaching hell torments as the means of bringing men to repentance.

4. But admitting that all punishment is designed to be corrective, it by no means follows that all will be corrected by it and be saved. The "goodness of God" is also designed "to bring men to repentance," (Rom. ii. 4) but Universalists must concede that in the majority of cases it fails. If the gospel accomplished the reformation of all, or ever could do so, there would be no room for corrective punishment; but the gospel does not reform all men, and there is therefore no proof that punishment will do so. Besides it is well known that punishment often hardens men; they sometimes, as the Scriptures teach, harden themselves against calamities which are designed, confessedly, to reform them, and grow worse and worse under its infliction. Punishment, then, does not always reform; hence, if the doctrine of eternal misery is false, (as it assuredly is), God has no recourse except to destroy them, which he will do "and that without remedy."

Correspondence.

BRETHREN:—Last Sunday I commenced a series of lectures at this place which is yet in progress, with some interest, notwithstanding the united opposition of Catholics, Protestants, and Infidels of all grades. The enemy's "best hold" has been to keep the people away, by raising the old cry of "heresy, fanatic," etc. But mystic Babylon is getting aroused. It may be that some of their "elder priests and elders" will yet come out of their fortified strongholds and undertake a fair fight against the truth in an open field. I clip the following from the Anna Union of this date.

Yours in hope, A. SANFORD.

SECOND COMING OF CHRIST.

Mr. Sanford, restorationist, of this city, is said to believe that the "second coming of Christ" will be during this generation... He thinks that many now living will witness it, and that the pressing duty of all mankind is to prepare at once for the great event.

Mr. Sanford knows as much about the "second coming of Christ" as your correspondent, and perhaps that is not very much. This is a generation of vipers, and we scarcely think the world is ready to receive the King of Glory quite yet. Mr. Sanford will do well to preach the gospel of glad tidings, and abstain from wild speculations which never fail to render talkers absolutely ridiculous in the eyes of sensible people, and end in a trip to the mad house by those of weak nerves and weaker minds. No one knoweth the time when the Son of Man will make his second advent on the earth, and such predictions only resolves themselves into idle profanity calculated to injure and degrade the cause of our blessed religion among the children of men. Away with all such nonsense and give us that sort of spiritual food and comfort which elevates the immortal mind and brings it nearest the awful Throne of Him who doeth all things well.

GOSPEL PRACT.

A Child's Paper at Last!

I have decided to issue a paper for our children where the need can be found such a great deal of talking and writing to relation to it, but hitherto no action. Find we have been disappointed and even grieved, necessary to the issue of the paper, yet the subscribe fell through, and of course the pledges forfeited.

Now I propose to issue a paper for the little ones monthly, beginning with the new year, Jan. 1878, at 50 cents a copy for subscription and rely on the goodness of God which ever present among us freely of a paper known and into the hands of his own and his neighbors children, which will not lead them into the snares and falsehoods so too prevalent to make it a success.

The first number will be issued early in December and a copy will be sent to every subscriber for the Restitution. This will give all a chance to see the paper before subscribing.

I shall be needed in advance but shall try to issue a few or well worth the cost, only asked for if and rely on the receipts of the paper itself.

Shall so succeed I must have a list of two thousand subscribers. This number can be obtained if all who are interested in the truths we advocate take hold and push it. A day or two spent by any person friendly in canvassing for it after the first copy is issued will soon roll up the desired number of names.

It will be published at the RESTITUTION office, Plymouth, Ind., under the auspices of the Christian Publishing Association; but all communications for the paper, and all subscriptions must be sent for the present to my address, Fort Atkinson, Jefferson Co., Wis.

The size of the paper will be about 12x16 inches viz., of 4 pages, and will be illustrated and pieces of music introduced as often as I can afford it. If the response is liberal and prompt, the paper will either be enlarged, or the price reduced the second year.

As the paper is not, however, it will be sent at the following rates:

Single copy, 60 cents a year; and at the same rate for any number of copies under ten.

Ten copies, and any larger number under fifty, when sent to one address, 45 cents.

Fifty copies, and any number over fifty, when sent to one address, 40 cents.

To Canada subscribers at the same rate.

Contributions for its columns are solicited from all of our friends old and young. Bible questions, enigmas, rebuses, odds and ends, anecdotes, etc., all will be welcome. Let us all try to make it a spicy, entertaining, instructive and welcome visitor to our young folks every where.

He will exert all his divine attributes to make them as wretched through eternity as the capacity of their nature will admit." —Benson, the eminent Methodist Commentator.

GOD'S WORD.—"For behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch——And ye shall tread down the wicked, for they shall be ashes under the soles of your feet in the day that I shall do this, saith the Lord of hosts." Mal. 4: 1–3.

"But the wicked shall perish, and the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs; they shall consume: into smoke shall they consume away." Psa. 37: 38.

"When the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish, it is that they shall be destroyed forever." Psa. 92: 7.

"But the transgressors shall be destroyed together: the end of the wicked shall be cut off." Psa. 37: 38.

"What fruit had ye in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? for the end of those things is death." Rom. 6: 21.

"Who (the wicked) shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power." 2 Thess. 1: 9.

"Behold all they that are incensed against thee shall be ashamed and confounded: they shall be as nothing; and they that strive with thee shall perish: they that war against thee shall be as nothing; and as a thing of naught." Isa. 41: 11–12.

"They (the wicked) shall be as though they had not been. Obadiah 16."

See also Ezek. 23. 31; Psa. 145: 20; 101: 8; 37: 9; Prov 13: 18; 21: 16; Isa. 10: 16–17; 1: 28; 5: 24; 33: 11–12; 57: 16; Job 21: 3; Zeph. 1: 2; Matt. 7: 13; 13: 30; Rom. 6: 23; 8: 5, 9, 13; 2: 12–16; 2 Cor. 2: 15–16; Gal. 6: 8; Phil. 3: 19; Heb. 10: 27; 6: 6; 1 Tim. 6: 9; 2 Pet. 2: 12.

You have here set before you Man's Word and God's Work. Which will you believe?

"Let God be true, but every man a liar." "God is not a man that he should lie." "Add thou not unto his words lest he reprove thee, and thou be found a liar." Prov. 30: 6. "If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book." Rev. 22: 18. But do you not perceive a striking discrepancy between the words of God and the words of men? The contents of this tract plainly show that there have been considerable additions made to God's Word and without his authority.

Reader, art thou a believer in Christ? O prize the precious volume. It contains words of life. Do not allow men who are "wise above what is written," to destroy its simplicity and its preciousness by obtruding their "vain traditions" in its place.

Art thou still out of Christ? O, be persuaded to come to him, that thou mayest have life. The precious Word of Life gives thee every encouragement to come. Delay no longer, lest the dark night of an eternal death engulf thee in its awful gloom.

Be Consistent.

In this age of inconsistency, it would be well if every Christian in the land, could have a banner with these words inscribed thereon, upon which he could gaze at every uplifting of the eyes. All Christians ought to be consistent, but alas! how few we find that are really so. Paul in writing to Titus, says, "In all things shewing thyself a pattern of good works, in doctrine, uncorruptness, gravity, sincerity, sound speech that cannot be condemned, that he that is of the contrary part may be ashamed having no evil thing to say of you." This exortation, although written to Titus, will apply equally as well to every true Christian. Each one ought to feel that it is his or her duty to be a pattern of good works in all things; studying to be "a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth, so that the gain-sayers may be put to silence, and the truth of God prevail. However, let this be done with all good fidelity and in meekness: in love, telling the whole truth, clothing our word with kindness: and letting our daily walk and conversation be such that no evil thing can be said of us: so that by our good influence and example we may be instrumental in leading others to Christ. The great aim and object of every true Christian ought to be, to so live and work, no matter how humble the sphere may be, so that the greatest amount of good can be accomplished. The ability may differ, the sphere and work also, but all, in order to effect this purpose, must be consistent.

There is much truth in the old saying, that "actions speak louder than words;" for if we say one thing and then do another, our actions nullify our words: and therefore, can have little or no influence for good upon the minds of an intelligent community. Let the words ever be sound, and the actions agree: so "that he that is of the contrary part may be ashamed having no evil thing to say of you." All that are acquainted with the means of salvation, know that God has a final and definite plan, where man can be saved: and that only those who have willingly complied with the conditions upon which this salvation is proffered, are recognized as his children. These then being members of the same household, are equally entitled to all the benefits and privileges of the Lord's house. Would it be consistent then to call a man a brother, and yet deny him that right to which he is entitled by virtue of his relationship?

An objector may say, we can call a man a brother, and yet not mean a brother in the Lord. Very true. A lawyer may call another member of the bar a brother, and he is instantly understood to mean a brother in the profession: so when we call a professed Christian, no matter what his faith may be, a brother, he certainly understands us to mean a brother in the Lord. It is no difference what we mean at heart, we are letting him be of this opinion, and consequently deceiving him; and furthermore, we virtually acknowledge that his faith, no matter how contrary to the Word of God it may be, has placed him into Christ, and is all sufficient to secure his salvation, when we know that the opposite of this is true. This half-way compromise may be made, through fear of giving offence to the party, or from a lack of courage on our part; but whichever it is, it does positive injury, to the person as well as to the cause of truth. Would not he be all the more offended, if we should decline an invitation to commune with him? Is it showing kindness towards any one to give them a wrong impression, or let them be of a wrong opinion? Besides this, how can we convince any one of the fact, that there is but one Gospel, and that the things contained therein must be believed in order to salvation, when by our very actions we show that it is immaterial, and that we can be a brother without complying with these conditions? There are many good and honest-hearted people in the world whom we love deeply, and yet we have no right to invite them to the Lord's table, because we know that they have not complied with the conditions upon which they can be adopted into the family of God. We must then endeavor to show our love to them by kindly enlightening them as to their condition; and if offences do come, let them come from a sense of duty, rather than by an inconsistent step, which may hinder others from coming to the light and becoming heirs of salvation. Whatever we do, let it be done with an eye single to the glory of God; and wherever the word of God draws a line of demarcation, let us meekly abide by it, and not seek to compromise truth with error; deceiving ourselves with the thought that this is charity. May we all remember that our actions are watched daily by those without, and that if we wish to win them to Christ, we must act consistently in all things, and be a pattern of good works; ever taking heed to the admonition of our Savior—"Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven."

LONGING FOR IMMORTALITY.

"It is sometimes said that the intense longings we have for immortality prove that man is immortal. That there are such longings I do not dispute; nor do I dispute that they come from God's Spirit. But I have yet to learn that to long for a thing proves the possession of it. The very fact of longing for a thing implies that we have it not. Still, this longing does prove that we are capable of immortality, and may obtain it if we set to work in a right manner. It seems to me that God very graciously puts into our breasts this unceasing longing for immortality to make us reflecting men; to induce us to inquire about it from the only Book that can teach us rightly concerning it; to induce us to seek it, and when we get it to hold it fast."

HOW TO ATTAIN IMMORTALITY.

"The doctrine we maintain is this—that when God made man, He made him capable of immortality upon the fulfilment of certain conditions. Immortality was, and is, a gift of grace; not a natural endowment to be inherited by natural means. I use the phrase 'conditional immortality' to indicate that, in our opinion, no man will live for ever on account of any intrinsic quality which he has, but on account of a vital faith, by means of which the true Christian is brought into union with the Source and Giver of all life. We wish to be clearly understood: and I repeat that no man is naturally immortal, and that if he would be so he must be content to accept it as a gift of God through the atonement of Christ. It appears to me, our friends suppose they derive their immortality from the flesh—perhaps I had better say from God as their Creator, through the medium of their natural birth. This is one amongst the innumerable blessings purchased for us by our adorable Redeemer, the Son of God. He shed his precious blood in order to buy back this and other blessings, which we by our sins had forfeited. Therefore, if you and I would find this immortality, we must, as the second of Romans tells us, 'seek for it by patient continuance in well doing;' and if we would obtain life for ever, we can so obtain it only by being united to Christ, as the branch to the vine. As He is the source of life, we gain immortality as believers in Him and as members of his mystical body. Our opponents seem content to receive it from God as the Creator: we say we receive it from the cross of Christ, on condition of our union with God through Christ, and of our continuance in that union."

NEPHESH; OR, SOUL APPLIED TO MANY THINGS.

"But what you will be most surprised to hear is, that nephesh is applied to something or other which the ladies of that day used in their toilet. In Isaiah iii.—which the ladies, and especially the fast ladies of the present day would do well to read over—the twentieth verse speaks of the 'bonnets, and the ornaments of the legs, and the head bands, and the tablets, and the earrings.' The original for 'tablets' is 'houses of the soul;' and many have been the conjectures of expositors as to the meaning; and one of them was not far wrong when he proposed that 'bethi ha nephesh' should be rendered, 'smelling bottles;' for the cognate verb to nephesh, means to snuff up, or to smell. If however modern so-called orthodoxy be true, then this luxurious appendage of a lady's toilet should be called in our language 'a house for an immortal soul,' although it was something a lady could put upon her toilet table, or carry in her pocket. These are some specimens to show how the Holy Spirit uses the word nephesh or soul in the Bible; and I put it to every thoughtful person, whether, if God had wished to teach the immortality of the soul, he would ever have used a word to teach it which he applies to beasts, dead bodies, fish, idols, trees, and to articles of a lady's toilet? And especially when he had other words which would exactly have expressed the doctrine if he had designed to teach it? Seeing God's book is a revelation concerning the nature and future destiny of man, we may be sure that if our souls were unconditionally immortal, he would have told us so in words which could not be mistaken."

OFFICIAL PERVERSION OF THE BIBLE.

"I wish to make an observation about the word 'annihilation.' I protest against its use, whether it come from friend or foe. Annihilation is the destruction of particles. Extinction is the destruction of parts. There is no such thing as annihilation; but extinction goes on every day. I contend for the word extinction, because it is a Scriptural word, found in Isaiah xliii. 17. Speaking of the wicked, he writes, 'they are extinct, they are quenched as tow.'"

The Title to Life.

The exception taken by not a few Christians to the view entertained so strongly by others as to the unconsciousness of the intermediate state, is grounded, in part, if not mainly, upon the idea that the everlasting life spoken of in John v. 24, and other passages, is a life now presently bestowed, and actually possessed; instead of being one to which a title only—as yet unrealized—is conferred upon the believer. With logical consistency, the argument maintained upon such a basis of interpretation amounts to this—that the eternal life, thus already begun, is incapable alike, under any conditions of termination, or of even a temporary suspension. Will you allow me to bear an humble private testimony to the result of what, I trust, God Himself has plainly taught me with reference to this subject? I have lately found that, in the system of life and immortality, as it is laid down in New Testament Scripture more particularly, there is a very special difference put between life spiritual and life eternal, or everlasting: that, although these stand intimately co-related, as cause and effect, yet, that they are as distinct in character as they are also not simultaneous in their realized operations and results. Eternal life, during the present earth and time states, is, on our side—wholly, future and objective—the subject of divine promise—it is, with us, the object, and this only, of faith and hope: to be believed in, hoped, and patiently waited for as being still future: a gift in reserve (Rom. vi. 23) a reward, to be distributed variously, and in different degrees, in the hereafter, Mark x. 29–31. It will become ours for the first time, at the coming of the Lord, and in and through a resurrection-reception which will inaugurate it. It will consist, also, largely, of such elements of material, intellectual and moral blessedness, as will meet the several requirements of two of the necessary constituents of the human being proper—viz., the body and the soul. On the other hand, spiritual life, as it is set forth in Scripture, is of a nature entirely subjective; one of like present bestowal, and present inward experience. It is the work of the Spirit of God in and upon the mind and heart—i. e., the ideas and affections of the believer; a work realized, because already begun, during the dispensation which now is; and, qualifying the recipient for the use and enjoyment of that other life, the everlasting, which awaits its development in a Divinely-arranged future. Were the foregoing distinction more clearly seen and generally recognized than it seems to be, it might, possibly, help to obviate one of the grave objections urged against the non-existence (theory) of departed saints in the interval between death and resurrection. They are not as yet come into the promised inheritance of millennial, still less of the subsequent eternal life. While, therefore, the spirit of each believer, on its returning at death, to the Great Parent of spirits, may—not only in regard to his future purpose—but also, actually presently, remain alive unto and before him, it appears to be not only compatibly, but also probably, true, that all consciousness of any kind or degree of life, must, on the human side, decrease at death, together with those thoughts and affections—the source of all identity and consciousness—which then and there—according to inspired authority—do, most certainly, "perish." Psa. cxlvi. 4; Ecc. ix. 5–6.

The Purifying Hope.

"Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he (Christ) is pure."—1 John iii. 2, 3.

1. The hope referred to is the coming of Jesus. It is in harmony with the hope presented all through the Scriptures. There is "one hope" in the plan of God. Hope is made up of desire and expectation. All that have this hope in them are not only desiring but expecting the Lord Jesus to come according to his promise to his disciples: "If I go away I will come again, and receive you unto myself, that where I am there ye may be also."

Paul, in looking for the appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ, calls it a "blessed hope;" and he says, "Our conversation is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like his glorious body according to the working whereby he is able to subdue all things unto himself," David says, "I shall be satisfied when I awake in thy likeness."

When this hope is consummated, we shall be like Christ, having glorified bodies, and mortality shall be swallowed up of life. "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality; then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, death is swallowed up in victory." No wonder, with such blessed results attending when this hope is consummated, that Paul calls it a "blessed hope."

2. This hope—the coming of Jesus—is the purifying hope; for "every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself." We must have it in the heart before that heart can be purified. How natural for a person with such a hope—"looking for and hastening unto the coming of the day of God"—to "cleanse himself from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God." Those who are whole—holy—will not be afraid to meet a holy God; will not be afraid to hear of the coming of the Lord of life and glory.

The apostle of the Corinthians thanked God in their behalf for the grace that was given them, so that they came "behind in no good gift, waiting for the coming of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, who shall also confirm you unto the end, that ye may be blameless (pure—holy) in that day." "And the Lord make you to increase and abound in love one toward another, and toward all men, to the end that he may establish your hearts in holiness before God, even our Father, at the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ, with all his saints." "And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly, and I pray God your whole spirit, and soul, and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Thus we see how inseparable these two doctrines are. It is a coming of the Lord and a preparation to meet him. "Without holiness no man shall see the Lord." Holiness, or wholeness, is pre-requisite to salvation. We must first become holy, pure, saved from sin, before we can have salvation in the kingdom of God. If we would be pure, let us feed on this manna—this hope of a coming Christ to put death under our feet—as we bow around the sacramental board and show the Lord's death till he come, thus manifesting our faith in his death and hope of his coming. Oh, let this "blessed hope" burn and glow in our hearts. I know of no doctrine more sanctifying and quickening than the second advent of Christ. I know of none more calculated to draw us from the world, and make us whole-hearted and joyful Christians.—Banner of Holiness.

Tobacco and Insanity.

The following facts have been compiled from a French publication, and are startling enough to have restraining influence on those who are not already confirmed tobacco-users:

"From 1812 to 1842 the tobacco tax in France produced 28,000,000 francs, and the lunatic asylum contained eight hundred patients. The tobacco revenue has now reached 180,000,000 francs, while there are forty-four thousand paralytic and lunatic patients in the hospitals, showing that the increase of lunacy has kept pace with the increase of the revenue from tobacco. These statistics, presented by M. Jolly to the Academy of Science, in connection with the closing words of his speech, contain a frightful warning to those forming the pernicious habit of smoking, now increasing so rapidly. The moderate use of tobacco, and more especially of the pipe, produces a weakness of the brain, and in the spinal marrow, which causes madness."—Ex.

An Interesting Relic.

There is in the possession of Dr. J. C. Waugh, of Fleming county, Ky., a Bible which is 262 years old, and was brought to this country two centuries ago. It came to this country in the possession of Betsey Ireland, from Ireland, and has been handed down from generation to generation of her descendants. Originally bound in leather it was rebound in cloth, and now has its third set of covers, being bound in fawn skin. It has never been out of the possession of the family for a sing e day except for repairs. It is now so worn that it is seldom taken from its place, and has been tied up with the same string since 1817.

The 9th of Ab.

August 10, 1875, the anniversary of the destruction of the temple of Jerusalem, was celebrated by conservative Jews throughout the world as a day of mourning, for on that day the first temple was destroyed, and, by a remarkable coincidence, on the 9th of Ab, the second temple was razed and burned by the hand of Nebuchadnezzar. In subsequent centuries, on the 9th of Ab, Jerusalem too was totally destroyed by the hands of Titus.

Half a century afterwards on the same 9th of Ab, Bethar, the stronghold and place of refuge of the Jewish people, was stormed, and the blood of thousands failed to satisfy the inhuman vengeance of the emperor Hadrian.

The 9th of Ab has indeed been a gloomy period, and must form a dark and bloody page in Jewish history. No wonder the day has been set apart for fasting and prayer by that people.—J. H. Clark.

When the late President Day, of Yale College, first had his attention called to Spiritualism, a quarter of a century ago, said he, "Either nothing is in it, or the devil is in it." Dr. Day was generally right and we think he was not far from right in this instance. The subsequent history and fruit of Spiritualism confirm the soundness of his judgment.

We should never learn to interpret duty by success. The opposition which assails us in the course of obedience is no evidence that we are mistaken.

Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the Scriptural "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates, as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as priest-rulers with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for Annihilation.

Correspondence.—The Editor must not be understood as endorsing all the sentiments expressed by correspondents whose articles are inserted under this head. Each writer is alone responsible for the article bearing his own signature. If the teaching of any writer is not endorsed, an article setting forth the views of the party differing may be forwarded. Free discussion of Bible doctrines on all sides will be allowed, but the Editor reserves the publicity of criticising those communications which antagonize a belief and obedience of the Gospel as a means of salvation, or which undermine its principles.

The Glorious Future.

"Behold a King shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgment."—Isa. xxxii. 1.

Here Isaiah brings vividly to view a time when "a King shall reign," not as other kings have reigned in unrighteousness, but righteously; "and princes shall rule in judgment." Hence it is a prediction of something that was to transpire in the future, and therefore, a prophecy. What is prophecy? Perhaps as simple a definition as could be given, would be a prediction of future events, and if written, "history written in advance," or a history of events given in advance of their occurrence. The difference between history and prophecy is this; that while history acquaints us with circumstances and events in the past, prophecy withdraws the veil that obscures the future and permits us to view the gradual unfoldings of the divine plan.

History, then, is the fulfillment of prophecy. All true prophecy is intended as a promise to those who are favored of God and obey his requirements, and hence may be considered in part conditional or as a threatening or warning to those who rebel against him. It may be divided into literal, symbolic, discussive and consecutive prophecy. Literal prophecy is to be literally understood, and will be literally fulfilled, e. g. Isa. xxxiv. 5, 10-17. A prophecy concerning Idumea, which according to reliable historians has had a most striking fulfillment, "and the testimony of an infidel was the first to show how it has been realized." There are numerous prophecies respecting nations and individuals, which must be interpreted in the same way.

"Symbolic prophecy is that in which the objects expressed are used to represent the one intended to be presented. Beasts, mountains and rivers are used to symbolize nations, events, and other things," e. g. Rev. xii. 1-18. "Discussive prophecy is that which presents the predicted events irregularly; not regarding their chronological order." Consecutive prophecy is that in which the predicted events are arranged in regular order, as first, second, and third, etc.

The author of propecy must be possessed of two qualifications: "First, power to comprehend and understand the future. Second, power to control all coming events according to fixed laws." This power God alone possesses, and he is able to view the future as well as the present and past, and eternity also unfolds its vast extent before him. He reveals through human agencies his great designs concerning the earth and the race, and we become in this way acquainted with the otherwise hidden future. In imparting this information to man, he has conferred a great favor, and it should be acknowledged in every way possible. The ignorant and finite condition of man prevents him from knowing anything of the coming years, and hence he is dependent upon the infinite and universal knowledge of God. He alone is in possession of omnipotent power and omniscient knowledge. The wonderful unfoldings of the plan of Deity, as shown in history, and the exact accomplishment of the prophetic word will ever stand as an impassable barrier between Christianity and infidelity. The fulfillment of many of the predictions in the Old and New Testaments is also an assurance of the realization of the words of our text. When prophetic announcements are made concerning nations or individuals by the inspired writers, they may be depended upon as reliable; his word shall not return unto him void, but will accomplish that whereunto he hath sent it. Though men may misunderstand or misapply them, they will nevertheless be fulfilled. God has moreover implanted a desire in the human mind to know more in regard to the future, and it is commendable in those who believe the prophetic utterances to search more diligently the Scriptures to ascertain what they teach concerning it. It is compared to a "light that shineth in a dark place." Truly it is a bright and glorious light, illuminating the pathway of the Christian, and cheering him on his pilgrimage journey. As "no prophecy came in old time by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," it is an assurance that we "have a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed."

Furthermore, a correct knowledge of the future is of great importance as it reveals events to come which we can anticipate and be prepared for. It tells us of Jesus' coming, and certainly a preparation is needful for receiving him. It tells of events which must transpire before he comes, and when they occur—if familiar with the prophecies in regard to them—we understand our relation to them, and our position in the stream of time. It tells of events past which history proves true with certain circumstances connected with the present, and to come. It tells also of the reign of an all-powerful King who shall rule the world in righteousness, and bring in everlasting peace. Then will be fulfilled the sublime declaration of Ezek. xxi. 25-27, concerning the overthrow of the kingdom of Israel under Zedekiah and its re-establishment under the reign of Christ. When such statements are made concerning a kingdom they will certainly be realized. There is, however, a disposition among many who ignore the rights and exalted position of the Jewish people to evade the force of some of the prophecies that foretell their future greatness. This is done by making them conditional. But prophecy of this character is designed to inform mankind what shall be, not what may be if men do so and so, and it would be as consistent to say history is conditional. Hence, when God so expressly declares that the kingdom of Israel shall be restored, and that Christ will rule over it righteously, we are compelled to believe it. What dependence can be placed in that which has been foretold "by holy men of old," if there is unexpressed conditions connected with these prophecies? Why, none at all. But, says one, has not God said he would do certain things, and has not performed them? Certainly; but they have been promises conditioned on obedience, not unconditional declarations; hence the necessity of distinguishing between a prophecy and a promise. These introductory remarks prepare us for the consideration of our subject.

1. "Behold a King shall reign." Who is he?

2. "And princes shall rule." Who are they?

3. The manner of his reign is "in righteousness."

4. The manner of their rule is "in judgment."

Who is the King? I answer, Jesus the Christ. You demand the proof, it will be given.

Isa. xi. 1, compared with Acts ii. 30, proves that David, who was the king of Israel, is the progenitor of Christ, so he belongs to a kingly race. See also Psa. xlv. 1-6; Heb. i. 2-4; Luke i. 32, 33. Anciently, kings acted as arbitrators and judges, and so it is affirmed of him that "he shall not judge after the sight of his eyes, neither reprove after the hearing of his ears, but with righteousness shall he judge the poor and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth." Isa. xi. 2-4. The testimony of Jer. xxiii. 5, is proof also, of Christ's reign, and the manner in which he will govern the world. For further proof, consult Zech. ix. 9; vi. 12, 13; Luke xix. 38, and John i. 49. The testimonies thus far adduced is in perfect harmony, and testify to his kingly authority, priestly office, and character as judge. We next enquire, who are the princes spoken of? In answering this, we will quote a part of the great redemption song, (Rev. xxii. 5,) as sung by the emancipated throng, "Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation, and hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth." How long? "And they shall reign for the ages of the ages!"—Diaglott. It will be seen by this glorious song that the redeemed of earth, the disciples of the Lamb, are to be kings and priests.

A prince is a prospective king, or is associated with a king in his reign, and subject to him as principal ruler. The reign of Christ and his cabinet is plainly taught, and show us that the apostles (Matt. xix. 28,) and the saints, (Dan. vii. 27) are to be invested with authority as associate rulers. The same kind of proof may be adduced from numerous other passages of Holy writ, e. g. Rev. ii. 25, 27; Psa. cx. 5, 6; Isa. xxxii. 1, and Rev. xx. 4. I might prolong this examination indefinitely, but will not at present; leaving it to the judgment of my readers to decide on the conclusions I have arrived at. I long for his reign to begin, when wars shall cease, and peace pervade the entire earth, and, in the language of the poet, can say:

"Haste the day, and speed the hour,
When, with awful pomp and power,
And with trumpet's rolling sound,
Christ shall come, in glory crowned!
Then shall Paradise appear;
Then shall beauty blest and cheer;
Voices ring o'er earth and main
Jesus reigns! He reigns!"

Will He Come Again?

BY REV. LYMAN ABBOTT.

The doctrine of the second coming of Christ has been so entangled with fruitless speculations, so veiled in mysticism, so held fanatically, that it has fallen into a ill-deserved repute. I propose in this paper to enquire, and partially to answer, the question, What does the New Testament, especially what does Christ himself teach about his second coming? I leave out of consideration altogether the horns, and beasts, and scarlet woman, and angels, and thousand years, etc., of Revelation, partly because I do not pretend to understand them, and partly because I prefer here not to enter into doubtful disputations, but simply to set in order before the readers of the Christian Union the plain teachings of the New Testament on this subject:

1. Christ will come again. In what guise, at what time, is a question to be further considered; but that at some time and in some guise is not a question. Christ's own teaching is full of this second coming. His kingdom is like a vineyard, whose owner let it out to husbandmen and went into a far country, and who will come again to call them to account for their treatment of his servants and his son. It is like a wedding feast, the virgins waiting through the long night for the coming of the bridegroom to his bride. It is like a man traveling into a far country, giving his servants each a portion of his goods, and "after a long time," returning to reckon with them what they have done. Read, even casually and carelessly, the teaching of Christ in Jerusalem during the Passion week, recorded most fully in Matt. xxi. to xxv., and judge for yourself whether the disciples were dull or stupid in believing, as they evidently all did, in a real re-appearing of their ascended Lord. Paul believed it, and spurred laggard Christians with the expectation. Peter believed it, and argued against skeptics that scoffed with the question, Where is the promise of his coming? John believed it, and inspired hope with the faith of the Lord's appearing. James believed it, and bid the oppressed to be patient till the Deliverer come in power and glory.

2. That coming will be open, public, manifest. It will be in such form that those who are without spiritual life and without spiritual perceptions, and accordingly are entirely oblivious of a purely spiritual presence, will see and recognize the coming of the Lord. "As the lightning cometh out of the east and shineth even unto the west, so shall the coming of the Son of Man be." He will come, "sitting on the right hand of power," "in the clouds of heaven," "with all his holy angels with him." As he ascended when a cloud received him out of the disciples sight, "so shall he come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." He shall descend from heaven with a shout with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God." There "shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth." "And the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every freeman shall hide themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains; and shall say to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb."

Symbolic language this? Certainly it is. We cannot conceive a trump that should be heard, or a heavenly vision of glory that should be seen on both sides of a round globe at once. The sun cannot well turn black, and the moon into blood at the same time, and be visible to all peoples at the same moment. But symbolical of what? Symbols teach something. And certainly the patent meaning of these symbols is this; that whereas Christ comes now, as it were, incognito, then will he be known and recognized of all men; whereas he now hides his divinity, then he will throw off the cloak that conceals it, and his divine nature will shine forth. Interpret these symbols as you will, or leave them, as I prefer to do; uninterpreted, still this much is clear: they mean such a second coming of the Lord as that his presence and power will be unmistakable, known and felt alike by friend and foe, by the seeing and by the blind, by the living and by the dead. If they do not mean this they are thoroughly and radically misleading.

3. When he comes again it will be to judge the world. He will sit on the throne of his glory, and before him will be gathered all nations, and he will separate them as a shepherd separateth the sheep from the goats. He tells us distinctly that he now comes not to judge; he tells us as distinctly that then he will come to execute judgment. In other words, that coming will be different not only in appearance, but also in purpose.

We do not see the whole of Christ's character now. We see only one phase of it. Glimpses of a different and a sterner aspect are afforded: In the majesty of his mein when, single-handed and alone, he expels the tradesmen from the temple; in the moral power which enables him to pass through the mobs at Nazareth and Jerusalem unharmed; in the breaking forth of his divinity, before which the soldiers that came to Gethsemane to arrest him fell backward to the ground. But these are only glimpses. It is this aspect of his character, now hidden, then manifested, which will shine forth when he comes to judge the people with his truth. It was this aspect of his character that was prominent when John saw him in the isle of Patmos, and his feet were like unto fine brass, and his voice like the sound of many waters, and out of his mouth went a sharp sword.

4. The time of his coming is absolutely unknown. No calculator can even approximately determine it. It is not known to man, nor to the angels, nor was it even known to Christ in his earthly estate. It is not for us to know the times or the seasons which the Father has put in his own power. So when he comes his coming will be unsuspected. He will come as the rain of fire and brimstone on Sodom and Gomorrah, as the deluge on the early race of men, as the thief in the night, as the bridegroom to the sleeping virgins. The apostles thought he would surely come in their lifetime. They were mistaken. The second Adventists have repeatedly fixed the year and even the day, and have egregiously blundered. In our common thought we postpone it to the remote future. We thus also fix a time. We thus also repeat their mistake. Of the day or the hour knoweth no man. "What I say unto you I say unto all, Watch."

5. Of course, I am not ignorant that some Christian scholars think these and other kindred passages of Scripture are fulfilled by the destruction of Jerusalem. Others think they are fulfilled by the gradual spiritual apprehension of Christ by the world, through faith. I enter here, however, into no argument. I wish to propound no theory. I simply undertake to set forth the fundamental truths respecting the second coming of Christ as taught by the simpler and less enigmatical teachings of the New Testament. It seems to me very clear that one who reads them without prejudice, and without a purpose to make them fit a previously adopted theory, can hardly doubt that they teach at least this much: that Christ will come again; in a public, manifest and undisguised manner; to judge, not to pardon and redeem; and at a time when his coming will be wholly unexpected by mankind. And to this interpretation a majority of the best, the latest, and the most independent Biblical scholars appear generally to agree.—Christian Union.

Christ Living in His People.

The man who is in Christ is sublimely independent of circumstances. His is a right royal state, unaffected by health or sickness, wealth or poverty. He may welcome all that comes to him with perfect equanimity; for whether it be rough or smooth, painful or pleasant, it is only a transient experience which no more disturbs his filial relationship to God than the changing seasons disturb the mountain whose summit is above the region of storms.

"I am persuaded," writes a man whose words are infallibly true, "that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor hight, nor depth, nor any other created thing, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." This persuasion, or settled assurance, being in-breathed by the Holy Spirit, is, of course, an everlasting fact, shining out in its own unchangeable splendor amidst and above the manifold changes of time. The love of God to his people is "in Christ," the force of the persuasion has a double element of strength which no conceivable occurrence can weaken.

Happy people! But this is not all. The Scripture also teaches that Christ lives in those who live in him; and this, though utterly mysterious to "them that are without," is nevertheless apprehended by the children of God as a truth of inestimable value. Thus Paul puts it, in one of those wonderful sentences which glance, upon a whole continent of revelation in a moment.

"I have been crucified with Christ; and it is no longer I that live, but Christ that liveth in me; yea, the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me."

Human nature lives in the person of Christ in heaven; the divine nature lives in Christians on earth. He has thus taken possession of both heaven and earth already, although the time has not yet come for all nations to know that he has been chosen of the Father to universal sovereignty. He is on the right hand of God, the head and representative of his people; they, on the earth, are the representatives of his life before the world. Virtually, they are in heaven where he is, for God sees them in him; virtually, he is on the earth where his people are, for men see him in them.

Going thus, so to speak, to the very heart of the Divine arrangement respecting the Son and the "many sons," we cannot fail to be struck with the extreme importance of practical Christianity, or in other words, a life of godliness. What is it? Formalism? Conformity to church rules? Habitual compliance with what is supposed to be required by a given creed? No; men in whom Christ does not live can do this; and they are respectable and in many ways worthy, people by whom the creed, or the church, or the form is fairly enough represented; but the representation is not that of Christ, and cannot be, for the simple reason that it springs not from his life in the heart, but takes its rise from something external, which has no life of any kind in it either divine or human. The voice of Scripture on this subject, as on all others of supreme interest to men, is transparently intelligent, commending itself to the understanding and the heart. It is just a thing of cause and effect. Here are illustrations: "He that saith he abideth in him ought also to walk, even as he walked." 1 John ii. 6. "Follow his steps." 1 Pet. ii. 21. "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus." Phil. ii. 5. "I have given you an example that ye should do as I have done to you." John xiii. 15. "Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye except ye abide in me. I am the vine, ye are the branches; he that abideth in me and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit, for apart from me ye can do nothing." Jno. xv. 4, 5.

It is needless to multiply passages. Conformity to Christ—Christliness—is living Christianity, and there is no possibility of securing this except by Christ living by his Spirit in men. The sacredness of this matter does not lift it above the common law of cause and effect. Indeed, the divine action towards men proceeds upon and illustrates this law. "We love him because he first loved us;" and "because I live ye shall live also;" are instances in point, to which the intelligent reader can add many more. Christ is the Life-giver; and the law of the case, as well as the grace of the case, requires those to whom he gives it to exemplify its genuine effects; in other words, to show that Christ lives in them, to the glory of the ever-blessed God, his Father and theirs. He was without sin, neither was guile found in his mouth; they are to be blameless and harmless, the sons of God, without rebuke in the midst of an ungodly world. —The Rainbow.

Fine Feathers at Church.

Harper's Bazar is certainly not very Puritanic on questions of dress. Perhaps the good people who are more under bondage to fine dressing than they suppose, will like to know its opinion on this subject of dressing for church.

The best bred people of every Christian country but our own, avoid all personal display when engaged in worship and prayers. Our churches, on the contrary, are made places for exhibitions of fine apparel and other costly and haunting compliances with fashion by those who boast of superior wealth and manners. We shall leave our gewgawed devotees to reconcile humiliation in worship with vanity in dress. This is a problem which we confess we have neither the right nor the capacity to solve.

How far fine clothes may effect the personal piety of the devotee, we do not pretend even to conjecture; but we have a decided opinion in regard to their influence upon the religion of others. The fact is, that our churches are so fluttering with birds of fine feathers that no sorry fowl will venture in. It is impossible for poverty in rags and patches, or even in decent but humble costume to take its seat, if it should be so fortunate as to find a place, by the side of wealth in brocade and broadcloth. The poor are so awed by the pretension of superior dress and "the proud man's contumely," that they naturally avoid too close a proximity to them.

The church being the only place on this side of the grave designed for the equal rich and poor to meet together in prostration before God, it certainly should always be kept free for this common humiliation and brotherhood. It is so in most of the churches in Europe, where the beggar in rags and wretchedness and the wealthiest and most eminent, whose appropriate sobriety of dress leaves them without mark of external distinction, kneel down together, equalized by a common humiliation before the only Supreme Being. The adoption of a more simple attire for church on the part of the rich in this country, would have the effect, certainly of not diminishing their own personal piety, but probably of increasing the disposition for religious observance on the part of the poor. —Selected.

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.

☞The Boston Investigator, an Infidel sheet, claims that there is no God and no future life for man. And yet it is refreshing to know that when it speaks of NATURE as the great first cause, it spells the word with a big N!

☞It is remarkable how old thoughts, clothed in the same words, will come back to us. An idea which has only lived in books will gain a place in the new forms of thought after centuries of forgetfulness. This point is well illustrated by Herbert Spencer. In writing about God and the future, he has adopted the words, THE UNKNOWN. His form of expression is not new. It was the exact phrase used by the ancient Greek philosophers. We even have an altar bearing this remarkable inscription: TO THE UNKNOWN GOD. It would seem that Mr. Spencer has just reached that period of philosophical mysteries where he can talk learnedly about things which to him are unknown and unknowable.

☞An intelligent correspondent wishes to know why such ordinances as feet-washing and the holy kiss are not kept up in the church. If the Bible taught that these customs were ordinances of the church, the question would be very difficult; but that is the very point where the trouble begins. The Bible nowhere recognizes them as ordinances. Feet-washing is a sanitary duty, and can be done at home much better than in a church. Even those who claim to practice the ordinance take good care to have clean feet before they attend church, which renders the subsequent acts of that kind unnecessary. So far as the holy kiss is concerned, its promiscuous practice in modern times would greatly embarrass the more sober and earnest Christians. Any effort, therefore, to cramp an ancient custom into a church institution would at once destroy its sacredness, and render formal that which otherwise will regulate itself. Men should show the same sober sense in matters of religion that they exhibit in every other sphere of life. Feet-washing and kisses of charity do not belong to the ceremonies of the church—neither can they be adopted as such, without destroying the objects for which they were practiced in ancient times.

The Former Things.

"For the former things are passed away." Rev. xxi. 4.

The thorn yet grows in the field. The seas are restless. Storms yet fill the air. Death holds the keys to the grave, and opens it for our dead. Famine stalks abroad at noon-day, while pain makes pallid the cheek. Wars rage on, fires consume, the frosts are biting, and desolation reigns over the earth. But is there no relief? Must sorrow linger still and forever? Is death to triumph? Will the sea have no rest? Beyond the tumult and the dying, beyond the pain and heartache, there arises in eternal brightness a land of beauty, glory and peace. "He that sat upon the throne said: Behold, I make all things new." The sea shall be no more! The briny surge gives place to the lighted landscapes of paradise. Death shall be no more! The graves yield up their dead. His dominions have been conquered by an Immortal King, who is the Resurrection and the Life. Pain shall be no more, the weeping ends at the gates of the city,—and the pure in heart behold the joys of a world redeemed. Thorns give way to myrtles, sorrows to rejoicings. The curse shall be no more. Blessed vision! The light now gleams in the valleys, and over the hills we behold the coming day of God. The great white throne, the jasper city, the river of life, the immortal tree, with its golden harvest, and the great multitude in robes of white and shining crowns; all these arise amid the realities of the world to come. When these are our inheritance, then shall it be forever true, "The former things are passed away."

The Oath Question.

A brother in Kansas desires to know how any disciple can take the oath as required by the homestead law, in order to get 160 acres of land, and yet claim to be not of this world. He also desires to know how any one claiming to be a Christian can vote or hold office under the present government or constitution of things.

So far as holding office is concerned, we find that Daniel, under the Babylonian kingdom, was promoted to the most important position by the king and then solicited certain honors or offices for his three Hebrew fellow-captives. There was nothing inconsistent with the faith of God in these promotions to places of honor. If a man desires a home in Kansas, and seeks the protection of the laws of the state, there certainly can be no wrong in his taking upon himself such duties or obligations as will bring him clearly under the state's jurisdiction. We know not what the particular form of the oath may be, but there can be no impropriety in one's taking some form of responsibility upon himself in view of the protection and benefits derived from "the powers that be which are ordained of God." Rom. xiii. No government, mild in form, requires a violation of conscience on the part of its religious subjects. When Daniel took upon himself the office of the third ruler, he must have passed through all the forms of inauguration common to the courts of kings. We do not apprehend that he did anything inconsistent with his convictions as a loyal heir to the kingdom of God. Neither can we see any impropriety in a brother's taking an office under the present order of things. But to assume the character of a political demagogue and make this world the end and aim of life will at once deprive him of that position known in the Word as an HEIR OF PROMISE. We have been thus frank in expressing our views on a subject where there seems to be some difference of opinion. But in no case would we trench upon another's conscience in matters of this sort.

Christmas.

With most persons, the word at the head of our article calls up the fondest associations. Childhood rejoices at the prospect of presents, and riper years in the anticipated renewal of long continued friendships, in the glad greetings, and cordial receptions, of this day of joy and welcome. Jesus loved and blessed the little children, and who, that has a parent's heart, would disappoint the longing expectations of those little silken-haired, rosy-faced cherubs, that prattle around the home hold hearth, and feel a delight in receiving their Christmas presents that enraptures little hearts that, alas, ere long will be filled with the bitter sorrows of human existence.

The roses of June have blended their incense breathing petals with the dust, the spring-time of buds, blossoms, and rich foliage, has vanished like Eden's days of bloom and beauty; the gold and crimson glories that deck the grand old forests during the second short and fleeting summer of the year, have fallen, and lie scattered in bleaching decay; still Christmas has its joyousness.

If the day comes mantled in clouds, it brings its benedictions. Though there is not the least evidence that Christmas is the true anniversary day of our Redeemer's birth, still we can rejoice, on this day, that a Redeemer has been born, and exult in the angelic announcement of the "good tidings of great joy to all people."

Truly "a Savior, which is Christ the Lord" has made his advent into our world. It is the memory of that glad day that fills the Christians heart with rapture. "Darkness had covered the earth, and gross darkness the people;" and, in the advent of the Babe of Bethlehem, we hail the birth of one destined to be the earth's deliverer. In that infant, cradled in the manger, was wrapt up the undeveloped energies that should one day achieve a complete and eternal victory over the powers of darkness. Those tiny hands were pre-ordained to unlock the grave, and wrest the sceptre from grim death himself.

The rich brought the heavenly stranger no presents; the skilled fingers embroidered for royalty, in precedency, above celestial thrones no soft, silken, gilded tapestry; the royalty and nobility of earth paid no homage to the One born to the rich heritage of an eternal dominion; but the hymnals of heaven were chanted at the nativity of the Son of God. The event wakened the music of the Morning Stars, and evoked the melodies of the choir that chanted over the glories of a new-born creation.

Let the children find their hearts pleasures in the day commemorative of the coming of the true child of destiny, who is, one glad day, to emancipate our world from the curse, and its inhabitants from tears, pain, and death.

We who are descending the last declivity of life's journey, as the flight of years brings us very near to the vestibula of that house prepared for all living, may look back with emotions of sorrow to those Christmas days, that memory links with the reminiscences of life's sweet spring-time, and sorrow that the hearts that loved us, and the hands that were placed in blessing on our childish heads, have gone to "dust and decay" of the grave; yet we may nevertheless, rejoice, that earth has a Saviour that will soon come, and bring our earth eternal gladness.—A happy Christmas to all the dear readers of the Restitution.

The Visions of God's Prophets.

I have also spoken by the prophets and I have multiplied visions, and used similitudes, by the ministery of the prophets.—Hosea xii. 10

There is perhaps more confusion on this subject than any other in the Bible. A misunderstanding of the visions of prophesy has led many to set the time of the Lord's return. But he did not come, and their blunders have emboldened scoffers, and tended to lull the watchers to sleep. Yet it is written in living lines, "The wise shall understand." But understand what? Answer, the very thing that the angel speaks of—the visions of prophecy, the only subject upon which the angel is speaking.

But this department of God's great Book was not then finished. The words were withheld—sealed up—till the time of the end. The words withheld from Daniel were given to John, and he filled up the Book of prophetic visions, and said, "It is finished. If any man add to these things, God shall add to him the plagues written in this Book."

These things must be studied in their connections, one with another. Leave one single link out of the golden chain, and confusion reigns, with misapplication, and we are left in the fog.

But now, if there is still enough interest left to make one more effort we will try, by God's help, to trace out the line. And we may profit by the mistakes which others have made; and here is one of them. It is to events, and not to dates, that Jesus directed the disciples to look, saying, "When ye see all these things come to pass, then lift up your heads" etc.; and not when ye have reached the end of certain days.

Here is another mistake: The Book of Prophecy was written for the servants of the household, and not a judgment message to the world. None of the wicked will understand it. Then why preach it to them. "As a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on all the earth." "But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief."

Again, "I, Jesus, have sent my messengers to testify unto you these things in the churches;" not to the world.

Again, "A resurrection of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him to point out to his servants the things that must shortly come to pass."

Here is his message—and the only one of this age—to the world: "Go ye, therefore, into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." This gospel of the kingdom must first be proclaimed in all the habitable world, for a witness to all the nations," etc. The "gospel of the kingdom," and not some special judgment message, belongs, of right, to the world.

When Moses first began the Book of Prophecy, four great Gentile kingdoms lay between the pilgrims and their home. Down through these the church was to wend her way to the kingdom of God. Down through these the chain of prophetic visions runs. This was looking ahead—a seeing the future. This is the uniform testimony of the prophets: "I saw, I looked, and lo! after these things I saw;" the veil of the future was lifted, and future events were seen, one of which I will here introduce:

"Verily I say unto you, There be some standing here which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom." Matt. xvi: 28.

"While he yet spake, behold, a bright cloud overshadowed them; and behold a voice out of the cloud, which said, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him." Matt. xvii: 5.

"And as they came down from the mountain, Jesus charged them, saying, Tell the vision to no man till the Son of man be risen again from the dead." Matt. xvii: 9.

This seeing of the Son of man coming in his kingdom was to be in the vision. The similitude of the vision was the white cloud, the covering of light. In the visions of prophecy this token appears again, just where we might expect. Bear in mind that it was to be a seeing of the Son of man coming in his kingdom, and then we can trace out the connecting link. Here it is:

"And I looked, and, behold a white cloud, and upon the cloud one sat like unto the Son of man, having on his head a golden crown, and in his hand a sharp sickle." Rev. xiv. 14.

This is the same personage and the same cloud seen by the three witnesses, Peter, James and John in the visions on the mountain. But this sure token of the cloud is but a part of the coming seen by the three witnesses. The other appearance of the vision connects elsewhere, and must be noticed in its proper place.

Dear brethren and sisters in Christ, I desire to place in your hands a pamphlet treating on these things, provided you have interest enough to cast in your mites to help pay the printer. I shall take up the visions of prophecy in their order,—Daniel's, Zechariah's, John's, and Ezekiel's, in their connections. I shall endeavor to show that they are inseparably connected, and that the things (scenes) of these visions are the things that the wise will understand, be that number small or great. But I am too poor in this world's goods to do anything more than write out the pamphlet at my own expense. If you want it, send on what you can, and if enough is but made up, your money shall be returned to you.

Yours, in the patience and waiting for the Christ.

Sign of the Coming of the Son of Man.

"Tell us what shall be the sign of the coming" Mat. 24:3.

Christ had evidently instructed his disciples in relation to the fact that he was about to be personally separated from them and also concerning the fact that he would come again; and it was upon this point that the disciples were particularly interested.

"And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven," Math. 24, 30.

The words "of the coming" require to be supplied in order to render it a complete answer to the above question; therefore I have supplied them, with a view to the better understanding of this subject on the part of the reader, who may never have considered the matter in this light.

It is a notable fact that Christ does not here, nor yet at any subsequent period give the least intimation as regards what shall constitute the "sign," which is not only to herald his second coming, but to indicate that it is nigh at hand.

In the first place as regards sign's,—Webster says—a sign is a token; something by which another thing is shown or represented: Any visible thing, appearance or event which indicates the existence, or approach of something else."

Signs may also be regarded as signals which are not only designed to give notice, but to impart information to whom-soever shall understand them. To this end signs are employed between man and man and also between God and man; yet they are of no practical value only so far as they are understood on the part of those to whom they are addressed or manifested.

Hence the necessity on the part of all who are looking for the return of Christ, that they should seek to know or obtain right conceptions as regards what is to constitute the sign of his coming, otherwise it might be duly witnessed without imparting any information or giving the least intimation as regards the notable event it is designed to portend or foreshadow.

In view of the great importance which attaches to this sign or rather to the subject to which it relates; are we to suppose for a moment that Christ has left his disciples without any possible clue, or means of understanding this matter? Nay verily.

In the first place it will be in order to notice the sign of, together with some of the circumstances relating to his first advent; which will afford, or lead us to some scriptural, and reasonable information as regards what will constitute his second coming.

Certain it is that reason, conjecture or speculations, outside, or separate and apart from inspiration or the "word of God," can ever solve this question:

Therefore we will read: "Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea, in the days of Herold the King behold, there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem. Saying where is he that is born King of the Jews; for we have seen his star in the east, and are come to worship him. Math. 2-1,2. It is further recorded that "Herold was troubled" and all Jerusalem with him." It appears that the advent of the "wise men" making such inquiry, and statements produced a great sensation in the Holy City, and among the notables of earth. The King consulted the Chief Priests and Scribs as to when Christ should be born; they tell him in Bethlehem of Judea; ascertaining thus this fact, he inquired diligently or very particularly of the wise men, as to what time the star appeared. "Then he sent them to Bethlehem. Thus were the wise men furnished the information they desired. "And when they had heard the King, they departed and lo the star which they saw in the east went before them, and, "when they saw the star they rejoiced with exceeding joy." Math. 2-12.

From the foregoing it appears that the sign in the providence of God, was the vision connects elsewhere, and temporarily withheld from the wise men, otherwise they would have had no occasion for making inquiries in Jerusalem. God however, had a design, a purpose to accomplish. He would thus notify Herod that the Jews had a King born unto them, and to the Jews that their long looked for Messiah had come, and furthermore but for this public announcement, a certain prophecy relating to his first coming could hardly have had a fulfillment.

"They rejoiced exceedingly," why? Because the reappearance of the star gave them renewed assurance as regards the birth of their long looked for King, or Massiah.

To this end the star was given as a sign, whereby they understanding the same might know the things which had come to pass, and that they might be the first to worship him, and also to provide him with the means necessary to the holy family, in view of the long journey they were about to take.

A practical question presents itself here; what scriptural authority (no other can be admitted) had the wise men for regarding the star, as the sign of the first advent of Christ?

We find the answer given by the prophet Balaam. There shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall rise out of Isreal, Numbers 24-17. The fact has already been noticed at length, that a star, (or a light bearing a resemblance thereto) whereby the fact of his first coming was made known to the wise men, and by them announced to the world.

That Balaam, in the chapter above noted is uttering important prophecies relating to Christ, and his several advents admits of no doubt; the whole of the verse out of which is taken the foregoing reads. "I shall see him, but not now. I shall behold him but not nigh: There shall come a star out of Jacob and a sceptre shall rise out of Isreal, and shall smite the comers of Noah, and destroy all the children of Seth. Again he says: "Out of Jacob shall come he, that shall have dominion, and shall destroy him that remaineth of the city." Certainly such prophetic language can have relation only to Christ.

In view of the foregoing and particularly of the fact, that a star, a literal and visable phenomenon was the sign which heralded the first advent of Christ, may we not both scripturally and reasonably conclude that a sceptre, an equally literal yet more conspicuous phenomenon placed in the heavens will as certainly and truly constitute the sign "of his coming" of the Son of man, the second advent of Christ.

Such at least is the writers firm conviction.

The sign, is spoken of as one among the several events that are to proceed his coming; for we read verse 33 same chapt: So likewise ye (to his decibles) when ye shall see all these things, know that it, (his coming) is nigh even at the door.

They were instructed to know this with the same assurance they have of the approach of summer; as shown by the parable of the fig-tree; when his branch is yet tender, and puteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh. So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near even at the door. 31,32. Therefore may we not well conclude that the people of God may and will have perfect understanding as regards this token whereby they may not only know that their redemption draweth nigh, but that it is "even at the door."

The sceptre is a sign or badge of royalty, an emblem of authority and power which will prominently appertain to the King of Kings and Lord of Lords.

Therefore when he shall be about to take upon himself this great power and authority; he will according to the scripture place the sign of his coming in the heavens; which will be as already noticed, a sceptre of such appearance and in such location, or positions that, as the earth revolves on its axis all of the inhabitants of the earth may behold it by day or by night.

A practical thought in this connection. This "wonder" or sign will be a token of good, and of power towards the willing and obedient, yea, and unto all who shall "love his appearing" inasmuch as to such it will testify that their deliverence is at hand.

It is recorded in Holy writ that on a certain occasion the King Ahasuerus held out the "golden sceptre" unto esther, betokining favor, whereby an immediate deliverance was wrought in behalf of the chosen, or peculiar people of God, who through the machinations of the "adversary" were near being (to all human appearance) involved in other destruction; which may be regarded as pre-figuring the possible if not probable condition of the church of God at the time when the sign shall appear, which shall make known unto it the fact of the near approach of their deliverance; when the saints of God will look up and rejoice, as did the "wise men" of old with "exceeding joy."

The Landmarks.

"Remove not the ancient landmark,—some render the landmark."—PROV. xxii. 28; Job xxiv. 2; Deut. xix. 14; xxvii. 17, Hos. v. 10.

The mere-stone, or stake, was the ancient boundary between neighbors. Our fences are our more secure substitute for land-marks as used in the early history of Israel.

This law, enforced by the Divine anathema, (Deut. xxvii. 17,) was needed to prevent fraud: as the land-mark was easily removed. The principle of it applies to the boundaries of kingdoms, and in the light of other equally plain and positive precepts it guards the revealed "times and seasons of the ages." The patriarchal times were prolonged through the "430 years" to the memorable night in Egypt, where Israel's bondage ended. Ex. xii. 40-42.

The law was added—"till the seed should come, to whom the promise was made"—the Messiah. Gal. iii. As nine-tenths of all the types, promises and prophecies, of Messiah's achievements, remain to be accomplished, they point still onward to his second coming and kingdom! "Not a jot or tittle shall pass till all be fulfilled." Matt. v. 17-19.

"The prophets searched—diligently—what, and what manner of time, the spirit of Christ, which was in them, did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow." 1 Pet. i. 10-13; Dan. vii. 25; viii. 12-19; ix. 24-27; Acts xvii. 31; Rev. xiii. 5; Dan. xii. 6-13. These references embrace "the times of the Gentiles—till He come—the King of kings—to judge the world in righteousness and the people with his truth." Psa. cxviii.; 1 Tim. vi. 15; Luke xxi. 24. These Scriptures "set the bounds of the peoples' and give the number of the kingdoms of men—till the Lord come" 1 Cor. iv. 5; Dan. iv. 17; ii. 31-45; vii. 13, 14.

A volume is needed to fill out the sum of "these times and bounds before appointed." Acts xvii. 26. But let this brief statement suffice to furnish the basis of the application of the grand and all-pervading truth taught by "the land-marks," that "the Lord hath set."

The application fairly made, ought to correct many misapprehensions as to ecclesiastical organization and Gospel ministry, and the reign of the saints. Please note—There is an order even for day and night, and the four seasons of the year. The clock, conforming to these land-marks in nature, cannot count out the high noon hours of day till the finger's point reach five. "The sower goes forth to sow" in seed time, in order to reap in "the time of harvest." All is distinctive.

In like regard to order, as the stones of Solomon's temple, were prepared in the mountains and then brought together and constructed without the sound of hammers, according to the pre-arranged plan; so under the Gospel "the living stones of the living antitypical temple, are still being so ready for the contemplated construction of the antitype—"the habitation of God through the Spirit."

Now, as no one would have his clock strike twelve at sun-rise as no one would sow his seed on the snow of winter; as no one would have had "the temple of the Lord" erected out of place and time on the mountains from which the stones were prepared; so no one should indulge the idle and erring notion that the Christian class, "now scattered over the earth, can be organized as "the body of Christ," in the absence of Him who is "the head!" He, at his coming, will raise those of his who "sleep in the dust of the earth! change those who are alive and remain;" and send a convoy of angels to the four winds of heaven to gather them. Matt. xxiv. 31; 1 Thess. iv. 13-18. Then, and not till then, will "they be (as) one, that the world may know" God's love to them; and their royal honors, as co-kings and priests, to reign with Christ 1,000 years; and thence on through "the age of ages," Dan. vii. 18; (forever, the age, and forever and ever,—the age of ages. Eph. ii. 7; iii. 21; Rev. xi. 15.

Till then the worthies of Heb. xi; from Abel to Abraham; and from the patriarchs to the apostles—with all the heirs of the blessed hope, under the Gospel—await the first or better resurrection—"the resurrection of the just."

Then, "the times of restitution,—the times of refreshing from his "presence," will be in order.

"Then the times of the Gentiles—this world; (age) and the work of the Gospel ministery; and the taking from the Gentiles, a people for his name and his bride, will end! This is God's land-mark! Then, "the world (age) to come," will come, and be subject to Christ and those "one in Him." Heb. ii. 5-8; Rev. xx. 3-7.

The tares grow with the wheat, till then. The apostasy abounds till then; every line of light from the prophetic word discloses "the subtlety of the serpent," in church and state till then! Hence, there is no hope of "the better thing," till then. Notions of church union and organization, and the kingdom, in ignorance of God's land-marks, are as seed "sown to the wind, to reap the whirlwind." Remember the land-marks.

J. B. COOK.

The Day.

"Ye see the day approaching."

Steadily, sternly, it marches on;
At each sun's setting a step i won;
At each sun's rising 'tis nearer yet,
We cannot its sure approach forget,
For the long procession is filing past,
And soon will it come, the great, the last.

We see it coming; our shrinking eyes
Are drawn to its splendor across the skies.
We fain would hide from its blinding glare,
Or hinder it by a sad, wild prayer;
But ever relentlessly on it comes
To our shadowed hearts and our darkened homes.

What thought we banish with mirth and song
The sound of its coming? It sweeps along.
It will not stay for our many fears;
It will not halt for our many prayers;
And every season of blessedness
Is making the distance ever less.

But why should we tremble and fear the day
Christ is in it, he comes this way.
Little of all the pompous show,
The gloom, the splendor, our eyes shall know.
For we shall see in the heaven above
The Friend we long for, the Lord we love.

Then let us sing, as we pass along,
A cheery measure, a hopeful song.
Better than all the times shall be
That glorious time when the King we see.
So let us watch, and wait, and pray,
For the approaching of that day.

Signs of Christ's Coming.

As the day commemorated for the first advent of the world's Redeemer occurs on the week of the issue of this number of the RESTITUTION, we have thought proper to select the following to attract the attention of our readers to the most important matter that can claim the attention of this generation. That Redeemer is about to make his second advent to our world. Unmistakable signs of the imminence of this grand event stand out in bold relief on the great political and moral canvas of the pictured history of nations as delineated by the pencil of prophecy. Let us watch and pray. S. A. C.

It was a very natural ques. on which the disciples addressed to our Lord, at the close of his ministry, when they asked him, "what shall be the sign of thy coming?" They took it for granted that an event of such startling solemnity, so fraught with momentous interests both to the church and to the world, would not be permitted to take place without some notes of warning given to prepare men for it. And this was certainly a very reasonable expectation on their part. It was founded on a knowledge of God's ordinary dealing with his people, as the same may be observed both in the working of nature and the records of history. Nature in her operations, always gives significant and intelligible signs before her great and important events takes place.

Before the sun rises in the morning, there are tints of purple and gold spread out along the eastern horizon, sure harbingers of coming day. Before the sun sets at night and leaves the world in darkness, the mountains, the hills, the trees, the houses we inhabit, all the objects around us, and even our own bodies as we move from place to place, cast their lengthening shadows across our path; and what are these darkening shades but silent yet eloquent reminders of the speedy coming on of night? "Behold the fig-tree, and all the trees," said our blessed Lord; "when they now shoot forth, ye see and know of your own selves that summer is now nigh at hand." The changing foliage and the falling leaves of autumn are the natural signs, understood by all, that winter is coming. Before the storm bursts in its fury, the towering clouds that gather in the sky, and the thunder that mutters hoarsely in the distance, are nature's signs of the advent of the storm. And even when these visible indications are not granted, atmospheric changes take place, and these, though the eye may take no direct cognizance of them, yet, as they make their impression on the barometer, sending down the mercury in its truth-telling tube, are understood at once by the wary mariner, as the signs by which the storm-king, in marching on his way, gives telegraphic tidings of his coming.

And history unites with nature in furnishing illustrations of the same feature, as marking God's dealings with the children of men. Before the waters of the deluge were allowed to sweep in desolation round the globe, Noah was sent, as a preacher of righteousness, to warn the world of the coming flood. And as he preached on the Sabbath, and wrought patiently on the ark during the working days of the week, both his preaching and working were signs to the men of that generation of the coming of vengeance.

Before the plague of hail was let loose on Egypt, timely warning was given of its approach, and even the command issued to the Egyptians to shelter their servants and their cattle from its violence. And the sacred historian adds, "And he that regarded the word of the Lord, among the servants of Pharaoh, made his servants and his cattle flee into houses. But he that regarded not the word of the Lord, left his servants and his cattle in the field. And the hail smote throughout all the land of Egypt, all that was in the field both man and beast." In the same way, before the Passover-Angel took his flight in silent, solemn, fearful judgment over the land, breathing death in the face of all the first-born of Egypt, due warning was given of his approach, and gracious intimations afforded, by attention to which the stroke of his fatal sword might be warded off.

And every one remembers how striking an illustration of this same kind was afforded in the case of Jerusalem's overthrow. Fifty years before the awful scenes connected with that sad catastrophe transpired, Jesus gave his people a sign by which they might know that the threatened calamity was at hand, and so escape before it came. He said, "When ye shall see Jerusalem [illegible] with armies, then know [illegible] desolation thereof is nigh [illegible] them that are in Judea flee to the mountains." Luke xxi. 20-21. The Christians in Jerusalem, before its overthrow, watched for this sign, and acted upon it. When Titus was about to invest Jerusalem, a division of his army encamped around the city for a short time, and then suddenly and unexpectedly withdrew for a season. This furnished the followers of Jesus, then, with the sign of which he had spoken. It also gave them the opportunity of profiting by it. They were not slack to do this; and, when the final, fatal siege of Jerusalem began, it is said that there were no Christians left among its inhabitants.

And what is the legitimate inference to draw from this hasty glance at nature and at history? Clearly, that it is an established principle of the divine government, in dealing with men, to give significant indications, or warning signs, before the approach of any important event. And if this is true in regard to events of minor importance, much more may we expect to find the principle hold in reference to events of very great importance. But the return of Christ to our earth, all will admit, is an event transcending in importance anything that has yet occurred in connection with it. The day on which that coming will take place may well be spoken of as, "The great day for which all other days were made."

It is the most reasonable and natural of all things, then, to expect that the coming of an event so unspeakably solemn, and important, in its character, would be indicated by signs so distinct, intelligible, and palpable in nature, as to admit of no doubt, querulosity or mistake on the part of those who are earnestly and carefully looking for the coming of the Son of Man. The question is, Did Jesus give his people any such signs? and if so, what are they?—R. N. in Prophetic Times.

Fraternal Words from Brother Magruder.

DEAR BRETHREN:

Give me room to express through your columns the satisfaction with which I have read the late manly, clear and appropriate defense by our brother, J. F. Willcox, of the upright, moral character of the patriarch Lot, that "just" man, "whose righteous soul was vexed" at the enormities of his debased countrymen, and who, as Bro. Willcox showed conclusively, was not guilty of intentional wrong in the transaction, in respect to which he was arraigned. May we not agree with the Holy Spirit to Peter, and presume not to call "that common or unclean which God hath cleansed"? Acts x.

I admire, too, Bro. Stephenson's pointed protest against any complicity or responsibility of the Living Oracles for any short-comings or derelictions of any man "whose breath is in his nostrils;" and I venture to add that I hail with pleasure the editorial announcement that perhaps we have had enough of the side issues and debates of matters external to the faith that saves us. "To the law and to the testimony" is still a wholesome admonition to which we do well to take heed, leaving matters of speculative opinion to the fuller light, and more copious developments of the great future, just before us.

May I be excused for availing myself of the opportunity here afforded of acknowledging the kindly, fraternal good wishes of the RESTITUTION, and of other dear brethren for the success of my efforts to aid in building up the blessed cause of truth, righteousness and salvation in my new location in Winchester, VA. Among these I venture to mention, with especial gratification, the personal visit and co-operation of our earnest and faithful aged brother, Newell Bond of North Carolina, long to be remembered with pleasure and profit.

I am happy to think that with the faithful and efficient co-operation of Bro. N. J. Morgan and friends in this vicinity, we have succeeded beyond expectation in awakening and securing the attention of intelligent persons here, of good and honest hearts to the obvious mistakes and illusions of this polytheistic age, and that we are enabled to rejoice in some fruit of our joint labors in the willing submission of some few, already, to the authority of the great King, whose speedy coming, in great power and glory, will show, "in his time, who is the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings and Lord of lords who only hath immortality," etc.

We have recently been made to rejoice by the voluntary obedience to the claims of truth, by four, both men and women, in the liquid grave of baptism, one of whom traveled hither from the state of Maryland for the express purpose, and the three others from the interior of this county, where we had been holding meetings. It was gladdening to see them afterwards, like the Ethiopian treasurer, "going on their way rejoicing" in the conscious and happy possession of the pearl of great price—that their names had been written in the Lamb's Book of life. Being well instructed in "the truth as it is in Jesus," we may confidently indulge the hope and offer the earnest prayer that they may never be "blotted out."

Faithfully and fraternally, in the hope of the gospel.

ALLAN B. MAGRUDER.

Rolla Floyd of Syria.

The following appears in a secular paper as an extract from the Damascus correspondence of the American Traveler. The one to whom it refers having been numbered among our subscribers for a few years past, we are pleased to receive so good a report of him and of his companion:

"Then he'll do it," exclaimed the man to whom I had said that we had engaged Rolla Floyd to accompany us from Damascus to Jaffa. "You have been fortunate in securing that mysterious man. His name is worth a hundred rifles against any tribe in Syria."

Floyd was one of a colony of Americans who left the pine forests of Maine, in the United States, some ten or a dozen years ago, to settle in the Holy Land, to be there ready to greet the blessed Redeemer at his second coming. But dissensions, most bitter and irreconcilable, arose among them at Jaffa; they were looked upon with hate and suspicion by Jews, Arabs and Mohammedans; their crops were stolen as fast as they ripened, and many of the men falling out with work took to drink. They lost their lands bordering on the plains of Sharon, near Jaffa, by a fine point of Turkish law, and through the combined effects of death, ill luck and licentiousness, the members became mad, drunk, and reckless, and all that devoted, praying band, every member of which, when leaving America, was justly famed for piety, faith and virtue, there only remains in Palestine, so far as I could ascertain, Rolla Floyd and his worthy and amiable wife.

These two unwavering Christians remained true to Christ and true to themselves. Mrs. Floyd made friends among the natives, by her needle, her medicines and her patient tenderness with all who were afflicted, while Mr. Floyd started the pioneer express of Syria by carrying letters and packages between Jaffa and Jerusalem, on week days, and preaching the Word of God, without money and without price, on Sunday.

His fine athletic form and his wonderful strength, coupled with his invariable kindness of heart and mild temper, soon made a marked sensation among the natives; finding them in a personal quarrel and rolling in the dust like fierce mastiffs, he frequently rushed into the crowd and grasping the two combatants by the napes of their necks—one in each hand—slowly walked down to the sandy shores of the Mediterranean, and soused them into the briny surf until promises of peace and reconciliation were given. Frequent attempts were made to rob his express of valuable packages, but he always managed to capture one or both of the bandits, and compelling them to listen to an impressive sermon on honesty, he always let them off on promising reformation. By this kindness in not turning his prisoners over to Turkish vengeance, and his entire fearlessness, he became as great an idol among the desperate thieves and cut-throats as he was among the most upright.

With a memory that seems without limit, he soon became entire master of the Arabic, so that he speaks it with an accurate fluency, acquired by but a few not born on the desert. In his familiarity with the Bible he surpasses all men I have ever seen, quoting from memory almost any verse that may be called for between Genesis and Revelation. Those who have known him for years say they never saw him display anger, surprise or boisterous mirth. Traveling as a missionary, over all of Palestine, and becoming familiar with every lake, hill, valley, stream and mountain mentioned in the Bible, he is the best informed in Biblical history and topography of any man living. The American government has twice offered him a consulship; but his reply has been, "I shall make less money, but do more work among the poor children of God by remaining in the field."

Once every month he appears in Jerusalem, and takes his seat in the east, as the W. M. of the Royal Solomon Mother Lodge, F. & A. M., which position he has long held by the unanimous votes of all the members."—Mississippi Herald.

Sectarianism Yet Lives.

How unlovely is sectarian spirit, under whatever disguise it may present itself! and especially when it takes on the garb of ecclesiastical authority. In this country we only smile at the assumption, on the part of a religious organization, neither more intelligent nor more Christlike than its neighbors, of a right to call itself "the church," and to brand other churches as schismatic. But in England this assumption, while it is not less amusing, is more troublesome on account of the connection with the state of the church setting up such a claim, and the power of annoyance thus acquired. We read in an English paper of a Vicar who, as "a successor of the apostles, has felt it necessary to denounce dissenters, to deny the validity of their ministry, and to visit some of them on their sick beds and urge them to receive the sacraments of the only true church, a the hands of the regularly-appointed clergy, or, on pain of refusal, to suffer the divine displeasure and endanger their hopes of heaven." In the same paper our attention is called to an exposition in an Episcopal paper by another Vicar, of the "church proverb," "Where God has his church, the devil will have his chapel." In the course of his exposition the writer says:

"For some men it would be Satan's policy to put a gin palace near the church gates, and for other men a gambling house, and for others a casino. But his master-stroke of policy is to put something as like to a church as what are called tares, and what are really a wild sort of wheat, were like good wheat. Satan comes most dangerously when he comes in the garb of an angel of light. 'If you must needs worship, (and I really se no reason why you should not), then turn aside into this snug chapel of mine, and be comfortable and easy—do.' This is what Satan says to the young man with a tittered conscience, or the young woman with a desire for church privileges. No matter to Satan how he gets hold and keeps hold, so long as he lends captive at his will. He can put up chapels of his own quite as fast as churches are set up for him to oppose and be troubled by. He can appear as fair as an angel and as holy as a saint when it suits his purpose."

Here Episcopal houses of worship are assumed to be of God's appointment, while the chapels of the dissenters are described as agencies of Satan for ruining souls! Is it to be wondered at that honest men are easily made infidels by such a spirit? Does not such bigotry tend to reconcile many men to the tendency of science to overturn churches and their ministers?—Christian Union.

The British Purchase of the Suez Canal.

Mr. Disraeli has achieved a decided sensation. He has bought, or has virtually secured, the Suez canal, with the secrecy if not the sharpness of a Jew merchant, and all the world is wondering at the motives which have controlled the operations. The London Times admits that "the advantage of the bargain materially is a secondary question," and that the purchase was made for political purposes." It would seem, therefore, that something more was thought of than getting control of the nearest route to India, although that was no doubt taken into the account.

British India is now an immense empire, comprising about 240,000,000 of inhabitants, with resources of indefinite development. In this vast aggregate of native races are scattered some 110,000 Europeans and Americans. It is evident, therefore, that the little group of British rulers and traders in India may need to be reinforced at any moment of danger, with the utmost promptitude, and with the slightest possible risk of interruption. Hence the desirability of controlling the Suez canal.

The principal direction of speculation over this movement, however, is toward Turkey. For the last quarter of a century the impression has been taking shape, though with great fluctuations, yet all the while gaining ground, that Turkish rule in Europe is doomed. The "sick man" is, according to the popular phrase, "getting no better very fast," and the British government not improbably anticipates the day when Russia will come down and take possession of the long-coveted Constantinople, and Austria will extend her borders by annexing a liberal slice of Turkish territory. England wants none of the provinces of Turkey, but in the day of partition she wants a commanding position in the neighborhood, which will secure the right she deems important, and will make her voice potential in the reconstruction of the map of Europe. Besides, she is a great owner of Turkish bonds, and the time may come when she will think it advisable to foreclose her in srigage by taking possession of Egypt. The English organ above referred to regards the acquisition of such an interest in the Suez canal will [illegible] by lead [illegible] British government [illegible] ople to "concern themselves [illegible] ually with Egypt;" and those who have remarked the history of such movements in the past know what the end is likely to be.—Boston Journal.

A Child's Paper at Last!

I have decided to issue a paper for our children. There has been some demand and a good deal of talking and writing in relation to it, but hitherto no action. Pledges have been demanded and some given as a guaranty to the issue of the paper, but the scheme fell through, and of course the pledges forfeited.

Now I propose to issue a paper for the little ones monthly, [illegible] with the new year, Jan., 1876, at 50 cents single subscription, and rely on the promise need which every parent among us feels for a paper to put into the hands of his own and his neighbors children, which will not lead them into the monstrous falsehoods now so prevalent to make it a success.

The first number will be issued early in December and a copy will be sent to every subscriber for the Messenger. This will give all a chance to see the paper before subscribing.

I ask no pledges in advance but shall try to issue a paper well worth the money asked for it and rely on the merits of the paper itself.

But to succeed I must have a list of two thousand subscribers. This number can be obtained if all who are interested in the truths we advocate take hold at once and push it. A day or two spent by our young friends in canvassing for it after the first copy is here d, will soon roll up the desired number of names.

It will be published at the RESTITUTION office, Plymouth, Ind., under the auspices of the Christian Publishing Association; but all communications for the paper, and all subscriptions must be sent for the present to my address, Fort Atkinson, Jefferson Co., Wis.

The size of the paper will be about 12x16 inches folio, or 4 pages, and will be illustrated and pieces of music interspersed, as often as I can afford it. If the response is liberal and prompt, the paper will either be enlarged or the price reduced the second year.

For the present, however, it will be sent at the following rates:

Single copy, 50 cents a year; and at the same rate for any number of copies under ten.

Ten copies, and any larger number under fifty, when sent to one address, 45 cents.

Fifty copies, and any number over fifty, when sent to one address, 40 cents.

To Canada subscribers at the same rate.

Contributions for its columns are solicited from all of our friends old and young. Bible questions, puzzles, enigmas, odds and ends, anecdotes, etc., all will be welcome. Let us all try to make it a spicy, entertaining, instructive and welcome visitor to our young folks every where.

BUSINESS DEPARTMENT.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

To the Michigan Brethren:

It will be impossible for me to begin work in your state until after New Year's. Duties connected with my business, my family, and the child's paper, utterly prevent. The River of Time.

Roll on, thou mighty river,
Roll onward to the sea,
The ocean of forever—
Immense eternity.

Thou bearest on thy bosom
All things that live and die;
The hopes that bud and blossom,
And all too soon must fly.

The cares of kings and nations,
The woes that war imparts;
The hidden desolations
Of broken homes and hearts.

The joy, the fear, the trouble,
The envy, love, and strife,
That color this vain bubble
That mortal men call life.

Roll on, thou mighty river;
Relentless in thy course;
For none can stem thy current,
Nor aught oppose thy force.

Roll on, thou mighty river;
At last thy fate will be
To close thyself forever
In that eternity.

MARION BERNSTEIN.

Fierce Opposition to Christ at his Second Coming.

BY D. PITCAIRN.

"Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing? The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against the Lord, and against his anointed, saying, Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us. He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh: the Lord shall have them in derision. Then shall he speak unto them in his wrath, and vex them in his sore displeasure." —Psa. ii. 1-5.

There is, however, a memorable prediction of Gog and Magog by Ezekiel, which claims a passing notice, and furnishes a fresh proof of that grand confederation of kings and peoples against Jehovah and against his Anointed, in the latter days, which, as we have seen, form the burden of so many other prophecies.

Ezekiel was one of those influential persons who were carried captive along with Jehoiachin, the king of Judah, when the servants of Nebuchadnezzar came against Jerusalem for the first time. It is supposed he was about twenty-five years old, and in the fifth year of his captivity, when in the land of Chaldea, by the river Chebar, he was favored with a glorious vision. (See Ezek. i.) "The hand of the Lord was upon him." He received the gift of prophecy, which he continued to exercise for upwards of twenty years. Thus his prophecies embrace a most eventful period of Jewish history. Whilst Judea had already become tributary to Nebuchadnezzer, and her king was now a mere vassal, Ezekiel not only warned his countrymen of the impending judgment which within a very few years terminated in the siege and destruction of Jerusalem, and in the captivity of Zedekiah the king, with the remaining princes and nobles; but in reproving them for their obstinate disregard of every warning, and in exhorting them still to seek the Lord in the way of repentance, he also spake comforting things respecting the restoration. As a further encouragement, he predicted the sweeping calamities in which all their enemies and oppressors should be involved. But as it is evident that the restoration which Ezekiel predicts in chap. xxxvii., is of a very different character from that which was experienced after the expiration of the Babylonish captivity, and has never yet been accomplished; so the prophecy of Gog and Magog, which stands in immediate connection with the still future restoration of "the whole house of Israel," must be viewed as descriptive of new enemies who will not be confederated, and of new events which will not be developed, until these promises of the Lord God shall have been fulfilled. "Behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land. And I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one king shall be king to them all: and they shall be no more two nations." "And they shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob my servant, wherein your fathers have dwelt; and they shall dwell therein, they, and their children, and their children's children forever; and my servant David shall be their prince forever."

From these few leading particulars which we have selected from the latter part of the chapter, there is reason to conclude that the prosperity which was [illegible]l, when all the tribes of Israel united in anointing David to be their king, is typically illustrative of that greater prosperity which is here prophetically depicted, when the long divided houses of Judah and of Ephraim shall again be reunited as one nation and one kingdom, and when one prince shall be for ever over them, whom God reveals by name as "David my servant." Now, as it was without doubt the rapid prosperity of the Israelites under the reign of the literal David that caused the heathen to rage, and their kings to combine, and their rulers to take counsel together against Jehovah and his Anointed, so we may believe that, when the Lord in mercy remembers the outcasts of Judah and the dispersed of Israel, and miraculously interposes for their deliverance and restoration, the envy and hatred of earthly potentates will be raised against them. After having been brought forth out of the nations, it is said, "And they shall dwell safely all of them." This is their happy condition, when it is predicted of Gog and all his mighty army, "Thou shalt ascend and come like a storm: thou shalt be like a cloud to cover the land, thou, and all thy bands, and many people with thee." (chap. xxxviii. 9.)

The whole prophecy contained in chaps. xxxviii. and xxxix. most strikingly describes, on the one hand, the safety and security of God's chosen Israel, blessed as they are now supposed to be under the reign of the David who never die, and having the tabernacle of God set in the midst of them forever more; and, on the other hand, the vastness of the preparations made, and of the multitudes congregated, under the headship of Gog, with a determination to effect the utter extinction of that people whom God has so signally blessed, and again to dispossess them of that land, of which God said to Abraham of old, "I have given it to thee and thy seed for an everlasting inheritance." But he who sits in the heaven shall laugh at this last and greatest of all confederacies, as he has done at all others which have preceded it. The Lord shall hold in derision Gog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal, and all the princes and peoples who are assembled around him. Then shall he speak to them in his wrath, and vex them in his sore displeasure. "And it shall come to pass, at the same time, when Gog shall come up against the land of Israel, saith the Lord God, that my fury shall come up in my face." "And I will call for a sword against him throughout all my mountains, saith the Lord God; every man's sword shall be against his brother." "Thus will I magnify myself, and sanctify myself; and I will be known in the eyes of many nations, and they shall know that I am the Lord."

The period at which this fierce assault, and this overwhelming discomfiture will take place, it is said to be "in the latter days;"—corresponding with the declarations of other prophets. And the place is even more expressly revealed than the period,—"the mountains of Israel." On this point the opinions prevalent among Christians in general are erroneous. Because Christianity has at present its chief seat and stronghold in those countries of Europe which are called Christendom, we are apt to look with too exclusive an eye to those countries as furnishing the grand theater for the fulfillment of prophecy; and to attach an almost exclusive importance to transactions within the Christian churches as the very sum and substance of prophetic Scripture, so far as unfulfilled. But, whether we examine the pages of Isaiah, or Zephaniah, or Joel, or Zechariah, or Ezekiel, or any of the prophets, we are constantly taught one and the same truth, that it is not in European Christendom, but in that portion of Asiatic Syria which heretofore has been signalized by so many wondrous scenes and occurrences, that this mighty effort shall be made against Jehovah and his Christ, and his people. Palestine shall be the battle field. The mountains of Israel are to witness the overthrow of Gog and all his confederate bands. It is there that God is to give him "a place of graves," which shall henceforward be called "the valley of Hamon-Gog." Even among those who are expecting a personal antichrist to arise, it may be that their expectation are in many respects erroneous, because they do not sufficiently connect the time and the purpose of his manifestation, as well as the place and the manner of his destruction, with the state and condition of the Jews. And perhaps nothing has tended to obscure the literal language of prophecy, and to encourage a system of spiritual or figurative interpretation, than the desire which has so long and so extensively prevailed to explain the Apocalypse of St. John as if it were a prophetical history of the Christian church, from the ascension of our Lord until he comes again. According to this mode of interpretation, the Jews have neither part nor lot among the persons and events that are symbolically presented to us by the enraptured Apostle, although the symbolical language in which he describes these persons and events is so exclusively of a Jewish character. Every term and expression which wears a Jewish aspect is tortured into a Christian signification; and Christendom is made the site and scene of all the later and more important parts of the prophecy, especially those which are thought to describe the antichrist.

This method of interpretation is unsatisfactory. For, ever since the call of Abraham, with whom God was pleased to establish his covenant, and in whose seed it was promised that all the earth should finally be blessed, the history of the Christian church as an election out from the world, and the history of the world itself, so far, at least, as detailed in prophetic Scripture, is closely bound up with the destinies of his chosen people. The Old Testament prophecies, of which so large a proportion remain unfulfilled, make oft-repeated allusions to the Gentile nations, in the way both of threatened judgments and of promised mercies. But it is undeniable that they are chiefly occupied with the concerns of that singular people, who, from their first beginnings down even to the present times, have so strangely been separated from all others. And I do feel thoroughly persuaded that without an acknowledgment of the decided pre-eminence which is assigned in prophecy to Israel, still beloved for their father's sakes; and without, at the same time, a careful attention to the movements of Providence in reference to them, we are not likely to attain, from a study of the prophetic word, a scriptural understanding of God's plans and purposes in regard to the Christian church or to the world at large.

Subject of Prayer.

Prayer to Almighty God is one of the most interesting, solemn, and exalted exercises which fall to the lot of mortal man; though considered by many a simple matter, its nature and use are much misunderstood. Being the most frequent act of worship among Christians, its proper employment should be thoroughly known.

From the prevalence of prayer, in connection with all religions and among all people, it may be presumed that it is a tendency or impulse arising from a source of need and belief in a supernatural power. Prayer implies want, and is an expression of that want to one who we are persuaded, has the ability to give relief.

In the commencement of the history of prayer, we have no direct statement of God's willingness to listen to the voice of supplication, but the confidence with which the first recorded prayers appear to have been offered, (Gen. iv. 26) suggests that communications had been made to man upon the subject; the answers to those prayers testify that they had the divine sanction (Gen. xx. 17).

But in the progress of revelation, we find the Scriptures abound with encouragement to address Jehovah for all needful mercies, until no room for reasonable doubt remains that it is the ordinance of God that He should "be enquired of" by his children, that He may bless them; more particularly do the Psalms breathe these thoughts, in such sentences, as "This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles: The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, and his ears are open unto their cry: The righteous cry, and the Lord heareth" (xxxiv. 6, 15, 17). "Call upon me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee" (l. 15). "Verily God hath heard me; he hath attended to the voice of my prayer" (lvi. 10). And we sometimes sing, "O thou that hearest prayer" (lxv. 2).

But the strongest proof of the readiness of the Deity to listen to prayer, is seen in the fact that Jesus, the Son in whom He delighted, teaches and commands us to pray, and was himself the greatest example of a prayerful man; in view of this, we cannot doubt that prayer is a divinely appointed means of obtaining blessings, which it is the good pleasure of our Heavenly Father to bestow. Such being the case, can we imagine that God inspires hope only to disappoint it,—that He bids us make our requests known unto Him without any intention of regarding them,—that He raises a vain expectation in our breasts?—No. He desires to satisfy our longing hearts.

If all this be true, the inquiry arises, how is it that, apparently, very few prayers are answered? Myriad petitions are uttered with little or no effect; the men, who, like Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; Moses, Joshua, Manoah, Samson, David, Hezekiah, and Elijah, could point to special facts, as the results of addressing God, are rare indeed. The difficulty will be removed, if we consider one or two things which should always be kept in mind. Numbers, it is to be feared, pray, who have no right to that privilege; others pray, but have not, because they ask amiss, while much prayer is offered which is not according to the will of God, and cannot therefor receive a response.

The questions, "Who should pray, How should we pray, and What should we pray for? are of the utmost moment. For instruction, let us appeal "to the law and to the testimony."

1. Then, who should pray? Does God hear the prayers of all men? Certainly not. "The Lord is nigh unto all them that call upon Him, to all that call upon Him in truth" (Psa. cxlv. 18). "He that turneth away his ear from hearing the law, even his prayer shall be abomination" (Prov. xxviii. 9). "The Lord is far from the wicked; but He heareth the prayer of the righteous" (xv. 29). "If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me" (Psa. lxvi. 18). From these passages, it is evident that "God heareth not sinners;" the correctness of this conclusion is borne out by the dealings of the Almighty with Israel, in their backslidings. By Isaiah, he declared, in consequence of their transgressions, "When ye spread forth your hands, I will hide mine eyes from you; yea, when ye make many prayers, I will not hear; your hands are full of blood" (i. 15). By Jehovah, he said, "Though they shall cry unto me, I will not hearken unto them;" (xi. 11) and the prophet himself is addressed in these solemn words, "Pray not thou for this people, neither lift up cry, nor prayer for them, neither make intercession to me; for I will not hear thee. Seest thou not what they do" (vii. 16, 17). This was the manner of Jehovah's dealing with the house of Israel, and can we suppose that He has changed his mode of procedure? No,—we believe that they do not submit to his laws, are not heard when they pray; and we remember that Jesus said to his disciples, "If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you." John, also writes, "Whatsoever we ask, we receive of Him, because we keep his commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in his sight." Thus we are taught that persons who have the privilege of seeking favors from God, are those who obey his precepts. Such are exhorted to "pray without ceasing," in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving," to let their requests be made known unto their Heavenly Father, to "pray everywhere," and "for all men."

What an honor to be allowed to speak to God! Can we lay claim to that honor? If so, how distinguished our position; we have power with the Highest Power, we have an influence of the greatest importance. Shall we treat it as valueless, by leaving it unemployed? What may not be accomplished by its exercise! In no other way can such incalculable benefits be secured. If we pray for doors of utterance to be opened to the preachers of the Gospel, the result may be the conversion of many who otherwise would not be saved; if we pray for our fellow-saints, they may increase in blessings both spiritual and temporal; and if we pray "Thy kingdom come," that happy day may be hastened, and the world's travail cease; all this, and much more may be hindered if we neglect to pray. Would that with the same solicitude for each other's welfare, that Samuel manifested on behalf of the rebellious Israelites, we could each take up the language of the ancient seer, "As for me, God forbid that I should sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for you" (1 Sam. xii. 23). Surely, the sweet incense should constantly ascend from our hearts to the heavens.

Dear friends, there can be no consistency either between prayerlessness, or want of warmth in our prayers and Bible-teaching; he who has the right spirit, will have strong desires, which he will constantly be expressing to God; out of the abundance of his heart he will speak, and in proportion as he drinks in "the rejoicing" of the Christian hope does he become more and more earnest in his supplications, not only that he himself may obtain grace to help in every time of need, but that others also may be "partakers of the benefit." The public prayers of the brethren will not fully satisfy such a man; but, like the Master, he will retire at times from the presence of all, and be alone with God.

Not by a sense of duty only should we be actuated, for they who pray simply from a conviction of duty, are at a low ebb of spiritual life. Strong desire to hold communion with the Father of mercies is an indication by which we may estimate our love and appreciation of that faith which we profess. Those, therefore, who profess to know the truth and are not prayerful, have yet to learn the lessons which induced the Twelve to say, "we will give ourselves continually to prayer, and to the ministry of the word." The apostles did not make prayer as a secondary or incidental matter, but prayed "always with all prayer and supplication in the spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance."

2. Let us consider farther—How we should pray. The practice of praying, people generally seems to pray in any way; so long as you do pray, the mode is of no consequence. The sons of God, however, prove their sonship by being led of the Spirit, and the Spirit leads by the Word. There is a striking contrast between those to whom we have just referred, and the mind of men who said to the Lord, "teach us to pray, as John also taught his disciples." The Scriptures furnish ample instruction for our guidance in this particular, instruction intended to be followed.

Jesus said, "after this manner pray ye," and gave a brief form of prayer. The sentences of which it is composed, are eminently concise; the language is suitable to address Him who knows what we have need of before we ask Him. There are no vain repetitions, no attempts at oratory; it breathes the spirit of the exhortation, "Be not rash with thy mouth," * * * "let thy words be few" (Eccl. v. 2).

We may note that the style of this prayer is not exceptional, but characteristic of the prayers found in the sacred writings; they are all remarkable for an absence of "much speaking." We are taught to approach God in our relationship as children, and to say, "Our Father." The things concerning the Future Age are the first subjects of request; after these, we may ask the supply of our daily wants, the forgiveness of our trespasses, direction and deliverance from evil. Can we lose sight of the Savior's words, "after this manner pray ye."

Jesus subsequently enjoined his disciples to offer their petitions in his name, saying, "whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, He will give it you" (John xvi. 23). In all our prayers, therefore, we shall plead the name of Jesus, relying on his own assurance of acceptance through Him.

A certain amount of faith is necessary to render our supplications effectual. We are to be "without doubting," since "without faith it is impossible to please God; for he that cometh to God, must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him." There must be no wavering, "for he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea, driven with the wind and tossed. Let not that man think that he shall receive anything of the Lord."

Another condition of being heard is the right state of our feelings towards others. An unforgiving spirit prevents the reception of our prayers. This is plain, from various passages. "When ye stand praying, forgive if ye have aught against any," is the exhortation of Jesus, and the solemn warning is added, "if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses." Paul appears to counsel freedom from anger as a needful preparation of the heart: "I will," the apostle tells Timothy, "that men pray everywhere, lifting up holy hands, without wrath and doubting."

Jesus inculcates perseverance in prayer, by the parable of the widow and the unjust judge. That we should be importunate, and faint not, is a lesson repeatedly enforced by the Savior.

It is worthy of notice, that fasting is a help to fervent prayer. To keep under the body, and bring it into subjection, is conducive to spiritual health and vigor. Although fasting is not commanded, it will be found a means of promoting the concentration of our thoughts.

Prayers may be divided into two classes, public and private. Promises are attached to both, but, we venture to think, that the prayers uttered in private are the most successful, since when alone there is less to distract the attention; he who prays in secret discloses more of his heart, dwells longer upon the wants and aspirations that affect him most; and feels less the importance of the phraseology employed. In public, there is an inducement to pray as pleasing men, to touch on different themes for their gratification, and to study forms of speech, but the restraint imposed by concern about the opinion of men destroys the spirit of prayer.

3. Passing from this, let us enquire, What ought we to pray for? But first, we ask, is there a boundary to our requests? Yes, we believe that the revealed will of God is both the reason and the measure of our prayers; we can say with John, "this is the confidence that we have in Him, that if we ask anything according to his will, He heareth us." The compass of our prayers must be regulated by the maintenance of harmony with the teachings of his word. In conformity to his design, miracles have ceased; therefore, to implore a miracle to be wrought, is contrary to the mind of Jehovah. Our prayers must be consistent with the divine purposes. No Christian can Scripturally pray for the return of his youth, or change in his stature or complexion, because such matters have no bearing upon the moral government of the Deity; nor should he entreat for riches, since he is instructed that self-denial and contentment ought to be the rule of his life. Our petitions must agree with our hope, and have a relation to the promised and glorious future. From these considerations we may learn how vain are the utterances of men who pray for the gift of the Holy Spirit, for the remission of sins without baptism, admittance into heaven at death, and so forth. Ignorance of God's purposes unfits us for acceptable worship; knowledge of his will is indispensable to the offering of that homage by which He is honored. The prayers recorded in the sacred volume will assist us to understand this subject. For instance, the oft-repeated words, "Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven." None can suppose that Jesus ever suggested a prayer which was not in accordance with the purposes of his Heavenly Father; yet multitudes take the sentence on their lips who do not believe that the time indicated will ever come.

The prayers of men endorsed with Holy Spirit are suitable to be offered by us, provided similar circumstances obtain in our duty.

4. Lastly, we would call attention to the use of the word Amen at the conclusion of all our prayers. In congregational worship, it is employed to express the concurrence of the hearers, and their desire that the petitions presented may be granted. Amen signifies, so be it, and as a response, is perfectly scriptural. In the book of Deuteronomy we find that, upon the announcement of the twelve curses, which were subsequently proclaimed from Mount Ebal, the people were commanded, after the enunciation of each, to say Amen. In 1 Cor. xiv. 16, Paul writes, respecting prayers not understood, "How should he that occupieth the room of the unlearned say Amen at thy giving of thanks?" Thus supplying us with the information that the early churches had recourse to this brief form of speech to denote unanimity and fervency. From its frequent recurrence in the New Testament, it must have been a term in common use to imply agreement with the wishes or requests of another.

We should, therefore, do well to cultivate this practice, for it has the Divine sanction, and will, if properly employed, promote the growth of spirituality in any community. When we unite with a brother in public prayer, it is meet and desirable that all the church should say Amen.—E. Brierley.

The House of Israel.

NATIONALITY OF THE JEWS.

We have long ceased to dwell in the land of our fathers in any considerable numbers. Our nationality is in effect destroyed; our throne is crushed; our independence as a people exists no longer. We have, like other races, cast our lots with the nations whither our sires were long ago scattered, and to which in effect we belong. And yet, unlike other races exiled from their original territory, we have preserved a distinctive embodiment. We have not become absorbed with other races. We present to the world and to history the singular and unprecedented spectacle of a people fulfilling patriotically every duty of citizenship in the land of our birth, fused with our fellow countrymen in every service and duty of the state, and yet preserving a certain idiosyncrasy so pronounced, that if the banner of the Millennium were raised, and the trumpet of the Messianic Redemption sounded, our people, be they Britons, Frenchmen, Germans, Americans, Persians, Tunisians, Chinese, would gather together to resume the nationality which one day will surely be restored. What other race in the world presents this remarkable ethnological and physiological characteristic—a characteristic which is quite an anomaly and almost a paradox? Who can trace to his home and origin the Finn of the North, the Magyar and Basque of the South, the wandering Zingars? Who can now separate the Frank from the Gaul in France, the Etruscan from the Umbrian or the Vandal in Italy, the Kelt from the Norman, the Dane, or the Saxon in the motley population of Great Britain? There are two causes of this peculiarity of our race. The first and superior cause is our Faith and its institutions; the second and inferior cause is the defined existence of the land of our fathers, and the interest still taken in it by numbers of our brethren.—Jewish Chronicle.

The general council of the Evangelical Lutheran church, of North America, recently met at Galesburg, Ill., and a paper on the exchange of pulpits with non-Lutheran ministers, concludes in the following words: "The rule which accords with the word of God and the confession of the church is, Lutheran pulpits for Lutheran ministers only; Lutheran altars for Lutheran communicants only."

THE RESTITUTION,
Plymouth, Indiana.

Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations: the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked: eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Communications.—The Editor must not be understood as endorsing all the sentiments expressed by correspondents whose articles are inserted under this head. Each writer is alone responsible for the article bearing his own signature. If the teaching of any writer is not endorsed, an article setting forth the views of the party differing may be forwarded. Free discussion of Bible doctrines on all sides will be allowed, but the Editor reserves the right to refuse those communications which antagonize a belief and obedience of the Gospel as a means of salvation, or which undermine its principles.

My New House.

I have just moved into a new house; at least, it seems new to me, though I am told that it was built a long time ago. And what a marvel of a house it is! Go where you will, it is all joy and peace; not a discordant sound is ever heard within its walls; no unwelcome foot can ever enter.

The house is well stored, too, with everything needed—the choicest wines—wines on the lees well refined—the clearest water, of which if a man drink he shall never thirst; the rarest bread—right from heaven—who could imagine such a thing! And the wardrobes are stored, too, with all sorts of garments, which fit me to a charm, and every ornament any one need desire. And I have got a life lease of the house! Do you wonder that I like it?

But it is so strange that, almost every day, somebody tries to get me out of the house. No one can come in without my permission—indeed, I am not allowed to let any one in; it may seem a rather hard condition, but when one gets a house, rent free—and such a house!—he may well put up with what, at first blush, seems somewhat hard. But though they can't come in, they get speech with me, and it would be curious if I could tell all they say.

Soon after I moved in an elegant gentleman called to see me—a man of rare polish and culture. I had never seen his like; his manners were most captivating; his voice silvery, his language the most choice—in fact, he seemed more like an angel of light than like a man. I could not let him in, as observed before, but that did not seem to embarrass him in the least, and we conversed through the window. You might ask, "What was to hinder his entering the window?" But a strong man, armed, kept the house, and there were guards outside, as well, of which more anon. Besides he made no show of any desire to get in.

After the customary generalities, and a pretty wide rambling over the usual topics of conversation, he fell to admiring the house and its appointments, so far as he could see them—he could not fail to observe the delicious fragrance passing through the open window, nor the bursts of melody which, ever and anon, reached his ear. He enquired who built the house, who owned it, etc., and when I told him all, as well as I could, as I described to him the various appointments of the house, he seemed much interested; and when I explained to him that I could let no one in, neither was I permitted to go out myself, he listened without a sign of displeasure. He was not only interested, but delighted, in all that I said; took me to be the most highly-favored of mortals, and lavished quite as much praise on me as the occasion called for. From the house, its appointments and tenant, the transition was easy to the surrounding country, the beauty of which he described with the greatest eloquence and enthusiasm. "Just a little way," he said, "from the house—just over the hill, which lies almost within reach—there were sights of ravishing beauty, and sounds of entrancing melody, to be enjoyed, which, to a person of your taste and culture, would be a rare feast." He set them forth in a very moving way, and I was more than once fain to go, but the thought of the condition of my lease held me back. I do not know but he read my thoughts, for he said, "There can be no danger in the world in your leaving the house for a short time, as I see it is remarkably well guarded both within and without, and, that condition in your lease, that you should never leave the house, must certainly be a figurative one, and to be taken with some latitude. If the owner is half as wise as you take him to be, and I have no doubt he is," he said, with a very respectful inclination, "he must know very well that occasions arise, every day, when a man must leave his house." He argued the case with great plausability and power, but to no purpose. He saw that I was firm, and, being too polite to press the matter, took his leave, saying that he would call again, with my permission.

After he had left, I sat musing. I recalled all that had passed between us, and, though I could remember nothing to occasion any regret, yet, for some reason unknown to me, there was an unpleasant savor left—an uneasiness that I could neither account for nor dispel—a sensation as if I had been exposed to some great danger and had had a narrow escape. I pondered in vain, however, till I sought Him who giveth wisdom liberally, and then it came to me clearly enough—I had his very photograph in my house, in fact, and I stood amazed at my blindness. It was the "Prince of the power of the air" who had sought to seduce me from my pleasant abode, my strong fortress. "Oh!" thought I, with a shudder, "had I listened to him, rather than to my dear Lord, who gave me this house, where had I been now? Surely lonely and bettered beyond a doubt. May I never see him again!"

He did come again, though, and plenty soon enough, too. This time he presented himself in a very different guise. He made no attempt at being pleasant, much less refined and gentlemanly. Having utterly failed before, by flattery and persuasion, to get me out of the house, he pursued quite a different course now, and sought to work upon my fears, and thus drive me out. He said the house was all a sham from top to bottom, and that it must tumble down soon, as it was wholly without foundation. I knew better, and told him so—it was founded on a rock; indeed, more than that; every rock in the world would sooner or later be dissolved, but that on which my house rested would never pass away. He then suggested doubts about my title; had the presumption, in fact, to say that the house was his, and so was I, and that he would suffer no one to deprive him of his rights. In good sooth I did belong to him once, but was his no longer, having been ransomed at a great price; and as for the house, I told him he never owned an inch of it, and never should; that it was a gift from my Lord and Master, and that with his help, I was prepared and resolved to hold it against all comers; that the title was good enough for me, and no one else was concerned about the matter.

Then he fell to abusing me, and said that I was not fit to live in such a house—that I was of low extraction—had been the vilest of slaves, and was putting on too many airs to be dressed up so fine, pretending to be a king, and keeping myself so secluded. I told him that there was no dispute about my origin, and that while I was in his power, I was indeed the vilest of slaves, and the most wretched, too, for I was fed on nothing but husks, which the very swine refused, and that as for my wages, they were nothing but death; but every thing was changed now; I had been adopted into the family of a Great King, and wore the apparel of the royal family; that I had had a new song put into my mouth, and that if he did not like what he heard and saw he had better move on.

Finding words of no avail, he made a pass at me, and had well nigh got hold of me, but the strong man armed was within call, and when I raised my voice he fled away apace.

After this he sent cunning servants of various names and kinds—anything to get me out of the house—then I should be at his mercy—fears and doubts and cares, so that, had I listened to them, the house would not have been tenantable at all, and the quest but would have been far preferable; but I was prepared for them all. There was a special weapon for each one, and I had only to lay about me with a will, and the coast was clear at once. When fear pressed me sore, I remembered the words of the Lord, "Fear not; I am with thee." How preposterous to think that I could be moved by fear. A host of fears could never disturb my confidence. When cares pressed sorely upon me, I cast them all upon him that careth for me, and so was soon quit of them. Then my enemy—for he no longer pretended friendship—would ever and anon make all my sins to pass before (thinking that he could drive me out of the house with very shame) or I should rather have said the pictures—the photographs of my sins—for the sins themselves were beyond his reach; my Father had thrown them all into the depths of the sea, and had separated them from me as far as the East is from the West. How this vile fellow ever got those photographs I cannot imagine; but there they were, and horrid enough, too; but I told him to begone with them: I hated them now as much as I once loved them, and more too; that their stain had all been washed from my soul in priceless blood; that they were blotted out as a thick cloud from the memory of my Master, whom alone I was desirous of pleasing—that so far from driving me from my new house, they made me all the more resolved to abide there forever. I taunted him finally to get rid of him, and told him that he was as weak as he was vile, and and sang to him this song of triumph and exultation:

"Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerers, through him that loved us. For I am persuaded that neither life nor death, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

So he left me for a season; in fact was out of sight before I got half through.

God's Ways Harmonious.

In the second book of Kings, nineteenth chapter and verses 9-12, and 15, we read, how Elijah, driven from Jerusalem by Ahab, and bowed down with grief and apprehension, complained to Jehovah that the people had digged down his altars and slain his prophets, and he, (Elijah) only was left, and they sought his life. Jehovah commanded Elijah to go into the mount, and there a terrible tornado, a mighty earthquake and a devouring fire passed by successively, and then a still small voice. Jehovah spoke not from the tornado, the earthquake or the fire, but in the still, small voice. Elijah recognized the Great Jehovah, and he bowed himself before the Supreme presence. Then the Lord Jehovah spake, and said he was left unto himself. Seven thousand in Israel who had not bowed the knee to Baal, worshipped his image. This was a lesson to Elijah, that God did not always come with pomp and ceremony, and that, although Elijah did not see any one coming up to his altars with burnt offerings and sacrifice, yet there were those beside himself who had not worshipped Baal, but clave to the God of Israel, in secret and quiet places; and that God worked quietly without outward display, as well as with observation.

And thus does God ever work. See Him in nature, for his plans and purposes and laws are the same in nature as with intelligent man. Though the mighty forces of nature are all controlled by laws of God's making, at the first when they were called into being; yet He does not always employ these agencies to do his work. The mountains were not all heaved up in gigantic convulsions of earth, but many of them have been formed by the action of the earth's surface during the subsidence of the internal heat, in the slow process of ages. Many rivers, many of them were before the mountains, and as the mountain ridges slowly rose the rivers planed the rocks and maintained their first estate, and now, after the lapse of countless ages, are where they first run their silvery course, but with the mountain tops thousands of feet above them. The ruins of centuries have beaten down the rocks, and the glaciers have ground and pulverized them, and mixed them up, and the earth rose from the ocean depths and fell again into a watery grave, to rise again, and be again immersed during the grand succession of cycles, until at last after numerous deaths and resurrections it emerged and was fitted, beautified and adorned for the grand masterpiece of creation, for whom it was made—intelligent man.

The sea brings forth the fishes and monsters of the deep; the earth produces fowl and beast in regular succession and order, with art, confusion or display. Everything works quietly and orderly, and with no grand and imposing conflict or upheaval. The lowest forms of life appear first and are succeeded by higher and more complex forms. Progress is marked on all ages, and is read in the rocky records of the past with unerring accuracy.

See his dealings with man, how they harmonize with his works in nature. Man, as far as we know of him by authentic history, has progressed slowly and gradually through the history of the race from Adam to the present time. God gave him life, and the superb and wonderful mechanism of his being commenced its action. But, Adam was without experience, and consequently character. God, all-wise, and all-powerful as He is, could not in accordance with his divine plans and laws, give Adam these, for if He did, his free agency and the power to work out his own destiny in obedience to those laws, would have been nullified, and he would have been a mere machine in the hands of his Creator. Per consequence, see how light the burden is laid upon Adam. He is required to be obedient to one command—so says the record.—but he fell at the first temptation, and suffered for his sin. The same imperfection we find all the way down the stream of time, till we reach God the only begotten Son, who in the midst of trial, persecution and temptation, proved obedient and sinless. Noah, Abraham, Lot, Isaac, Jacob, Judah, Samson, Jephthah, David and Solomon, all prominent characters, and blessed of the Lord, were imperfect and sinful; but they were the best material God had for his purposes and He used them. As the race accumulated, experience gave it light, the tests were more severe, and acts that once were overlooked on account of the ignorance of men, were condemned in the greater light that had come to them.

Thus man picked up from age to age a little experience here and a little there, and gave it to the next generation who added a little to the inheritance and sent it down to the next for its accretion, until the sum of human experiences had reached to the manger at Bethlehem, and then on the banks of Jordan, the Christ erected his grand standard of morality and religion, and all men everywhere were commanded to reform. Then rang out that grand, angelic anthem, "Peace on earth, good will to men," which has been the burden of every song and sermon of the disciples of Christ ever since. Then were introduced those better promises; then was brought to light the sublime possibility of every human being—immortality; and then too, were laid upon him the tests of faith, virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness and charity, against which there is no law. By that standard men are now judged and will be judged by the Lord Jesus in the day of his appearing.

Perfection cannot be attained in a day or year, but only by slow, patient endeavor, as long as life shall last. The examples of the ancients show us that imperfect and ignorant as they were, yet it was possible to rise to the glory of acceptation with God, and we should be encouraged to persevere unto the end, confident that He who has promised all things to the faithful ones, will most assuredly, fulfill to the letter all his pledges. The Beautiful Land.

BY O. W. BURNHAM.

How many times have we seen beautiful pictures, with soft blue skies, and clouds of purple and gold, and the landscape, with its far-off hills and feathery foliage dimly seen through the soft hazy atmosphere, so tender and dream-like, as to seem almost ready to melt and vanish away in the blue ether beyond; with perhaps a silver stream winding its way along through flowery meadows, or a beautiful lake whose placid waters reflected with the clearness of a mirror every object upon its shores filling the middle distance; the rich and varied greens, and deep brown shadows of the trees in the foreground, with here and there a bright ray of sunlight streaming in through the openings among the branches; and a soft mossy knoll, sprinkled over with wild flowers, looking so downy and inviting to tired, wearied limbs, that we could fain throw ourselves down there and enjoy a season of rest, or lave our aching brow in the crystal waters of the little purling brook rippling along its base. Perhaps we detected a beautiful mansion embowered among the trees, and as we gazed, we may have thought, "O, if I could only live in such a home as that, I should be happy!"

We may none of us ever enjoy in this world the possession of such a home. And, even were it ours to enjoy, that enjoyment would be brief. The leaves would fall from the trees, the flowers droop and die, the beautiful tints of the distant hills turn to a dull leaden hue, the glorious clouds lose their gorgeous coloring, the grass wither, the purling brook dry up, and the whole landscape be changed. We, too, would soon pass away: and the splendid mansion fall into decay and tumble to the ground a ruined heap. Says the prophet Isaiah, "Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look upon the earth beneath; for the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, and the earth shall wax old like a garment, and they that dwell therein shall die in like manner." And the apostle Paul, in the first chapter of his letter to the Hebrews, speaking in the language of the Spirit to the Son, says, "Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the works of Thy hands. They shall perish but thou remainest; and they all shall wax old as doth a garment; and as a vesture thou shalt fold them up, and they shall be changed."

But though these earthly scenes are ever changing, and none of earth's beauties enduring, yet, there is a land promised of God, where none of the changes which are so often seen and felt here, will ever come. When the curse which now rests upon the earth is removed and all things are made new, then may we enjoy the delights of a land where there will be no tired limbs, nor aching heads or hearts, nor where one of the inhabitants shall ever say, "I am sick;" where the beauties of the landscape will never fade, nor the glory of its skies grow dim; where the flowers will no more droop and hang their heads at the approach of winter, nor the water-brooks cease their rippling and be dried up, or the fountains fail. "It shall blossom abundantly, and rejoice even with joy and singing, the glory of Lebanon shall be given up unto it, the excellency of Carmel and Sharon." The beautiful mansions that are fitted up for the reception of those who did dwell there will never fall into decay or need repairing. There, on the banks of life's river, we may repose in the glorious sunlight of eternal day, and inhale the fragrance of deathless flowers, and pluck and eat from the trees laden with luscious fruits, and drink, and lave hands, feet, and brow in the crystal waters flowing at our feet; and, with hearts swelling with love and wonder, thank God for the cloudless skies, the glorious sunshine, the beautiful never-fading flowers, the sweet, refreshing, cleansing waters, the luscious fruits, the splendid mansion, and above all, the eternal life amid the enduring glories of the kingdom of God, with our Savior—the sight of our Redeemer being the best pleasure.

Reader, may you and I be there to share its glories and realities! All may share them who will. To the poor, the friendless, the down-trodden and oppressed, the homeless wanderer, the outcast from among men, the wretchedest, vilest sinners, sunk in the low depths of degradation, misery, and shame, the haggard sons and daughters of wretchedness and want, tired even of life, the invitation is given to come and rest in this home. Come, poor weary wanderer! Jesus has shed his blood that this home might be yours! Come to Him, and his blood will wash away every stain from your soul, and you shall dwell with Him forever in that "beautiful land."

I Counsel Thee.

Who counsels me? I want to know who gives me advice before I take it? Christ says, "I counsel thee." Ah, I know he is infinitely wise and good. What dost thou advise me to do? I counsel thee to buy of me gold. Buy gold of Christ? Does he sell gold? Yes, he advises me to buy gold of him and I shall be rich. Ah, Lord, how can I buy gold? What have I to buy with? Listen, soul of mine, to the spirit voice telling me what to bring to buy this gold with—thy poverty. The reason many do not buy this gold is, they are not poor enough. O, let us make haste to be poor, that we may buy, for this gold will pass current in another world. This is gold for eternity. And raiment is spoken of. Can I buy raiment of Christ? Yes. White robes are waiting for me to wear now, and I give for the same poverty, miserableness, blindness, nakedness; truly he might well say, "Not as the world giveth, give I unto thee." The world never gives on these terms. How often have we had occasion to say, "I would buy but I cannot afford it." Spiritually there is no reason why any one should be poor. We may be rich; the shame of our nakedness need not appear, for raiment is provided. We may have good spiritual eyesight, for eye-salve is offered us. Now who will be rich? Who will be clothed? Who will be anointed?—Ex.

Stick to the Foundation.

Our lot is fallen in times when, on the one hand, the very foundations of the faith are shaken by those who ought to be its chief defenders; and on the other a superstructure of wood, hay, and stubble is raised upon that foundation, almost equally perilous to the safety of those who trust themselves upon it. And men are asking where is there any resting-place amidst this deluge of unbelief and false doctrine with which the whole earth is overspread? But why such a question? Is not the ark of God's word floating high above it, offering a secure a permanent resting-place to every weary and heavy-laden soul that seeks a refuge in it? Is not the ark of God's testimony spread before you?

Keep close to God's own word. Let no man call himself what he will, move you from the foundation. And amidst all the varied interpretations of the word, keep to that which a prayerful, earnest, and diligent perusal of it carries home to your conscience. When you stand before the bar of God hereafter, no dependence on human teaching will be your vindication for not having acted upon God's word as he gave it to you. He who allows any man to come between him and God's message to him, must take the consequence of preferring man's word to God's.—Dean Goode.

The Holy Scriptures.

The Scriptures have been translated into one hundred and forty-eight languages and dialects, of which one hundred and twenty-one had, prior to the formation of the British Foreign Bible Society—never appeared. And twenty-five of those languages existed without an alphabet in an oral form. Upward of forty-three millions of these copies of God's work are circulated among not less than six hundred millions of people.

The first division of the Divine orders into chapters and verses is attributed to Stephen Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury, in the reign of King John, in the latter part of the twelfth century or beginning of the thirteenth. Cardinal Hugo, in the middle of the thirteenth century, divided the Old Testament into chapters as they stand in our translation. In 1661, Athias, a Jew of Amsterdam, divided the section of Hugo into verses—a French printer had previously (1551) divided the New Testament into verses as they now are.

The Old Testament contains thirty-nine books, 929 chapters, 23,214 verses, 592,439 words, 2,728,100 letters.

THE RESTITUTION

PLYMOUTH, IND.....Dec. 29, 1875

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.

☞We are to preach in Plymouth next Sunday, morning and evening.

☞The lateness of this number is due to the fact that the conference and association took our time. It will be out on time next week.

☞We are now adding many new names to the subscription list. Let every one make an extra effort to obtain new names at the beginning of the year.

☞The following item we clip from the Christian Union. Too much care cannot be taken in the selection of books for the young. The world is flooded with base, trashy literature, and its only tendency is to lead the mind away from all that is pure and good. The reading of bad books is one of the preparatory steps to many of the evil habits now cursing society. But here is the item:

Mr. James T. Fields has interviewed Jesse Pomeroy, the boy-murderer, and discovered that the wretched child has read sixty dime novels and other highly wrought stories of violence. We hope that the publishers of such literature may be duly impressed with the enormity of their offense against morality; but, as prevention is better than cure, our hopes go out most earnestly toward the managers of Sunday-school libraries, who outnumber the wicked publishers a thousand to one, and who, more than any one else, must be looked to, that harmless books that are attractive may be so easy of access that bad ones will not be desired.

Our Christmas Meeting.

The quarterly conference commenced in Plymouth on Friday, and continued, in connection with the Publishing Association, until Monday evening. There was, considering the very bad weather, a liberal gathering of brethren from various parts of the state. The meetings, in the main, passed off very pleasantly, and the best of feelings prevailed. The preaching was instructive and impressive, and was well received by the people. The Christian Chapel not being large enough to hold the people on Sunday, arrangements were made for the Lutheran church, which was well filled, morning and evening, although a heavy storm prevailed most of the day. We feel grateful to our Lutheran friends for their kindness.

While Bro. Stephenson was preaching in the Lutheran church, Sunday evening, upon that most excellent theme, Faith, Hope, and Charity, Bro. Wilcox filled the pulpit for the pastor of the M. E. Church, Mr. J. C. Stephens. Mr. S. is a gentleman of most excellent spirit, and seems willing to extend every courtesy to those who may differ with him upon points of theology. In view of the fact that we are not considered quite evangelical, we hail with pleasure such indications of confidence on the part of our more Orthodox brethren. Bro. W. discoursed upon a topic of practical interest, and left a good feeling upon the minds of his hearers, who expressed themselves well pleased with his discourse. Bro. E. Miller, from Michigan, was with us during the conference, and added much to its business interest. On Christmas morning he preached an appriate discourse upon the birth of Christ, taking for his text the words; "Peace on earth and good will to men." Bro. M. was the first to proclaim the tidings of life in this county, some thirty years ago, and a number of those who first heard him, were present on Christmas to hear him proclaim the same blessed words. On the whole, we believe the conference was productive of much good, not only to the brethren, but to the community.

The affairs of the Association were carefully examined by the stockholders and found to be in a healthy condition. As the proceedings appear elsewhere we shall not elaborate here. It is to be hoped that every brother and sister throughout the state, will take a deep interest in the prosperity of the Association during the coming year, and extend the circulation of the RESTITUTION as far as possible. A united and vigorous push now, will do much to increase our numbers and strengthen the hands of those who are struggling to place the work upon a firm foundation.

The Present and Future Position of Christ.

I next propose to investigate the present and future position of the Son of God.

1. As the anti-type of Aaron, he is interceding for his people in the heavenly sanctuary. See Hebrews, 8th and 9th chapters.

2. He is exalted with the right hand of God to be a Prince and a Savior to Israel and forgiveness of sins. Acts v. 31.

John, in describing his present position, represents him as being "the prince of the kings of the earth." Rev. i. 5. As the anti-type of Aaron, he is not king, but simply a priest to offer sacrifices and intercede for his people. As the royal son of David, he is now heir to his father David's throne, and consequently a prince royal. As such he is not a king, but a prince; does not possess a kingdom, but is heir to its future possession. But in opposition to the foregoing, it is urged that Christ is now a king, and that he now possesses a kingdom, for the following reasons:

1. He is the head and lawgiver of the church.

Answer—He is not the regal, but the ecclesiastical head of the church.

He does not exercise civil authority in any sense. He is not only heir to the civil head-ship of the kings and kingdoms of the world.

His church is not a civil or political organization, but purely ecclesiastical. As such it does not conflict with the civil authorities of the world. Hence, churches may be organized, and exist in all countries, and under all forms of government. Not so with a kingdom; it could not exist cotemporaneously in the same locality with any other kingdom, unless in a subordinate position. Hence, before the kingdom of God can fill the world it must break in pieces the interposing kingdoms thereof, as an essential prerequisite to such a kingdom.

Again, kings rule by force, but Christ as the moral, not civil, the ecclesiastical, not political head of the church, rules by motive, by moral suasion, and not by force of arms. He is not an original law maker, but only an agent, acting with delegated authority. Matt. xxviii. 18. Hence, his Father is the proprietor and he the agent. The Father the law maker and the Son the expounder, and administrator of his Father's law. John v. 22, 23, 27.

2. "Christ shares his Father's throne, therefore he reigns with his Father." The simple fact of his Father's throne does not prove that he reigns in any sense with his Father. This position may be honorary, the same as an honorary member of any organized body. That such is the case is evident—

1. From the fact that Christ is not a king, but a prince.

2. He is not reigning with the Father, but interceding between the Father and the penitent criminal, as an advocate, and not as a judge. He cannot be judge and advocate at the same time, and for the same party.

3. As a nobleman he has gone to his Father "to receive kingly authority," and to return and exercise that authority, or reign,—not in the far-off country, but in the locality from which he went away.

4. The only kingdom ever promised the Son of God, (the kingdom of Israel,) is now overthrown and desolate. It does not now exist to be subject to the conjoint reign of the Father and Son.

5. The only kingdom over which the Father ever reigned, as far as this earth and all the promises to Christ are concerned, is now in ruins.

Objection 3. "That Christ terminates, instead of commences his reign, at the second advent is evident from the fact that at that time he delivers up the kingdom to the Father, and becomes subject to the Father's rule. 1 Cor. xv. 24-28.

It is argued, in contrariety to the plain import of Paul's language, which commences the reign of Christ subsequently to his coming, and the resurrection of those who are his, that he ceases to reign at that epoch, because the Father will make his foes his footstool previously to his coming. Ps. cx. 1; Acts ii. 35. But those who urge this objection attach more importance to this language than legitimately belongs to it.

It is one thing for Christ's foes to be made his footstool, and quite another for him to place his feet upon them. One is the work of the Father, the other of the Son. That the Father makes Christ's foes his footstool by investing him with authority to rule over them, will be seen in the light of the following testimony:

1. The Father makes his foes his footstool, by sending the rod of his strength (Christ) to rule in the midst of his enemies. Ps. cx. 1-3.

2. The Lord at the Father's right hand, (i. e. Christ,) shall strike through kings in the day of his wrath. He (the Lord at his right hand) shall judge among the heathen and fill the places with the dead bodies. He (Christ) shall wound the heads (kings) over many countries. Ps. cx. 5-6.

Ps. ii.—1. The Father sets his Son upon his holy hill in Zion. vs. 6.

2. He gives his Son the dominion of the world. vs. 8.

3. The Son rules his enemies with a rod of iron, and breaks them in pieces like a potter's vessel. vs. 7.

4. It is with the Son that the kings and judges of the earth are called upon to sue for mercy, lest they perish when his (the Son's) wrath is kindled but a little.

5. All those are blessed who put their trust in him.

Rev. xix.—1. The son judges and makes war. vs. 11.

2. The Son smites the nations and rules them with a rod of iron. vs. 15.

3. He comes as King of kings, or imperial ruler of the world. vs. 16.

4. The kings of the earth and their armies are gathered together to make war against him (Christ) and against his army. vs. 19.

Luke xix.—1. Christ as a nobleman is gone to his Father "to procure for himself royalty, (Campbell's translation) and then return. vs. 12.

2. When he returns vested with royal power he commands those servants to be called to whom he had committed the money that he might know what every one had gained. vs. 15—Campbell.

3. His enemies who would not have to reign over them, he commands to be slain in his presence. vs. 27.

From the foregoing evidence it is clear that the Father makes Christ's foes his footstool by investing him with power to subjugate them, and that Christ exercises this power, as the sovereign of earth in putting his enemies under his feet. But the Son returns to earth before he subjugates his enemies. He rules in the midst of those enemies whom he puts under his feet. Ps. cx.

The correct rendering of 1 Cor. xv. 23-26 is as as follows: "But every man in his own rank; Christ the first fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming. Afterward the end, when he shall have given back the authority to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death."

The Greek adverb eita, which is rendered "after" in the previous verse, according to Greenfield signifies, "then, afterwards, after that." And according to the Englishman's Greek Concordance, "after that, afterward, furthermore, then." Thus (epeita) afterward they that are Christ's at his coming. "After that the end." "Afterward, furthermore, or then the end." &c.

In reference to the foregoing Scripture, please observe the following order:

1. The coming of Christ, and the resurrection of those who are his.

2. His reign, and the work of subjugating all his enemies, and putting down all interposing rule, power and authority.

3. The destruction of the last enemy, Death.

By reference to Rev. xx., it will be seen that between the coming of Christ and the resurrection of the pious dead, and the final destruction of death, will intervene one thousand years. During this period the saints will reign with Christ, and assist him in the great work of subjugating the nations, and bringing back this revolted world in allegiance to the great God. Having thus consummated the grand design for which the sovereign power of the world was delegated to him, he gives back this supreme power to the great original, that God may be all in all, that is, supreme, and the son becomes subordinate to the Father. Ptolemy, king of Egypt, gave up his kingdom to Cæsar, but was permitted to reign subordinate to him in his own realm. Christ having acted with discretionary power in the conquest, and bringing back of the world, will voluntarily lay the trophies of all nations and kingdoms at his Father's feet, and own him Lord of all, and become a kingly subject to all eternity.

Conference Reports.

INDIANA.

Pursuant to notice issued by the executive committee the quarterly conference of Indiana met in Plymouth, at 11 o'clock a. m. Friday, Dec. 24, 1875. Meeting was introduced by S. A. Chaplin, by reading, prayer and remarks. Social meeting was engaged in by Chaplin, Willcox, Drew, Barnhill, and others.

In the absence of the regular officers chairman and secretary—on motion J. F. Willcox was chosen chairman, and G. M. Myers, secretary, pro tem.

On motion Dickson Thompson, Cyrus Taber and G. M. Myers were appointed a committee for the arrangement of business for the conference.

On motion the meeting adjourned till evening.

In the evening the meeting was entertained by a discourse from J. M. Stephenson, on the proper study of the Bible. As a plan the speaker recommended its study by subjects, as an attorney would give to his client all the statutory law pertaining to his particular case without burdening him with the contents of the entire statute. He also recommended the study of words, and the application of the same laws of language as applied in the study of other volumes. The meeting adjourned to meet at 9:30 o'clock on the 25th.

Saturday at 9:30 o'clock a. m., the meeting assembled and was called to order by the regular chairman—R. S. Dwiggins. The 24th Psalm was read read and prayer offered by G. M. Myers.

Church organization as a topic for deliberation was taken up by the meeting, and the following resolution was introduced by J. F. Willcox, freely discussed, and adopted:

WHEREAS, In the judgment of this meeting, the cause of truth demands the union of the scattered churches of our faith into a more compact organization, and

WHEREAS, The time has come to take the preliminary steps to effect such organization, therefore

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to draft a plan for such an organization, and report the same at the next meeting of this conference.

The following was the committee appointed: J. F. Willcox, of Wisconsin; J. M. Stephenson, of Illinois; B. Miller, of Michigan; H. V. Reed, of Indiana; and A. D. Eshelman, of Ohio.

On motion the meeting adjourned to meet at 2:30 o'clock p. m.

After noon, at the hour appointed, the meeting was called to order, and as a topic for discussion the Sunday school interest was taken up and discussed at length. The following resolutions by G. M. Myers were introduced and adopted by the meeting:

Resolved, That we, as a conference, desire to impress upon the minds of our brethren every where the importance of the Sunday School interest, and recommend to them that a Sunday School should be organized wherever there is a possibility of its being sustained; and

Resolved, That the brotherhood be and are requested to correspond with an agent whom this conference may designate in reference to the Sunday School interest, and especially upon the matter of Sunday School statistics.

J. F. Willcox was selected as the general Sunday School agent.

On motion the conference adjourned.

Discourse in the evening by J. F. Willcox, on Jesus as the light of the world. The speaker demonstrated that the Bible was not the light of the world upon the subject of geology, astronomy, or any of the sciences, but the light of the world on the subject of a future life by a resurrection from the grave.

IOWA.

The annual conference of the Church of God in Iowa, assembled at West Irving, Tama county, on the evening of Dec. 16, 1875, as per previous notice. Bro. J. F. Wilcox preached on the subject of Christ the light of the world. Bro. Wilcox being here as a substitute for Bro. H. V. Reed, whose ill-health prevented him from attending, as previously arranged. On Friday morning at 11 o'clock, Bro. Wilcox preached from 1 Cor. iii. 3-9, showing the difference conclusively between working together with God and working for God. Convened at 3 o'clock for conference business. Bro. Hipsher, president, in the chair. On motion, Bro. L. Marsh, Bro. R. J. Hill, and Bro. Carr were chosen a committee on arrangements. The indebtedness of the conference to Bro. J. T. Prime for evangelistic labors was then called up and laid over till next day. We then proceeded to elect officers for the ensuing year. Bro. Hipsher being nominated, declined, saying he preferred a change. Bro. Hipsher's request was granted, and on motion Bro. J. F. Prime was chosen president for the ensuing year. On motion John Fitz was chosen as secretary, and Bro. J. Griffith as treasurer, for the ensuing year. On motion Bro. White reported his action as treasurer for the past year, which was received and accepted, and in connection with Bro. Prime's report to the second quarterly conference indebted to him in the sum of $23.34, after which we adjourned until half past 2 o'clock on Saturday.

In the evening Bro. Willcox preached from 2 Cor. v. 17-20, to a large and attentive audience. On Saturday at 11 o'clock, Bro. Willcox delivered a lecture on the present and future reign of Christ.

Conference convened as per adjournment, at half-past 2 o'clock. On motion voluntary contributions were taken, sufficient to pay the indebtedness to Bro. Prime; after which Bro. Willcox presented to the conference a statement of the condition and claims of the Christian Publishing Company, of Plymouth, Ind., urging the brethren to co-operate with the company to make the paper self sustaining and set it on a sure basis; after which the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That we fully sympathize with the Christian Publishing Company in their efforts to maintain the weekly publication of the RESTITUTION, and will do all in our power to further that object.

A collection was then taken to defray the expense of Bro. Willcox in visiting us.

On motion a committee of five were appointed by the chair to select time and place for our next meeting. Brethren Hill, Butcher, Meredith, Marsh, and Griffith were appointed. The committee selected Hickory Grove four miles southwest of Colo, Story county, as the place, and the evening of March 9, 1876, as the time for holding our next conference; after which the conference adjourned.

In the evening Bro. Willcox preached from Heb. ii. 1-3. At half-past 10, Sunday morning, Bro. R. J. Hill preached from 2 Tim. iv. 2, "Preach the word." At half-past 2 o'clock the brethren met for social exercise which was very interesting, and was protracted until nearly time for the evening discourse, which was delivered by Bro. Willcox on the nature of the kingdom of God. Bro. W. gave a masterly exposition of this important subject to a densely crowded house.

The meetings throughout were well attended, and with one exception a perfect success; and it is hoped by the writer that the cause of this may be averted in future by a more earnest spirit of investigation on the part of all concerned. With charity to all, let us exercise the same spirit of Christian forbearance to others that we demand for ourselves.

WISCONSIN AND ILLINOIS.

Pursuant to published notice, the first quarterly conference of the Church of God for the Southern Wisconsin and Northern Illinois, met at the Fairfield school house, in the Southern part of Green county, Wisconsin, on Friday evening, December 10, 1875, at 7 o'clock. Mitchell from Heb. xii. 28, followed by old Father Clark, who is 80 years old, on the subject of the kingdom of God. After a short recess, Bro. Gans spoke from Heb. xii. 28.

Bro. Arnold then followed with a short discourse on the subject of being born again. Adjourned till evening. At 7 o'clock in the evening Bro. Arnold spoke from Rev. xxii. Bro. Mitchell followed in a feeling exhortation. Met Sunday morning at 11 o'clock in the capacity of a social meeting. After social meeting we listened to a discourse by Bro. Arnold from Rom. i. 16. A Transposition of Halsted's Job.

LA FAYETTE NORRIS.

1. There was a man in the land of Uz named Job, and he was a man that was upright and just, and feared God, and turned aside from evil.

2. And there were born to him seven sons and three daughters.

3. And his possession was seven thousand small cattle, and three thousand camels, and five hundred pairs of oxen, and five hundred she asses, and a household exceedingly numerous and he was a man great above all the son of the East.

4. And his sons went and made a banquet at the house of each, in his day. And they sent and invited their three sisters to eat and drink with them.

5. And it was so that when the days of this feasting had gone round, Job sent and consecrated them; and he arose early in the morning and offered burnt offerings according to the number of them all; for Job said, Perhaps my sons have cursed God in their hearts in this manner did Job all those days.

6. And it was day when the sons of God came to stand before Jehovah that the accuser came also among them.

7. And Jehovah said to the accuser From where art thou come? And the accuser answered Jehovah and said, From running up and down in the earth, and from going along in it.

8. And Jehovah said to the accuser, Hast thou set thy mind upon my servant Job, that there is not another like him in the earth; a man perfect and upright, fearing God and turned aside from evil?

9. And the accuser answered Jehovah, and said. Does Job fear God for nothing?

10. Fencest thou not round him, and round his house, and round all belonging to him? Round about the works of his hands hast thou blest, and his possession is spread abroad in the earth.

11. But indeed stretch out thine hand, I pray thee, and smite all belonging to him, and perhaps he will curse thee to thy face.

12. And Jehovah said to the accuser: All belonging to him is in thy hand; only on him shalt thou not stretch out thy hand; and the accuser went out from the face of Jehovah.

13. And it was that day when his sons and daughter were eating and drinking wine in the house of their elder brother.

14. And a messenger came to Job and said, Those oxen were plowing, and the she asses were pasturing near them.

15. And the Sabeans fell upon them and took them, and those servants they smote with the edge of the sword, and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

16. As this one was speaking, another came and said, Fire of God fell from heaven and burned up the sheep and servants, consumed them, and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

17. As this was speaking, another came and said, The Chaldeans set their bands of soldiers, and they rushed upon those camels and took them, and those servants smote with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

18. While this one was speaking, another came and said, Thy sons and daughters are eating and drinking wine in the house of their elder brother.

19. And lo, a great wind came from over the desert, and smote that house on its four sides, and it fell upon those young people and killed them; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

20. And Job arose and rent his upper garment, and shaved his head, and prostrated himself on the ground and adored:

21. And said, Naked came I forth from my mothers womb, and naked shall I return thither; Jehovah gave and Jehovah hath taken away, let the name of Jehovah be blessed.

22. With all this Job sinned not nor uttered impiety towards God.

Second Advent Glimpses.

This is the title of an article in one of our English exchanges, from the pen of the Rev. E. H. Bickersteth author of the grand poetical work, "Yesterday, To-day, and Forever." Mr. Bickersteth is a decided, outspoken pre-millennialist, but differs from us on "the Jew question," and some points touching the nature of the millenium. In the article referred to he speaks of a group of events "immediately preparatory to, or connected with, the coming of our Lord into the air," and suggests that in that group "may reasonably be included:"

"1. The preaching of the Gospel for a witness to all nations. This rests on the words of our Lord: 'This gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come.' Matt. xxiv. 14. The gospel preaching of the first century has its counterpart in our day, which has well been called 'the era of Evangelical Missions.' The vision seen by St. John in Patmos is being fulfilled before our eyes: 'I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach to them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation and kindred and tongue and people.' Rev. xiv. 6.

"2. The further subsidence of the Mohammedan power, as very shortly preceding the Second Advent. This is argued from the sixth vial. We read 'the sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates (the symbol of the Turkish power, see Rev. ix. 14); and the water thereof was dried up that the way of the kings of the East might be prepared.' Rev. xvi. 12. The drying up of the mystic Euphrates denotes the decay of Islamism, and is the immediate precursor of the fall of Papal Rome, as the drawing of the literal Euphrates was of the fall of ancient Babylon before Cyrus and the tributary kings from the East who fought under his banner. Now the wasting of Mohammedism during the last fifty years is a fact of history. The very existence of Turkey as a political power depends on the arbitrament of Christendom: so low are the waters of the great river running; but they are not yet dried up.

"3. The fall of the Roman Babylon. The warning note of this is struck immediately after the vision of Evangelic missions, 'Babylon is fallen, is fallen, that great city,' etc. Rev. xiv 6-8. This is the chief burden of the seventh vial, 'And Great Babylon came in remembrance before God to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath' (Rev. xvi. 9); and this described with graphic terror in Rev. xviii. 1-24. This terrible destruction of Papal Rome, probably by volcanic fire, is quite distinct from the casting down of the Papal antichrist to Gehenna, which an after prophecy describes in Rev. xix. 20. The exact time, however, of this event in relation to the other events here enumerated cannot be positively fixed."—Messiah's Herald.

Christmas.

BY A. J. EYCHANER.

Softly fell the touch of twilight on Judea's silent hills,
Softly crept the peace of moonlight o'er Judea's trembling ills.
Gentle dews distilled their sweetness on the heritage and the flowers,
And the winds made low, sweet music on Euphratah's olive bowers.
Slowly o'er the hills and valleys, from the mountains to the sea,
Night laid long her somber mantle round the sleepers, bond and free,
And as shades of night grew deeper from the twilights purple hue,
One by one the stars grew brighter in the pearly concave blue.

Shepherds watched their flocks that evening on the verdant plains afar,
When lo! o'er Bethlehem's vales appeared a bright and wondrous star.
Softly looking through the darkness till the coming of the morn.
It told the shepherds and the magi that the Prince of peace was born.
On that silent, peaceful evening, long ago, a song began.
Sung by angels in the heavens: "Peace on earth, good will to man."
"Message now of joyful tidings came through angels' word,
"To all men is born a Savior, to the world a King and Lord.

Softly falls the morning sunlight on the distant mountain peaks,
And a Christmas morning twilight to the valleys creeps.
Yes, a beauteous Christmas morning! Wake, O, earth! and join the strain!
Let Judea's hills and valleys ever echo the refrain!
Let the world join in the anthem that the angels sang that night,
Till earth's darkness shall be scattered by the glorious Gospel's light,
And the earth be robed in beauty and our Eden bloom again,
And God's will, as done in heaven, shall be done on earth by men.

Correspondence.

The RESTITUTION comes to us every week laden with its store of good things, and we prize it all the more, since so many of our brethren have moved away, and there are none of like precious faith in several miles of us. It seems so strange how people will close their ears to the truths of God's word. When we have had meetings people will not turn out to hear; both preachers and people seem to fear investigation—but whenever the subject of life, only through Jesus and the resurrection, is broached in the community, the preachers will intrench themselves behind their pulpits and cling to their "immortal souls" with all the tenacity of a drowning man catching at a straw. We had up for discussion at the lyceum, last week. Resolved, that the Bible teaches the doctrine of the immortality of the soul. There was a large hall pretty well filled, but scarcely a church member present. They were so horrified that such an awful doctrine was to be promulgated, that they appointed a prayer meeting at the same hour, to try to avert, the calamity of any one believing it. They dare not face it, but they take every opportunity to fight it when no one can reply. At one of the churches this morning, the preachers read three or four chapters (very much more Bible than I ever heard from his pulpit before) to show the power and majesty of God; the whole sermon went to prove how far above our comprehension was God, that He filled immensity of space, that He had no form, that it was very grovelling to compare man to God in bodily formation, that it was simply impossible so great a being should be composed of material substances, that man, being made in the image of God, meant duration of existence. He told us the Bible was like its author, far above our comprehension; that finite minds could not understand the words of infinite wisdom, and if the Bible was not far above his comprehension, he would throw it away. Such preaching seems very little like the sincere milk of the word. My husband and myself is all of the one faith that is left in Alden, of what was once quite a large church. We hope to hold fast our confidence to the end, and be ready to welcome our blessed Savior. SARAH R. FURRY.

ALDEN, Iowa, Dec. 5.

Since my last report through the RESTITUTION I have visited Illinois. Was there some three weeks. I had a good meeting, though there were no additions; still, there was a good interest manifested. I held meeting in De-Witt and McLean counties. There was a large turn out all the time. Brother Graham wrote to me to come prepared to have a discussion with a Campbellite minister, for they had a man ready and waiting. When I got there they were notified, and two propositions were sent to him, but he was not ready, and in fact, they did not want to debate. Then they told me at Hayworth, in McLean county, they would find a man to meet me, but that also failed. I went to the town and held meeting in the Christian meeting house, from Thursday night till Sunday night; there were some of the ministers there each night, but they did not offer to debate. I think there can be something done there in the future; the prospect is good. Brother Graham keeps the truth alive in that part of the country; he is able to defend the truth with any of them. I will return there again some time soon. I am now in Clinton county, holding meeting (in our state), will return here again the second Sunday in January, 1876. J. S. HAYDEN.

BRETHREN:—Since you published the attack of a correspondent upon me in the Anna Union, (which I only sent for your information at the office), it may not be out of place to let the brethren read the following, which appeared in the succeeding issue of the same paper:

RESPONSE BY MR. SANFORD.

In your issue of December 8th, you make mention of "Rev. Sanford," and while I am aware that no unkindness was intended, I beg leave to enter my protest against the use of the word "reverend," or its abbreviation, as a prefix to my name. My reasons are:

1. That I am not "worthy of reverence," being only a humble follower, or disciple, of him who said, "Be not ye called Rabbi: for one is your Master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren." (Matthew xxiii. 8.) There is no authority in all the Bible for elevating one disciple above another.

2. The title is only once found in the Sacred Writings, and there it is applied to Deity: "Holy and reverend is his name." Ps. cxi. 9. I do not see how any Bible Christian can permit himself to be called by so sacred a title, without objection. Notwithstanding, it is of common occurrence with the world and the Gentile churches.

Jesus said, "I receive not honor from men," (John v. 41), and in his words (v. 44) I would ask the clergy of these "perilous times," "How can ye believe, which receive honor one of an other, and seek not the honor which cometh from God only?" Webster says: "We style clergymen reverend; a bishop is styled right reverend; an archbishop, most reverend. In England a dean is also styled a very reverend. In Roman Catholic countries, the members of the different religious orders are styled reverend." But I can find no such style as Rev. John, Rev. Peter, Rev. Paul or Rev. James in the Bible, which should be the only rule of faith and practice for all the followers of the anointed Jesus. On the contrary Peter (2 Peter iii. 15) writes of Paul as "our beloved brother Paul." The endearing name of brother is the Scriptural word to be used by all the brethren of Jesus (Mark iii. 35), when speaking of or addressing each other. A few words with reference to the article of "Gospel Phact" on the "Second Coming of Christ," in the same issue of your valuable paper. I make no reply, but simply wish to call attention to the fact that the writer admits that he "knows not very much" about the subject upon which he writes—a fact that every Bible reader would readily observe by his use of such unscriptural phrases as "the gospel of glad tidings," "the immortal mind," etc. For his information, however, I may add that I am proclaiming "the glad tidings of the kingdom of God," (Mark viii. 1) "the gospel" which Jesus and his apostles preached more than eighteen hundred years ago, and if he will come and hear me, he will be enabled to make himself better acquainted with what I am "said to believe." If I am in error he will find no necessity for hiding behind a nom de plume, but with truth upon his side he can subscribe his full name, as I always do when I write for press. AMOS SANFORD.

DEAR RESTITUTION:—How I miss your welcome visits. I will just say that I am trying to preach the gospel of the kingdom, in Oregon, and the people are glad to hear the glad tidings, and some of them think it the most reasonable doctrine they ever heard. I have more calls than I can fill, for the reason I have to work for a living, and cannot devote my time as I would wish. Still I shall do all I can in the good cause. If there is any brethren in Oregon, please give me the address of such; and for their benefit, if there is any, just say that my address is Lafayette, Yamhill county, Oregon. Hoping to meet all in the kingdom, I am yours, H. C. PLEMMER.

BRETHREN:—Thinking there might be some of the readers of the RESTITUTION that would like to hear from me, I will try to write a few lines, and if you think them worthy, you may give them a place in its columns. I love the pages and the truths it advocates, and am trying to live so as to form a character that will be accepted of Christ at his coming, for unto them that look for him will he appear the second time without sin unto salvation. And his reward is with him to give to every man according as his work shall be. I believe that time is short, and that it is necessary for us to take unto ourselves the whole armor of God, that we may be able to stand in this the evil day, for wicked men and seducers are waxing worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived, and the love of many is waxing cold. Dear brethren and sisters, let us watch and pray that we be not of that number, but seeing we have purified our souls in obeying the truth through the spirit unto unfeigned love of the brethren; see that we love one another with pure hearts fervently, and so fulfill the law of Christ. Let us consider one another to provoke unto love and good works, and be more willing to bear one another's burdens and excuse faults; each one of us has our own peculiar disposition and circumstances to contend with, and then we know not our brother's heart. And I beseech you, brethren, to know them which labor among you, and are over you in the Lord, and admonish you; and to esteem them very highly in love for their work's sake, and be at peace among yourselves. 1 Thess. v. 12-14.

The brethren here are few in number and live so far apart that we do not meet very often, and so have no regular meeting. November 29th, the brethren met at the house of Brother Baldwin, and after necessary preparation repaired to the water, where father immersed Sister Loretta and husband. In the afternoon met at Brother Cattington's for social meeting and breaking of bread. I wish we could have regular meeting, for I feel that we ought not to neglect the assembling of ourselves together, to exhort and encourage one another to hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering. Father has preached at several different places during the past summer and fall, and we trust that his labors have not been in vain. But prejudice has such a strong hold on the minds of the people that but few are willing to come out to hear the truth. They do not like to have their pet theory of immortal soulism overthrown. We hope to be able to have a series of meetings here this winter, and, if so, trust that we may see some brought to a saving knowledge of the truth as it is in Christ Jesus.

I notice in our last weeks paper that the brethren are holding meetings in Argos. May the Lord bless them and add to their number such as shall be saved. We should enjoy being with them and hearing the gospel preached, for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth. In love and hope of the soon coming kingdom, I am your sister,

REBECCA A. BARNHILL.

CLAYTON, Mich.

STILL AT WORK.—Want of means prevents us from going abroad to proclaim the glad tidings, but I am still at work. At Bois Brule, Perry county, Mo., and at Bro. Cocke's, in Williamson county, Illinois, my expenses were met and something more. Indeed, at each of those places the generosity of the friends of truth was all that could be desired. In every other instance where I have lectured abroad, I came home with less money than I started with. But I do not complain of those who were willing to hear, for as a rule they were poor and did what they could. May God bless them and give them an abundant entrance into the kingdom. I receive numerous letters asking me when I am coming again; and my heart is troubled when I have to inform them that I am in debt for the last sack of flour, and don't know where the money is coming from to pay up and buy the next, which, of course, precludes the idea of traveling a hundred miles or more by rail to reach them. In all such cases I urge them to search the Scriptures, believe and obey the gospel, "looking unto Jesus the beginner and finisher of our faith." If there were only twenty good brethren in Southern Illinois who would contribute as liberally as "our beloved brother," H. M. Cocke, it would keep us at work nearer home, in a small circuit, for one year. At home I gave some lectures in my own house, as there were no means with which to hire a hall. Among the Adventists here I found one brother, who, although immersed by Elder T. Burr, of the A. C. Times, says he had the faith of the gospel before his baptism, and hence looks for the coming of Jesus to reign on the throne of his father David over the house of Jacob forever, and hopes to reign with him over the nations a thousand years. The most of the adventists, however, oppose me most bitterly, being advised so to do by their chief priests and elders. A few meetings were held at this brother's house, and then a saloon keeper tendered us the use of a hall, if we would seat it, which has been done and a course of one week's lectures resulted in bringing together a very respectable congregation of noble Bereans, who now meet regularly twice every Sunday. Next Sunday we meet to organize a Berean Sunday school, and propose to gather in the poor children of the city, who cannot afford to wear clothes good enough to enter the so-called sacred walls of the Gentile synagogues. At present, then, I am preaching twice every Sunday at home, but am at liberty to give a course of five nightly lectures at points of easy access from my home between Sundays. Will the brethren remember that I am living and laboring in "Egypt," amid the most intense mental and moral darkness, and aid me in this missionary work? AMOS SANFORD.

The All-Seeing Eye.

One day the astronomer Mitchell was engaged in making some observations on the sun, and as it descended toward the horizon, just as it was setting, there came into the range of the great telescope the top of a hill about seven miles away. On the top of that hill were a large number of apple trees, and in one of them were two boys stealing apples. One was getting the apples, while the other watched to make certain that nobody saw them, feeling that they were undiscovered. But the eye of Prof. Mitchell, seven miles away, with the great eye of his telescope directed fully upon them, seeing every movement they made as plainly as if he had been under the tree with them. So it is often with men. Because they do not see the eye which watches with sleepless vigilance, they think they are not seen. But the great open eye of God is upon them, and not an action can be concealed. There is not a deed, there is not a thought unknown to God.

Old Sins.

Dr. Guthrie says: "I have read of brave, stout captives, who have escaped from prison, but who brought away with them swollen joints or festering wounds, as marks and injuries of the cruel fetters. And do not old sins continue to hang about a man even after grace has delivered him from their dominant power? Who does not need every day and hour to resort to the fountain of cleansing, and wash his heart in the blood of Christ, oftener than he washes his hands in water? We need to be renewed day by day; converted as it were, not once or twice, but every day. Surely, the happiness of a child of God lies mainly in this—that sin though it remains within his heart, has ceased to reign there, and that, made perfect at length in holiness, he shall enter at last into the full and glorious liberty of the children of God.

OBITUARY.

WOODWORTH.—Sister Woodworth, wife of Christopher Woodworth of Millfield, Ohio, fell asleep in Jesus December 17, 1875.

I immersed Sister Woodworth and her husband in October, 1858. Since that time she has been a faithful believer and advocate of the one faith.

Before her death she selected the hymns and passages of Scripture expressive of her faith, which she requested me to read and use at her funeral. The hymns were 225 and 235 of the Christian Psalmist. The Scriptures were Deut. xxxiii. 25; Isa. lxv. 20; Rom. viii. 11; 1 Thess. iv. 13-17; Rev. xxii. 20. The doctrines brought to view in these passages are the following:

1. Dissolution.
2. State of death and its continued power to the resurrection.
3. Promise of a resurrection through Jesus.
4. Manner of the resurrection.
5. The blessed hope.

These are topics of such interest as to require at least a passing notice.

1. The Dissolution.—Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it. Eccl. xii. 7. The Bible investigates man analytically and synthetically. It teaches us who made man; of what he was formed, and how he was put together. Our text gives us his analysis—he is to the earth, and the spirit (breath) heavenly, etc.

Dissolution is not to annihilation. The loop of dust earth shows us the results of our dissolution. Not that the breath is any part of the human organism, its presence is essential to a living organism. Disease is the work of death; pain is the telegram to the brain, and a cry for help. The process of dissolution is exceedingly varied. It sometimes attacks the lungs, and slowly dissolves them, and through them every member in sympathy, till the whole person lies in ruins. At another time the brain is involved, insanity follows, and death is its fruit. Other members may be the first involved. Man is fearfully and wonderfully made, and the judge and throne in the process of dissolution are terrible.

His resurrection is graphically expressed in Eccl. xii. 6. The spirit (breath) does not leave the body while it is a living organism, as we learn from the above chapter, but simply as breath departs. And in the resurrection it returns in the same way. The command is to the four winds or spirits.

The dissolution in death is complete. It leaves no organ intact. The brain—the seat of thought—is equally involved. Eccl. ix. 10. No work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in sheol—the grave. Dissolution is a state in which there is no work, for the working system is in utter ruin. You might as well expect a watch to go on in its timeless ping with its wheels and springs spread out on the watch maker's table, as to look for any work from man in death. There is no device in death. Man is here always for calling, always at brain work. But in death his train dissolves. There is no memory—no wisdom. The notion that man thinks and acts better without a brain than with it, is as sublime as it is absurd.

The dead are not in that state for a few moments only, but, like the fallen tree, they have no power to change condition till the resurrection. The infidel may follow us so far. His views of the nature of man and his condition in death may so far coincide with ours. But from this point they diverge. The infidel leaves man in death as in an eternal sleep. The Christian's sleep is but a moment. He hears Jesus say, "I am the resurrection and the life."

The spirit that raised up Jesus shall quicken our mortal bodies." Rom. viii. 11.

The order of the resurrection is clearly set in 1 Thess. iv. 13-18. How comforting are these words! The blessed hope, and the believer's response are faithfully brought to view in Rev. xxii. 20. Facts so sure are the Scriptures that express our sister's faith and hope.

The motives her life to found in God (v. 12, "What she had to do, do it with all thy might." Though in the possession of ample means, she was an example worthy of imitation in physical labor. Her hands were ever either she sought work and always found it. She understood and practiced Christian benevolence. Though afflicted for years with an incurable disease, she was not discouraged, but rather stimulated to more active Christian work, knowing that her time for work was short.

In her life and in her death we have a bright example of the influence of our faith and hope.

To those who do not understand our faith, the idea of remaining in an unconscious sleep till the resurrection, is full of gloom. When fully comprehended, all gloom vanishes. For between the last thought in this life, and the first thought in the resurrected state, there is no space. We fall asleep, and awake in the same moment, to us, though really ten thousand years might intervene.

LAMBERT.—Dec. 4, 1875, 15 miles east of Nevada, Mo., J. F. Lambert.

Brother Lambert had suffered for the past five years of painful illness. He bore his sufferings during that long period with Christian patience and fortitude. He seemed resigned from the first. I was intimately acquainted with him though he lived 18 miles from this place. He had been a member of the Church of God for years before the death of his first wife, she being a powerful preacher of the One Faith for about 14 years of her life.

Brother Lambert was one of those believers that could go all around the dwellers of his friends and of unbelievers, in a convincing manner, and I have often thought more efficiently than I could from the pulpit.

We, and the few of the One Faith in this section, will miss our brother's mourning smile and loving, persuading voice, always ready to give an answer for the hope within him. When I think of his heart-broken wife, bereft of her husband, and his two little boys made fatherless, their loss is indeed heavy but I console them to Him who is a husband to the widow, and a father to the orphan.

Brother Lambert was in his 46th year, and when I think of him a few years in the past in his manhood—and now in his grave, I am forced to acknowledge that "death is not the gate of endless joy," but a terrible enemy. And in commending our brother to his resting place, which Job calls his house, I would repeat the following lines for all to read, and to have a hope that death cannot destroy:

Unveil thy bosom, faithful tomb!
Take this, our brother, to thy trust,
And gives these sacred relics room
To slumber in the silent dust.

Nor pain nor grief, nor anxious fear,
Invade thy bounds; no real ills
Can reach the brother sleeping here,
While angels watch his soft repose.

So Jesus slept; God's only Son
Passed through the grave, and blessed the bed
Rest here, brother, till from his throne
The morn shall break and pierce the shade.

Brother L. desired the 15th chapter of Job read, and prayer offered, but he was utterly opposed to funeral preaching.

Prayer.

BY RICHARD CRASHAW.

Two went up to the temple to pray.
Two went up to pray? O rather say
One went to brag, the other to pray.

One stands up close and treads on high,
Where the other dare not lend his eye.

One nearer to God's altar trod;
The other to the altar's God.

At Evening.

BY TENNYSON.

Lovely, shadowy, soft and still
In the eventide.
Ah! if but my heart and will
Evermore might so abide!
God, thy presence can alone
Make this lovely calm my own.

Bible Thoughts.

Come let us reason together. Isa. i. 18.
In the beginning God created heaven and the earth. Genesis.

God.—The original Hebrew is Elohim. It is a remarkable word, occurring for the most part in the plural, and yet generally, as here, a verb in the singular. The English word, God, is from the German, Gott, is of Anglo Saxon origin, and is supposed to be a contraction of good. God and good are considered correlative terms. The word denotes rank, authority, eminence, majesty. Jehovah Elohim (or Lord God), implies the eternal self-existence of the Most High. It is equivalent to the august name (Ex. iii. 14) I am that I am. The true import is also clear (Rev. i. 8) which was and which is to come. And I appeared unto Abraham, Isaac and Jacob by the name of Jehovah, or original Yehovah, was I not known. The Jews attached so much reverence to the name that in reading the Hebrew Scripture they substituted "Adonai," which is frequently applied to Deity, and is also rendered in our version Lord. The Scriptures themselves afford no warrant for this extreme scrupulousness. If it was lawful for Moses to write the name, it was equally so for his descendants to use it, unless expressly forbidden. Lord is an English word, from the Anglo-Saxon Hlaford contracted into Lovard, and finally into Lord. Therefore Jehovah, or Yehovah, Anglo-Saxonized into Lord, and implies giver of bread, or him who sustains his creatures.

The word Lord, when applied to the universal Benefactor, is very appropriate, yet it is to be regretted that Jehovah was not retained.

And God (Elohim) said let us make man, as if by consultation, and formed man from the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils (Hebrew—breath of life,) possessing the vegetable life of plants, sensitive life of animals, and that higher rational life, humanity. We are merely to understand by it a special act of Omnipotence, imparting power or respiration to the animal he had formed, in consequence of which the fully organized man became a living soul. We will not raise the point of an immortal soul, as the Scriptures do not recognize such a state of man, (it is only inferred), until after the resurrection. We shall touch upon this point at another time, showing its early origin, also when and how it crept in to be one of the tenets of the church.

And the Lord God said, It is not good that man should be alone. (Hebrew—not good is man in his separate or solitary state.) And God caused a sleep, ecstacy, or trance to fall upon Adam, and took one of his ribs, and made a woman. (Hebrew—builded her to a woman, and presented her to man.) And Adam said, This is now bone of my bone and flesh of my flesh. Can a mother forget her offspring, that is of her own flesh and blood? Neither could Adam forget her. They were both one flesh. And he said she should be called Isha—signifying manness.

The Anglo-Saxon is wombman. And the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden, and Adam and Isha lived and basked in the sunshine of their innocence. Oh! happy state! nothing of care and trouble, no disease, nor death—but innocence and purity! How long this happy couple thus lived and enjoyed their beautiful garden home, associating in the society of God and his holy angels, we cannot tell. But we know it was long enough to understand and know God, and for God to endow Adam with knowledge, so that God passed the animals in review before him, and as he named them, so it was.

We learn from the Sacred Word that there was war in heaven (Rev. xii. 14). That one of God's brightest spirits set up his will and power against the great Creator of all things, (Luke x. 18,) and was overcome by the blood of the Lamb, and cast out into the earth with great enmity to God and man, (Rev. xii. 10). And the weaker vessel, Isha, was to be the victim, through her weakness and his great malignity and wickedness towards God. Satan, looking down through the long ages, could see that to impregnate evil into the human family would give him great power over the creatures God had made and placed in this garden, and only through the woman could he germinate and cause to bring forth evils which are the lusts of the flesh.

Serpent.—The Samaritan copy reads, cacash, a liar or deceiver. The word serpent is from the Latin Serpo, to creep. The Hebrew term has no relation to the form or external attributes of the serpent. It is a term descriptive solely of mental properties, signifying to search or scrutinize closely, to find by experiment. The name is therefore more appropriate in its original to a rational being than to a reptile. The question resolves itself down to a plain matter of fact, or a visionary tale, and if we apply the Bible rule, (1 Tim. ii. 13, 14; 1 John iii. 8-12; John xii. 44; Luke x. 18;) we may rest assured of the literal meaning of the narrative. We know from Scripture of no other time in the history of this arch fiend when transformation was so likely to take place as at this period, when perhaps he assumed the form of a winged serpent which in Scripture is called a seraph or seraphim, from their luminous, burning, glowing, appearance, very naturally suggesting the phrase, angel of light. Here was set before the woman the great problem of life and death.

Sufficient to have stood, but free to fall.

Satan's only hope was to rule or ruin. And Patrick says this is the secret (or mystery) of the holy language that a serpent is called seraph, as an angel is called seraph, and then, after quoting Num. xxi. 8, adds that the Scripture calls serpents seraphim because they were offspring of the old serpent. I understand this as a matter of great concernment which can have no meaning I think, but this, the devil, whom St. John calls (Rev. xii. 9) the old serpent, is this serpent counterfeited, a glorious seraphim and seduced Isha (Eve) to give credit to him, thereby bringing evil, death and destruction into the world, which will reign from the corruption of Cain to the resurrection. Josephus tells us that Cain, who, as John says, was of that wicked one, was not only a murderer but was the establisher of weights and measures of lands, and laid tribute upon his brethren, and oppressed them for his own sinful lusts. Thus the seed of that wicked one had passed into the human family and death is the final result. We now notice the change of name from Isha as a wife to Havah (or Eve) as a mother, (meaning life,) the mother of all living. It is unnecessary to trace the history of woman from that little irregularity in the garden of Eden down through the long ages of time to the present. We have but to turn our eyes to the distant East and read its manners and customs to learn the the truth. I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception. Thy desire shall be to thy husband—(Hebrew—Subject to the will and pleasure of thy husband; Arabic—The direction of thee shall be with thy husband; see 1 Tim. ii. 14-15.) Thus Constable says that Eve having fallen, Adam, with his great love and pity for her, would not leave nor forsake her, but threw himself into the vortex. Without her he would not live, and with her he would die. Therefore he became a partaker of her sin and sorrow. Had we the time we could trace this stream of evil down through the human family, showing how it passed from generation to generation to the flood, and had it not been impregnated in the flesh, blood, and life of the human family, evil would have done away at the flood. But Noah and his family had the old virus in them, and brought it over the water. It has existed from Cain, and will exist until Christ will come to destroy evil from off the face of the earth, and set up a kingdom wherein dwelleth righteousness. For God has sworn by himself that out of of the loins of David (Ps. xxxxii. 11; lxxxix. 3,) he would raise up a seed who should judge his people righteously, (Ps. lxxii. 4-8, 17-19), and shall establish his kingdom in the earth (Rev. xxi. 3-24). We have shown that evil came into the world through the seed of that old serpent (John viii. 44), and we have the promise that the seed of the woman shall bruise the head of that old serpent, and finally exterminate evil from the face of the earth.

C. H. ADAMS.

What is Truth?—No. 2.

All power is given unto me in him, and in earth; go ye, therefore and teach (or make disciples or Christians) men of all nations, baptizing them in (or into) the name of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and, lo, I am with you always, even to the end of the world (age or dispensation). Matt. xxviii. 19, 20, 21. Baptizing them in, or into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit; into the name of the Father—our Father which art in heaven; how appropriate and endearing the appellation, and how befitting the occasion, when we forsake the service of the world, the flesh and the devil, and engage in the service of God our maker—preserver—and bountiful benefactor, to have the name of our heavenly Father called upon us. God is our Father by creation, for we are his offspring or children; but he is our Father in a higher and more perfect sense, when we consider the great scheme of human redemption. He is pre-eminently our Father, as the originator of men's salvation, by and through our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Here the Father and the Son, and the Spirit, are at perfect agreement; let us then have the whole name called upon us, that we may, indeed, be the children of our Father, which is in heaven, redeemed by the precious blood of the Son of God, taught by the Spirit through the word, which is able to make us wise unto eternal salvation.

Jewish prejudice was very strong against Jesus of Nazareth, even Peter and Paul had to be taken through a thorough course of training and experience, before they could see and understand God's mind and purpose in the call of the Gentiles. Salvation is of the Jews; this is truth. Nevertheless, the first shall be last, and the last first. It was a hard thing for a Jew to understand, and still more so for him to admit that the Gentiles, those hated dogs, were to be exalted to fill the high position of kings and priests in the kingdom of God. Herein is contained a good and sufficient reason why the apostles held up so prominently the Lord Jesus, the Son of God; but never in any instance detracting or falling from the character and attribute of our eternal Father. In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, trinitarians hold that this text proves the personality of the Holy Ghost, the third person in the adorable trinity. But will the Scriptures warrant such a conclusion? We answer, no. And when he had said this, he breathed on them, and saith unto them, "receive ye the Holy Ghost." John xx. 22. Did he breath into his apostles a personal being? Question: What is the root, or original, for spirit? Wind, air, or breath, so says an orthodox divine. The same author affirms that the Spirit came personally into the world on Pentecost, and is in the world now, though invisible to his children. Truly, this lacks consistency to say the least of it. After a careful consideration of this important subject, we come to the conclusion, that Matt. xxviii. 19, is a water baptism, a positive command of our Lord that Peter used a synecdoche, taking a part for the whole, and those who are baptized into the name of the Father, Son, and Spirit, are Scripturally baptized.

Our World, and What It Is Composed of.

Owing to the indefatigable investigation of the analytical chemists, and to their zeal in the cause of science, there is scarcely a substance in the world that has not passed through the ordeal of their crucibles and test tubes. From them we learn that our world is made up of comparatively few substances; so few, indeed, that we are struck with astonishment when we consider the innumerable variety of form and character into which these elements are capable of being molded. We have all the animate and inanimate creation, the plants, the animals; we have the rocks, the earths, the air and water, in their endless variety; and yet the substances of which they are composed do not exceed sixty. On closer examination our wonderful increases when we learn that of these elements no less than forty-six are metals, in the ordinary sense of the word; five are gaseous, bodies, like the air—which, indeed, consists of two gases out of these five; and the remainder are substances of an intermediate character, of which sulphur and charcoal are the types. Therefore everything that we can see or touch pertaining to our world is composed of one, two or more of these six elements; and in a general way there are rarely more than two or three blended together to produce one result. Thus, the white of an egg is made of six elements; a flint stone of only two; a piece of wood contains three elements. Those three materials are the types of the portions of the world to which they belong. Though one stone differs from another stone, and one wood from another wood, and one flesh from another flesh, yet their composition is similar, and of nearly the same elements. It is the nature, quality and property of these several elements that constitute the study of chemistry—not medicine, for that is but a mere branch of chemistry—the composition of all things. By analogy, the analytical chemist can state with certainty the principal qualities and composition of everything placed in his hands, what use to make of it, and how it is to be applied for the welfare and benefit of his fellow man.—Sel.

Immortality by Creation.

A few weeks ago I had the opportunity of hearing once more this popular doctrine defended by an able orthodox minister. His arguments were based on inferences which the positive and explicit statements of God's word contradict. Plain declarations must yield to inferences drawn from texts, which on a critical examination, are found to lend no support to the conclusions drawn from them, but, on the contrary, in several instances, are found sustaining the very opposite conclusions. This shows that the man is either dishonest, or that his preconceived opinions blind him to the truth. Of course I take the charitable view of his case. The speaker appealed to the texts always quoted to prove the immortality of the soul, but brought out nothing new in the argument. I shall offer some criticisms on his view of certain passages, and, for this purpose, will cit the texts from which he drew his conclusions. I will begin with 1st Thess. iv. 14: "For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so, them also which sleep in Jesus, will God bring with him." He remarked that these sleeping ones were in heaven, consequently must be the living souls of the dead; that they are with Jesus, otherwise they could not be brought with him. It is certain that this exposition is no solvent of the difficulties in which, as the speaker supposed, our view involved the passage; and it is just as certain, that it cumbers his own theory with difficulties which it would be hard for him to clear up. Let us see: These souls, according to this theory under examination, are in heaven. Paul affirms that they are asleep. The language implies continued sleep, without intervals of waking such as belongs to the present life. No time, then, for playing on golden harps or joining with the heavenly hosts in acts of homage to the Great Creator. Indeed, the earthly condition of alternate sleeping and waking is not in harmony with the Orthodox notion of the heavenly state, for they have asserted time and again that the soul requires no such recuperative process as sleep to restore wasted energy, for it suffers no waste or diminution of power. If sleeping and waking does not coincide with the popular view, as a matter of course, continued sleeping does not. What, then? Paul's affirmation stands, then that sleep in Jesus. Theologians assure us that this means that souls sleep in heaven. A prominent presiding Elder, whom I heard, after berating and ridiculing materialists, styling them soul-sleepers, appealed to this text in proof that the dead are alive. I felt like retorting, "you are a soul-sleeper." This would have been no misnomer, but an odious name; and I deemed it not courteous or kind to indulge in such a practice. The term, sleep, in this connection, has a meaning. It is either used in a literal or else in a tropical sense. It is conceded by all, that it is used in the latter sense, that is, as a figure of speech; but the common exposition of this text makes the word, as a figurative expression, carry a meaning forced and unnatural; and without any sanction, by precedent. In any other part of the Bible; a meaning that attaches to it no where in any composition except where consciousness in death is the subject under consideration at the hands of its advocates. The meaning forced upon it is: the highest degree of wakefulness, and, therefore, as any one can see, the farthest removed from any and every condition to which the word is applicable in its literal or figurative use, outside of the exception noticed above. Sleep, as employed here by Paul in figure, is a metaphor, a short simile, or comparison without the signs of the comparison. In the use of the metaphor there must be some resemblance or likeness between the things compared: the resemblance may be slight or relate to a single point, but some similarity must exist or the figure can not be used. In the case before us, the comparison relates to state or condition, and the term, sleep, expresses the likeness which literal death bears to literal sleep. The popular theory sweeps away all likeness between death and sleep. In sleep there is a suspension of the functions of the organs of sense as well as those of the voluntary and rational soul, says Webster. This is the definition of sleep, not dozing. The subject is helpless and useless. Knows nothing of what is around him and about him; and is incapable of reasoning. Now, where is the resemblance, between this state of suspended functions, and the Orthodox death which, instead of suspending any of the functions of thought, or feeling, or perception, only frees them from weakness and inability, and sends them forward on a plain of intense activity. Who ever heard of such a sleep, outside of popular theology? Said the minister to whom I have alluded, and others have uttered the same thought: "That which sleeps must be alive." More than once have I heard our opponents appeal to this part of Scripture as proof that death does not wholly kill. Now, since the term sleep, either literally or metaphorically, must denote a positive and explicit statements of God's word contradict. Plain declarations must yield to inferences drawn from texts, which on a critical examination, are found to lend no support to the conclusions drawn from them, but, on the contrary, in several instances, are found sustaining the very opposite conclusions. The Meeting at West Irving, Iowa.

After the close of the meeting at Argos, Ind., Bro. Reed being somewhat worn out and threatened with lung difficulty, I yielded to his earnest solicitation and filled his appointment to meet with the brethren of Iowa, at their conference at West Irving, the 14th inst. This was my first visit into Iowa, although a western man for twenty-three years. The meeting was a good one and full of interest, and I am very glad I attended it. I had an opportunity of meeting face to face, brethren whose names were familiar as household words, and clasping hands with them this side the kingdom. There was a pretty general representation from various parts of the state, and a good degree of interest manifested for the precious truths which God has committed to our keeping. The people of the vicinity turned out well and filled the house. The meetings were all full of interest, and the conference meeting of Sunday afternoon was especially so. Many of the members of the various churches adjoining took part in the exercises and showed that among all classes of men bearing the Christian name, there was a common bond of sympathy—a personal love for the Lord Jesus. Whatever may be the differences in other matters, all who sincerely love the Lord Jesus Christ, are one. And it is my experience that the more prominent this personal fealty to Christ becomes, the more hearty and irresistible the union. Every one who loves Christ is irresistably drawn to every other one who loves him; and if we will but keep this love alive in our hearts and be loyal to truth, having no bobbies to ride, nor axes to grind, all important differences between men bearing the Christian name will soon vanish from among us. May the day soon come.

"Till He Come."

In the churchyard of Hurstmonceaux, not far from the venerable ruin of that name, is a short quotation from Scripture on the tomb-stone of one well known and loved, whose life is so graphically pictured in "The Annals of a Quiet Life." "Till he come," was the simple yet pregnant inscription. Well did it express the faith, hope and love of the departed!

"Till he come." The body sleeps in the quiet grave until that day when the Lord shall come. "If we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him." What a glorious hope!

Death is not the hope of the Christian. Falling asleep is but an incident. We look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our body of humiliation, that it may be fashioned like unto his body of glory.

There is a great difference between holding the doctrine of the second coming and "waiting for his Son from heaven." One may hold the doctrine very clearly and intellectually, nay, combatively, and be but a tinkling cymbal "To wait for his Son from heaven," as did the Thessalonians, manifests a power of walk and conversation and holiness. "He that has this hope in him purifieth himself even as he is pure." "Wherefore, beloved, seeing that ye look for such things, be diligent, that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless."

Mr. Haley's Book.

Having read several very favorable notices of Mr. Haley's book entitled, Alleged Discrepancies of the Bible, I devoted some moments to an examination of it. The design of the author was to satisfy a demand on the part of the friends of the Bible for a work would present together in the compass of a small volume all the alleged discrepancies of divine revelation, with a clear and concise explanation of the difficulties involved. How well he has succeeded would be a disputed point among his reader. Among his orthodox friends his work will give general, if not almost universal satisfaction. With us, who are not of this class, his solution of doctrinal difficulties, in many cases, will be totally unsatisfactory; and his manner of speaking of us in some instances putting it mildly bordering on contempt; and his false charge of our clinging to a "bald literalism," by which we means language without figures of speech, are not calculated to bias us in favor of his unique volume. But I will say a word in its praise. While it contains some chaff, it also contains a great amount of wheat; and we have learned how to separate the two. It must be expected that a work emanating from the pen of any man, touching in a greater or less extent upon the great issues of faith will bear the stamp of the man's views, and those of the party to which he belongs. Then making this allowance I can commend the book to the brethren as one that fills a place in Bible literature which no other single volume does.

Recognition in Glory.

Not to believe in mutual recognition beyond the resurrection seems to me to be a far more reprehensible unbelief than that in the resurrection itself. I can well understand how a man should not believe in any life after death. I will confess that although probabilities are for it, the appearances are against it. But that a man, still more a woman, should believe in the resurrection of the very same body of Jesus, who took pains that his friends should recognize him therein; that they should regard his resurrection as their one ground for the hope of their own uprising, and yet not believe that friend shall embrace friend in the mansions prepared for them, is to me astounding. Such a shadowy resumption of life I should count unworthy of the name of resurrection. Then indeed would the grave be victorious, not alone over the body, not alone over all which made the life of this world precious and by which we arose toward the divine—but so far victorious over the soul that henceforth it should be blind and deaf to what in virtue of loveliest memories would have added a new song to the praises of the Father, a new glow to the love that had wanted but that to make it perfect. In truth I am ashamed of even combatting such an essential falsehood. Were it not that here a weak soul is paralyzed by the presence of the monstrous lie, and we dare not allow sympathy to be swallowed up of even righteous disdain, a contemptuous denial would be enough.—Dr. Geo. MacDonald.

THE RESTITUTION,
Plymouth, Indiana.

Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations. The restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths, it also advocates; a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Nonresponsibility.—The Editor must not be understood as endorsing all the sentiments expressed by correspondents whose articles are inserted under this head. Each writer is alone responsible for the article bearing his own signature. If the doctrine of any writer is not endorsed, an article setting forth the views of the party differing may be forwarded. Free discussion of Bible doctrines on all sides will be allowed, but the Editor reserves the privilege of criticising those communications which antagonize a belief and obedience of the Gospel as a means of salvation, or which undermine its principles.

A Sermon

Delivered by A. F. Dugger, Nov. 7th, 1875, on the Funeral Occasion of Bro. Wm. Marsh.

"I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing." 2 Tim. iv, 6-8.

BRETHREN AND FRIENDS:—We have assembled to-day under a solemnity entailed upon us by Adam, our federal-head. Death to him was a direct punishment, but to us, a calamity. To illustrate: Suppose this government had power for certain crimes to inflict banishment. A man and wife render themselves obnoxious, and are banished to some remote island; in which condition they rear up a family. Banishment to the parties banished, would be a direct punishment, but to the children a calamity entailed upon them by their parents. Just so, our parents stand related to us. We die not as a punishment for Adam's sin, but as a calamity entailed upon us through the transgression of our first parents by whom sin and death entered our mundane sphere; since which time death, that relentless disturber of all human affairs, has been carrying its victims to the tomb. Death, unmoved by appeals to sympathy, insensible to the distress of others, knows no tender tie; values no earthly connections. The humble and the proud, the saint and the sinner, the philanthropist and the misanthrope, the young and the old, must alike bow to the King of terrors; and be brought to the grave, the house appointed for all living. Is it any wonder that Paul should call death "an enemy?" This grim monster, death, has taken from our fond embrace our much loved and aged brother, Wm. Marsh; a respected citizen, a kind companion, a loving parent, and a devoted follower of Christ. Though some months have passed since we laid our brother away to rest in quiet sleep, in the dark, silent tomb, until the light of the glorious dawn of the resurrection morn, so long foretold by holy seers of old; still melancholy effects linger in our memory. Such afflictions are not soon forgotten. Deceased was a brother to the late and much lamented Elder Joseph Marsh, of Rochester, N. Y., editor of the Bible Expositor, devoted to the great cardinal truths of Christianity. When a mere youth, many a night, have I sat over the midnight lamp, and perused its pages which always pointed to the "Word of God" as the only rule of faith, doctrine, and practice. Though, he, too, has passed away, and now rests in the sleeping chamber of the dead. The seeds of truth which he scattered broad cast over the land, are bringing forth fruit. The paper still lives and prospers under the title, the RESTITUTION," and is ably edited by our highly esteemed brother, H. V. Reed.

When the apostle gave utterance to my text, he was under the sentence of death, and knew that shortly he would be put to death. As is natural under such circumstances, he takes a retrospective view of his past life, after which he triumphantly exclaims: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing." What a glorious victory over sin and the flesh. What a grand terminus to life's toils and labors. The work—faith, the labor of love, and patience of hope, all finished,—just now to fall asleep—in the arms of a loving Savior, to rest in Jesus' keeping, free from the cares, toils, and perplexities of this life. How bright and clear is the testimony: "I have fought;" "I have finished my course;" "I have kept the faith." The battle has been severe, the struggle long; I have had fightings without, and fears within; I have wrestled not against flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers, against spiritual wickedness in high places; I have been beaten with rods of the Jews; five times received I forty stripes save one; "I have been in perils of waters in perils of robbers, in perils by my own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren," 2 Cor. ix, 24-26. Under all these circumstances, the apostle proved faithful. None of these things moved him from the faith of the Gospel. For the hope of Israel he was bound with a chain. In hope of the promised inheritance, he stood in judgment in the presence of Agrippa. In hope of the resurrection of the dead, he was called in question. All this he meekly bore, knowing that "he who had promised, was faithful; and, that our light affliction, which is but for a moment, would work for us a far more exceeding, and eternal weight of glory. Thus he stood the test, and won the prize to be given, not at the end of the race, but in that day, specified in the first verse, when "Jesus Christ shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and kingdom." Then will our brother Paul, that noble apostle, be crowned. So will our brother, who now sleeps in the cemetery. While others over him weep, with him, the battles of life are over. He has fought the good fight of faith, finished his course, and died in the triumphs of a living faith. He sleeps, but not forever. There will be a glorious dawn, the dawn of the better day, on that bright morrow, the resurrection morn. God's dead men shall live again. The language of inspiration, adressed to the dead, is, "Awake, and sing, ye that dwell in dust; for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead." When the long, dark wintry night of death is past, and the spring morn of the resurrection shall have dawned, through the dews of God's creative power, their lifeless forms shall feel the power of an endless life. Job asks the interesting question; "If a man die, shall he live again?" Christ the Life Giver, answers: "I will raise him up at the last day." Martha believed in the teaching of Christ, and she said of her brother, who had died: "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection, at the last day." Our only hope of future life is in Christ. He is "the resurrection, and the life." He testifies; "I am he that liveth, and was dead, and behold, I am alive forevermore. Amen; and have the keys of hell, and of death." The power is his to throw open the cruel gates of the grave, and redeem us from its power. This work he will accomplish at the time appointed by the Father. When the trump of God shall sound, "the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." Then shall the saints, of all ages and nations, receive immortality. Death swallowed up in victory, they will then shout, "O, death, where is thy sting? O, grave where is thy victory?" Forever free from sin and death, they sing the new song, saying: "Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof, for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation; and hast made us unto our God kings and priests; and we shall reign on the earth." Rev. v, 9, 10.

Such was our brothers hope. He died in the faith and hope that Christ would raise him up at the last day, to live and reign with him on the earth. This hope has unchange ground. It is an anchor to the soul—both sure and steadfast; taking hold of that within the vail. It is the only hope that takes hold of Christ, the only hope that will anchor us in the haven of eternal rest, to be enjoyed in the kingdom of God, located on the plains of Eden restored. The hope, that takes hold of Christ, grows out of the promises of God, concerning the church, Israel, the nations, and the earth; to be fulfilled under the personal reign of Messiah, on the throne of his father David. Any other hope is a "spider's web, and shall be cut off." The true hope is defined, "The hope of Israel." Acts xxviii, 20. "The hope of the promise." Acts xxvi, 6. "The hope of eternal life." Titus i, 2. "The hope of the resurrection." Acts xxiii, 6. These different elements, taken as a whole, constitute the "one hope" Eph. iv, 4. In hope of the resurrection, our brother died. We fully believe, with our father Abraham, that God is able to raise him from the dead, and fashion his vile body like unto Christ's glorious body. This is the Bible hope; and will be consummated at the personal advent of Messiah. Hence, the apostle writes: "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope, in him purifieth himself, even as he he is pure," 1 John iii, 23. When this grand event transpires, then, and not until then, will Paul, and all others of like precious faith, receive the crown. Else Peter made a mistake, when he said: "And when the chief Shepherd shall appear, we shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away" 1 Pet. ii, 4. If we are to receive the crown when the chief Shepherd appears, we are not to receive it before he does appear. Paul, the author of the text, corroborates this view, when he says: "When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory." Col. iii, 4. If it is then, at the coming, that we receive glory, it is not this side of his appearing. Our Divine Redeemer, while here in the flesh, unfolding the way of life and immortality, taught, that the reward would be given at the "resurrection of the just." Luke xiv, 14. Said Christ: "Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give to every man as his works shall be." Rev. xxii, 12. If his reward is with him, it is not without him. If the reward comes when the Master comes, we can not receive it prior to his coming. It is evident, the apostle took this view of the subject, from the consideration, that, in the text, he points out the coming of Christ, as the period when he expected to receive the crown. Under no circumstances, whatever, can the church dispense with the coming of Christ, and the resurrection of the dead. The second personal advent is the hub in the grand wheel of truth, around which all other truths cluster. If Christ fails to visit this planet, earth, again, as he has promised, the second time, without (a sin offering) unto salvation, all is lost. This is clear from what Paul says to the Hebrews, (Heb. ix, 28,) also to the Corinthians: "If, after the manner of men, I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me if the dead rise not? let us eat and drink; for to-morrow we die." 1 Cor. xv, 32. Paul's argument is; that those who have died, are dead, not alive; are unconscious, not conscious; and in order for them to live again, and possess consciousness, it will necessitate a resurrection from the dead,—a positive reliving again. It is plain that Paul's only hope was in the coming of Christ, and the resurrection of the dead. To the Philippians, he says, he labored, "If by any means he might attain unto the resurrection of the dead." Phil. iii, 11. Wheaton, in his notes on this text, says: "Paul seems to pass over the intermediate state very lightly." Yes, I think so does; so lightly that he does not teach it at all. That is just how lightly he passes it over. The prophets and the apostles knew nothing of an intermediate state of consciousness. Such an idea is heathen in its origin, and foreign from the Gospel. The second coming of Christ, the resurrection, and the kingdom, was the burthen of the prophets, and the theme of the apostles. The sum and substance of the teachings of the holy prophets of God, are incorporated in these words of Paul: "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven, with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we, which are alive, and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air, so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore, comfort one another with these words." 1 Thess. iv, 16, 17, 18. To those called to mourn, now bowed down in grief, we offer these words of comfort,—words of consolation: "Refrain thy voice from weeping, and thine eyes from tears." Thy loved one shall come again. We shall behold him among the vine-clad hills of Eden restored, where the rude billows of death shall forever cease to roll,—where the glory is for all, and all are glad. May this be one happy lot; to meet the good and holy of all ages, and, with them, unite in singing the new eternal song: Death, the last foe, is vanquished,—God is all in all. Amen.

The above is a statement made by Mr. Hunting in the Unitarian conference, convened at Janesville, Wis. "The widest liberty in Christ" is the Unitarian watchword. Although it is not the motto, as yet, inscribed on the banner of the self-styled Orthodox sects, there is a disposition shown, and a effort, more or less systematic, being made by them to break down the division walls, to overstep the narrow bounds of creeds for the purpose of massing the religious forces for the more rapid conquest, and the more speedy realization of their dream, the world's conversion. Union prayer meetings, union Sabbath schools, union revivals, union papers, and the recently inaugurated holiness meetings, and the evangelical alliances, are so many straws showing which way the wind blows. "In union there is strength." But will this talent and liberal spirit be carried so far, on the part of the so-called Evangelical Christians, as to allow them to shake hands and make common cause with unorthodox liberal sects.

Whenever they can endorse the proposition of Mr. Hunting, there will be very little in the way of this broader fellowship and co-operation. But this matters nothing to us; inasmuch as we believe that they all are antagonizing God's great system of faith; and the extent of our charity, only concedes that they are moral reformers. The broad, charitable and simple creed of Unitarianism may come to the rallying point of the professed Christian world, but it can never be the platform of the few who have promised fealty to God in faith and obedience. Mr. H. of course does not mean to be understood as sinking all faith out of sight in the question of Christian character. He would demand faith in the existence of God and in his attributes without raising the inquiry whether He is one God—or three equal God's in one. That would be a matter of indifference to him. He means that faith in the dogmas which have made and divided Christian sects, shall not be a bar to their union and fellowship in worship and labor. With this view a very large part of the Gospel, embracing nearly all the exceeding precious promises in Christ, would be treated as speculative opinions, with nothing vital to Christianity, or essential to salvation, belonging to them. He and all such would esteem us good Christians, entitled to their sympathy and fellowship. It would not be possible for us to reciprocate their regards in the same manner, holding as we do, that the Gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one who believes it. We dare not narrow down this Gospel in order to widen our charity. God demands faith in this only Gospel, followed by obedience in the act of baptism, which inducts into Christ.

Then comes the development of Christian character by continued obedience to the requirement of God's word. The standard is one of faith. All that the Christian does, in rendering service to God, is in the realm of faith; consequently the character is of faith and this must rest on the commandments and promises of God, and not in the conjectures and vagaries of men. Everywhere, and from all sides, our ears are greeted with irreverence toward God in these words: "It makes no difference what we believe, if only the heart is right." The heart that utters such a sentiment is not right having never been purified by faith. No difference what we believe! So Tilton, Beecher, Frothingham, and some denominations, styling themselves Christians, utter the infidel sentiment: "No resurrection of the body except the blooming flower, spreading oak, and trailing vines." Science has subverted their faith in this great leading doctrine of the Gospel. Paul would call such perverters, overthrowers, and deniers of the faith. Nearly every promise of the Gospel has been supplanted by some heathen notion slightly remodeled by the Catholics, and further changed when adopted into the Protestant creed. Preach to men the unvarnished truth in the very words of the Holy Spirit and very likely you will incur the odium of two-thirds of the congregation, but called a false prophet and many other hard names. Very few have any faith in what God has said in reference to eternal life, the kingdom, the coming of Christ, the resurrection of dead men, and many other things brought to view in the word of God.

JOHN L. WINCH.

Our Heavenly Calling.

BY O. W. GREEN.

We live in anticipation. Glancing onward, the eye of the mind lays hold of some object. We act from motive. To act otherwise were to act without reason. Man looks forward, hoping for prosperity and enjoyment. What ever gives promise of happiness, is cherished in the archives of memory. Take away man's hopes of the future, and you leave him an aimless, meaningless wanderer upon the face of the earth. With neither aim nor object in view, and naught to stimulate him onward, he would sit down wearily, and rust away in idleness. Let him have a glittering object of hope to cheer his journey through life, and we find him with an incentive to activity. The prospect of success in life is the motive power that moves him onward. Zeal and faithfulness are recognized as essential to success by all who deserve to succeed; and he who fails through the lack of these, has little human sympathy.

But man needs to look beyond this life. Could hope pass not beyond the dreary tomb, we should indeed be miserable. But God in mercy has given his word to man as the ground of hope beyond this vale of tears. A kingdom looms up, grand and glorious, in the distance, when a king shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgment. The mighty scepter of earth's rulership shall pass forever from wicked hands; and God's anointed King, with his princes will shower blessings on the world. Nay, more. We need not stop here. Our ground of hope beckons us onward to this kingdom, and consoles us with the prospect of immortality. Rapturous thought! To live forever in the paradise of God! Further, no ill shall reach that blessed land whose walls shall be called salvation, and whose gates shall be called praise. In that heavenly country, the weary saint will be made like unto his glorious Lord, for he shall see him as he is; and he will be overshadowed with glory.

"Thy sun shall no more go down; neither shall thy moon withdraw itself; for the Lord shall be thine everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended. Thy people also shall be all righteous; they shall inhabit the land forever, the branch of my planting, the work of my hands, that I may be glorified." Isa. lx: 20-1.

"The tabernacle of God shall be with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people; and God himself shall be with them and be their God. And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things are passed away." Rev. xxi. 3-4.

Surely God hath given "exceeding great and precious promises" to his waiting children, to encourage them by the way. Let us not falter or make shipwreck of faith; but walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called with all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering, forbearing one another in love, endeavoring to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace; and in due time we shall reap if we faint not.

There is no other calling so high as the Christian's; and there is no other calling that promises as much to man. Stranger to the covenant of promise, why not walk in this calling? Why not enjoy the Christian's hope, and share his joys in the smiles of our Redeemer? The Gospel invites you to accept salvation. Why refuse Come! O come to Christ and live!

What of the Night?

If ever there was a time for true watchmen it is now. Now is the time for true men. Men who will be faithful to duty and stand firm at their post. We know that it is not a time of war but of peace, and all the signs tend to lull the careless into quiet rest. This calm, now brooding over the world, weighs down in awful gloom.

The moral darkness was never so great. True, no battle cry comes from the hills, no moan of anguish comes from the field of blood. But this dead calm, who can interpret it? Men's hearts are filled with dread. The gloom thickens, and the swift current seems to be hurrying, as into a dense cloud of blackness.

Kings on their thrones tremble. Philosophers are amazed. Moralists stand speechless before the revelations of disloyalty, corruption and wickedness in high places. The great heart of humanity is burdened beneath its load of grief. Men, who once stood upon the watchtower, and cried: "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh," are now indifferent and still. Their voices are hushed in this universal calm, which holds the winds of judgment. The night has been long, the waiting has grown weary, and the church and world are wedded in the same quiet repose. The cry of peace and safety, and "my Lord delayeth his coming," has become the opiate. All are asleep. The days of Noah have returned. Sodom again repeats its shame and defames God. Iniquity abounds—the love of many has waxed cold. Formality has taken the place of earnestness, and conformity to the world answers the demands of the church. Infidelity is bold and defiant, and flaunts its treason into the very face of heaven. Christianity is rocked in the world's cradle, and is made secure by fair promises. A change must come. This suspense cannot last. There must be a crash. Justice will not sleep forever, neither will judgments always slumber. "Behold the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity." The cry from the desert, and the prayers of the humble, have arisen as incense to the throne, and from the altar in heaven there will soon gleam the awful lightnings of judgments staid. The words of the watchman yet ring in solemn warning. "What of the night?" The answer is ever ready, "The morning cometh, so also the night." The morning of peace to the humble, trusting child of God; but the night of death, to him who is not shielded beneath the pavilion of mercy.

The Oldest Manuscripts.

The two most ancient manuscripts of the Bible known, are the Codex Sinaiticus of the imperial library at St. Petersburgh, and the Codex Vaticanus of the Vatican library at Rome, both of which are believed to have been written about the middle of the fourth century, A. D. The Sinaiticus, so called because it was obtained (in 1860) from the convent of St. Catharine on Mount Sinai, is supposed by Tishendorf, its discoverer, to be one of the fifty copies of the Scriptures which the Emperor Constantine directed to be made for Byzantium, in the year 331, under the care of Eusebius of Cesarea. It consists of 354½ leaves of very fine vellum, made either from the skins of antelopes or of asses, each leaf being 14⅞ inches high by 13½ inches wide. The early history of the Vatican manuscript is not known, but it appears in the first catalogue of the Vatican library in 1475. It is a quarto volume, containing 146 leaves of fine, thin vellum, each 10½ inches high and 10 broad. Both manuscripts are written in Greek uncials, or capital letters, are without spaces between the words, and have no marks of punctuation.—American Cyclopædia.

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.

☞We are to spend next Sunday with the Church in Goodland, Ind. Shall be glad to see as many as possible at the meeting.

☞We are indebted to Bro. Samuel Fletcher, of Nottingham, England, for a number of papers of a recent date, containing many valuable news articles bearing upon the Old World.

Decline in Faith.

The following from the New York Independent shows how men feel upon the subject of religious faith. The picture must be a sad one to those who are looking for a millennium before the Lord comes. The word of God assures us that men will become formal and indifferent toward Christ as the age of the Gentiles is closing. But here is the extract:

There are a good many things just now to make people ask what constitutes genuine preaching. On one hand, there is a decided decline in attendance at church. Granting all that is claimed for the fact of awakened religious interest throughout the country, it is still the few and not the many who feel any movement of interest. As you go from town to town, the churches, as a general rule, are thinly attended. The regular ministers do not seem able to win good attention. In many places the churches are slowly dying out. There is no longer felt any special responsibility to sustain them. A large number of very respectable people of the class who were faithful churchgoers a generation ago have now learned to stay at home on Sunday and spend the day in reading and quiet social enjoyment. The fact shows itself in a score of ways that preaching as commonly heard does not hold the attention of the people.

Another Heretic.

Mr. Macdonell, pastor of the most influential Presbyterian church in Canada, and really the most able clergyman of that denomination in the Dominion, recently preached a discourse upon the Hereafter. In his charitable view of the goodness of God, he overstepped the bounds of the thirty-nine articles, and claimed a more hopeful view than eternal misery. The Presbyterian clergymen of Toronto at once took Mr. Macdonell to task for his heresy. He met the question in a brave, manly way, and frankly expressed his doubts upon the subject of an eternal hell for sinners. The chastising clergymen have given Mr. M. an opportunity to reassert his adhesion to the old Westminster Confession, on or before the next meeting of the Assembly. Thus, one by one, the ablest, purest and most honest orthodox clergymen are leaving the old iron-bound creeds, and asserting their liberty. The time is not far distant when the doctrine of endless misery, so abhorrent to all the better feelings of mankind, will be expunged from the hearts, if not from the creeds, of all who love God,—because he is love. Men with liberal views, and in holy communion with God that is pure and good cannot entertain sentiments which blacken the character of God, and make life a burden. Old dogmas, founded in the dark ages, must give way to the light of heaven, which glows in love toward men. Mr. M. has our warmest sympathy in the struggle before him, but if he has tasted of the sweet spirit of Christianity, the creeds of men can no longer hold him. "The path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

Church Union.

An intelligent correspondent wishes us to give our views upon the subject of church union. In other words, is there a common ground upon which all Bible Christians can unite in worship? If by Bible Christians is meant all those who accept the Bible alone as their rule of faith and practice, and who have become obedient to the Gospel, we would say they are one. It does not require whereases and resolves to make them one. No mechanical system of councils is needed to unite those whose hearts and hopes are fixed in the Gospel of Christ. If, on the other hand, church union means the union of all the names and denominations of modern Christendom, then we must confess to serious misgivings. The word union, means agreement, or concord. Where this agreement does not exist, there can be no union. There may be toleration and liberty of speech, but not union. Some people have no higher ideas of church union than for a mass of people of conflicting views, to organize mechanically upon some plan for co-operation. Such a view dwarfs the whole scheme of human redemption into an organic system with the power of truth left out. It is the truth that makes free, it is truth that sanctifies, and it is further recorded: "Thy word is truth." The word of God then, is the only basis of union. No man, made free by the Gospel of Christ, can surrender his faith in the word of God for the sake of a mere human organization. Bodies of men have fulminated decrees, made articles of faith and creeds, upon men to subscribe to, or be damned. Fortunately for those who are branded as "heretics," the decrees of synods are as harmless as the by-laws of a lyceum. As a rule, those who clamor for union on the mere organic plan, desire others to surrender their personal faith, and their distinct individuality and subscribe to a church organization whose doctrines and plans are opposed to the simplicity of the truth. This, no intelligent heir of promise can endorse. Where men have a common sentiment upon the great essentials of truth, they are one, whether they are organized or unorganized. Men may organize, or belong to the same church, and in no sense be partakers of that oneness in Christ our Lord. There is a broader, a higher and a holier union than mere organization. The spirit of truth, the love of truth, yea the truth itself must underlie all true oneness, or union. Without it there can only be wars, dissensions, pride and ambition. When men submit to the Divine word and avoid human entanglements, they are free and belong to that invisible brotherhood scattered now, but soon to be gathered in the holy union of a family having one faith, one Lord, one spirit, one hope, one calling, one baptism and one God.

Decline of Turkey.

The evidences of Turkey's downfall grow stronger as we approach that sublime era, known to the student of prophecy as the end of Gentile times. Between now and then there will come some great change in the affairs of the Sublime Porte. As long as Turkey holds Palestine, so long will the times of the Gentiles continue; but when that power is driven out, we may know that we are hearing the consummation.

The following, from the N. Y. Witness, is interesting in view of the new complications in Turkish affairs:

There cannot be the slightest reason for doubt that at any moment the great powers of Europe may precipitate the fall of Turkey. None of the empires, Germany, Austria or Russia, desires the death of the dying man just at present. Not one of them has any love for him, and still less respect. These long years the organs of the Czar have at intervals burst into a wail of indignation and sympathy over Christian subjects of the Porte, and at avidly kept alive the hostility to Turkish rule which now excites alarm. The Russian ambassador at Constantinople makes no secret of his views of the frailty of the tenure by which the Turk retains a foothold upon the continent of Europe. He asserts that Servia and Montenegro could, at any time, be let loose upon the Turk; and the flames of revolt would spread to Bulgaria. This would be the destruction of the rule of the Turk. The Porte cannot delay the evil day. 'A liberal Sultan and a liberal Pope,' says a French Journalist, are equally impossible.'

Russia has no intention of being shut up in the Black Sea. It was seen that when Great Britain bought up the Suez canal, sent a strong fleet to the Mediterranean, and placed Gibraltar and Malta on a war footing, something had been left out of consideration in the Eastern Question. The speech made some time ago by Mr. Disraeli, at the dinner given by the Lord Mayor of London, is now worth reading over again. His prediction that peace would be probably maintained, and that British interests would be carefully guarded in case of the settlement of the Eastern Question, covered a world of knowledge. The purchase of the Suez canal by Great Britain startled Gortschakoff from his repose, and brought him to Berlin. A new method of dealing with Turkey was the result of the visit to Bismarck.

* * * * *

She now hopes that some complication may ensue which will favor a spring upon Turkey. The Russian people strongly sympathize with the provinces in Turkey lately in insurrection, and a war against the Porte would be very popular among all classes in the dominions of the Czar. With this Eastern question ready to explode at a moment's notice, like a mine, all Europe one large arsenal, and Great Britain contemplating making soldiers of her entire population capable of bearing arms, many express the greatest apprehension for the peace of the continent, and the fear appears to be well grounded, that the next European war will be terrible indeed.

Christian faith and Christian practice mutually befriend each other.

Unitarians and The Truth.

The philosophy of the spiritual world is not uniform with Unitarian believers. Some have it nicely drawn out and can make pictures of it, while with others it lies vague and undefined. But all that I know agree in rejecting the crude notion of the resurrection of the physical body, and in denying any necessary union between the soul and body after death has parted them. Most Unitarians believe in the recognition of departed friends: that souls which have been joined on earth in love will still keep union in the spiritual world; that in the disembodied world here are no sacrifices, families and kindreds, though the physical ties exist no longer. There are some who think and speak of heaven as a place; but the faith of the wisest treats heaven as a state, which may be as real on the earth as beyond the earth.

The above paragraph we clip from a published sermon, preached by Rev. C. H. Brigham at the installation of Rev. J. N. Pardee in Jackson, Mich., Oct. 20, 1875. Mr. Brigham is one of the most popular and orthodox clergymen in this country, and we may safely say, that, he is a representative man among the Unitarians.

There is one sentiment in the above paragraph which seems to us to be in direct conflict with the word of God. We refer to the following sentence: "But all that I know agree in rejecting the crude notion of the resurrection of the physical body," etc.

Here then is a plain outspoken denial of any bodily resurrection. Mr. Brigham professes to take the Bible as his rule of faith and practice and to be governed by its teachings. And yet strange as it may appear, he accepts the doctrine of the natural immortality of the soul, which is no where mentioned in the Bible, and openly rejects the resurrection of the body, which is taught in hundreds of passages. How can this be? If the Bible is our standard of faith must we not believe what it teaches? There can be but one answer to this question. Now we are prepared to ask, what do the scriptures teach upon the subject of the resurrection of the dead?

In answering this question we must be governed by the same rules of language which apply to all human testimony. Aside from the Bible there is nothing certain or satisfactory upon the subject of human destiny. In view of this fact we should be loyal to its promises. What then is said upon this question of the resurrection. Can the texts bearing upon this subject be so twisted away as to mean only the transition of the soul from the body, or a mere spiritual exaltation in Christ in this life? Let us examine a few passages. "And they found the stone rolled away from the sepulcher. And they entered in and found not the body of the Lord Jesus. And it came to pass, as they were much perplexed thereabout, behold two men stood by them in shining garments: And as they were afraid and bowed down their faces to the earth, they said unto them; why seek ye the living among the dead?" Luke 24:2-5

"Certain women approached the sepulcher with spices but they found not the body of Jesus. If this testimony is worth anything it proves that our Lord's body had been removed from Joseph's tomb. The question is, who removed it? Three days before this event is said to have happened an honorable man had taken the body of Jesus from the cross and placed it in his own new tomb. It is now taken away. Some power, human or divine has removed the body. Was it done by the gardner? Did the soldiers take Jesus away? Or shall we accept the Jews version of the affair and say the disciples stole his body while the soldiers were asleep? No Bible man can take any one of [illegible]. But one other position remains, God raised Jesus bodily from the dead. Any system of reasoning which does away with this conclusion stands equally opposed to the testimony. To say that the Apostles were honest but mistaken, that the whole affair was an illusion, or a dramatic dream is a polite way of denying what was affirmed under the most solemn and impressive circumstances. The proof is pointed that our Lord's body was removed from Joseph's tomb. Some one took it away. And it was taken away on the third day; the very time that Jesus said he would rise again. The disciples did not see Jesus alive until the third day. Now if his real personality was not involved in his death upon the cross why did he wait until the third day before showing himself to his disciples. All the incidents bear upon the third day and the resurrection is said to have taken place at the tomb of Joseph. Again, his subsequent appearance, the showing of his hands and of his sides proved identity, and indeed every other circumstance, such as eating with his disciples after his resurrection, shows that he was the identical person raised that was placed in the grave. To deny this is to deny the record and set at naught the whole scheme of christianity. It is then established that one being has been raised literally from the dead. No sophistry can evade it, no cunning interpretations can explain away the facts. For thus it is written.

If the doctrine of a bodily resurrection is a "crude notion" to be rejected, what shall we do with the case of Lazarus. Did not Christ raise him from the dead? Did not the event occur on the fourth day, at the grave, and did they not loose him and let him go? Was this also a farce? Did the apostles dream this? Again. A procession is stopped at the gate of the city of Nain, and a certain young man, the only son of a widow, is raised from the dead in the presence of the whole multitude. Was this a vision? The prophet declares: "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing ye that dwell in the dust for thy dew shall be as the dew of herbs and the earth shall cast out the dead." Is. 26:19. Indeed the whole drift of Bible language upon this subject necessitates the conclusion that those who are dead shall some day come to life. They are to be raised from the sea, from their graves, from death. The resurrection is to occur when a multitude will come forth at the same time. Mortal bodies, are to be quickened by the spirit of God. But it is useless to array textual proofs upon this point. There is only one side to the question.

Therefore if the resurrection of the body is a "crude notion" the Bible is responsible for it. And we may try to twist the language as we please it will ever stand among the plainest truths of Revelation that those who are in their graves will come forth. We know that scientists reject the doctrine. Philosophers reject it, they did in Paul's day. When the philosophers at Mars' hill, heard of the resurrection, some mocked, men mock now. But "why," says Paul "should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?" The question to the Roman king is pertinent now. But is it not strange that this question has now to be pressed upon a class who claim to be Christians? Let Unitarians pause before they plunge headlong into the position of the Athenians at Mars' hill.

Good News from India.

The following from the London Christian World of Dec. 3, will show the wide-spread interest in the doctrine of future life in Christ alone. In far distant India, it seems, it is becoming a theme of serious consideration and investigation. As an article of intelligence from a remote quarter of our world, we trust it may interest our readers:

A great many of our readers will know that The Friend of India is one of the most influential and reputable of the English journals published in our eastern empire. It was founded by Mr. Marshman, the great missionary pioneer, and was owned and edited for many years by his son, Mr. J. Carey Marshman. Although not a strictly religious paper, it has always taken account of the religious movements of the country, and sympathised with all the educational and missionary efforts for the benifit of the native races. The gentleman who has control of the paper at the present time is Mr. Knight, who has had thirty years' experience of editorship in India, and may, therefore, be supposed to know what are the subjects, bearing on Christian thought and life, that have an interest for the public of Calcutta, and the other cities of the empire. He evidently judges that the question of "The Future Destiny of Human Spirits" is one of these subjects, for several recent numbers of The Friend of India have been largely occupied with letters and articles thereupon, all of them of a very earnest and decided tone.

It would seem, from the number of the paper we have seen, that the controversy began by a declaration on the part of the editor, of his acceptance of the doctrine of what is called "Life in Christ;" which, as perhaps most people know by this time, teaches that the human soul is not immortal, in its own nature, but may become so by a union with the Lord Jesus Christ; that the soul of no unbeliever will exist, in its own personality, for ever, but be utterly destroyed after a certain period of tribulation beyond the grave. Several correspondents thereupon gave their reasons for believing such a doctrine to be unscriptural. Some defended the orthodox teaching of never ending torment; and others pleaded for a more comprehensive and more merciful reading of the divine word. Defending his position, the editor endeavored to make his orthodox correspondents realize what is meant by "ever-ending torment" by quoting some of the fearfully horrible and heart rendering representations of the condition of the lost, found in the writings of theologians who did not shirk from the logic of their ghastly creed; and then having done his best to make the notion of an eternity of fire and brimstone simply unbelievable by any rational being, he set himself to examine the scripture texts which speak of "life" and "death," "immortality" and "destruction." Insisting that the writers meant literally what they said, and not something else.

The advocates of this doctrine in England, who can boast of such illustrious names as Edward White, Samuel Minton, Dr. Leask, R. W. Dale, Dr. Weymouth, Dr. Parker, Arthur Mursell, Stowell Brown, must have rejoiced to find in Mr. Knight so bold and able a champion of their cause, which they all, we must entirely believe, hold to be in very deed not their cause but the cause of divine truth.

If it be a true doctrine of Christianity that the Almighty destines untold millions of the human race to the horrible doom which the infallible church has provided for them, no honest man will tell the people of India that Christianity is glad tidings. The great difficulty is to be honest with ourselves in these controversies. We refuse to look steadily at the real character of the doctrine we profess to be believing; and we persuade ourselves that we are honoring God by pleading falsely to Him with ourselves." With great force he asks men and women how they can justify for one instant the marriage relation if this doctrine be true? "The man," says he, "is an atrocious criminal who becomes the father of a child, if he really believes this doctrine to be true." Having no scruple in marriage, he concludes that men and women do not really believe the doctrine, however much they may profess it.

The wide-spread interest taken in England in the subject of future life, is evidenced by the fact that scarcely a week passes without the publication of a new book treating of one or other of its many aspects and problems. Two volumns, by clergymen of the Episcopal church, came into our hands, even while penning the last words of the previous paragraph:—"Scripture revelations of the life of man after death," by the Hon. and Rev. W. H. Lyttleton, Rector of Hagley, Worcestershire; and Religion and science, their relations to each other at the present day," by the Rev. Canly T. Gibson, B. D., Rector of Saudon, Essex, the latter being an octavo book of nearly four hundred pages. Mr. Gibson repudiates the doctrine of the everlasting misery of the wicked, and reasons out the subject with great ability and much moderation of language.

The Dispensations.

In the Scriptures, two dispensations, or economies, are specially noticed. One is termed the "dispensation of the grace of God," and the other the "dispensation of the fullness of times." The era of the first is that swiftly passing period, termed the Gospel age. Its object is, that God, by the ministry of his word, may take out a people from the Gentiles for his name; to share, with his own dear Son, in all the glories and honors of his everlasting kingdom. It had its commencement, and must have its close. What sublime events are connected with its histories. During the 1800 years of its continuance, all the startling phenomena, and varied events, that make history often stranger than fiction, have occurred. As we reckon the brief span of life, more than fifty generations have appeared upon the stage, and acted their parts in the theater of existence. Each of these generations has embraced multiplied millions; swelling, probably, to a grand aggregate of 50,000,000,000, in number, of responsible beings. Over all the joys and sorrows of this mighty host, its years have swept by; hurrying past the births and burials; the cradles, altars, and tombs; the sick-beds, wars, famines, plagues and pestilences; the deeds of wickedness that have darkened earth, and clouded heaven; and the excellencies of the just whose virtues have appeared, amid the massed-up iniquities of ages, as the sparsely scattered particles of gold, or the few precious gems amid the immense earth formations of the globe; and, like the wind-winged tempest, its course has been by the blessings, enjoyments, responsibilities, woes, agonies, sufferings, and deaths, of the vanished, and vanishing multitudes to the present day. It has looked upon the world-wide grandeur of Imperial Rome; and it, too, has seen the Hunn, the Goth, and the vandal, wrest the sceptre from her hand, and subvert her iron rule. Since its circling years commenced, Jerusalem has been destroyed, the temple burned, the chosen tribes scattered, Palestine made a desolation, and instead of the chosen people being "a name and a praise among all the people of the earth," JUDEA CAPTA has been inscribed amid the spoil-symbols of destruction, over the figure of a weeping woman, on the conqueror's triumphal arch. In its epochs it embraces the downfall of Pagan idolatries, to be superseded only by the overlowering Apostacy of the West, and the splendors of the waxing Crescent in the East. And, during the last few years, it has seen the consumption of the temporal rule of the one, and the waning of the light of the other, to the very verge of extinction. It has looked upon the Church of Christ in the tortures and consuming fires of Pagan Rome,—then languishing and dying in the imprisonments, and tortments, on the racks, and in the burnings of the Inquisitorial executioners. In Asia Africa, and Europe, the followers of the Man of Sorrows have been tradured, belied, and persecuted to death, with unrelenting fury. It has seen all the horrors of the Dark Ages, and the outburst of the glorious Reformation.

O, it has been a solemn dispensation! A strange mixture of clouds and sunshine, of gloom and glory. During all its passing ages, the Gospel has not been preached in vain. Humanity has not all gone down, like a broken wreck, into the waves of oblivion to be remembered and seen no more. Though the glad tidings of the grace of God have been treated with opposition, scorn and mockery, and though persecution and death have been the portion of God's called-out ones, still the Gospel has triumphed in gathering some of the Lord's nobility from the multitudes of each passing generation since this heavenly economy was committed to a human ministry. During the time of this visitation of the Gentiles, God has been, if slowly, yet surely, taking out a people for his name. The apostles preached in the power and demonstration of the Spirit, and gathered many precious jewels in their times. The noble army of martyrs, who loved not their lives to the death, bore faithful witness to the truth, sealing their their testimony with their blood, and won over multitudes to await the host of God's elect.

The ministry of later times have held forth the word of life, and, through the presentation of truth, the names of many sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty, have been enrolled in the records of his adopted children.

The labors of the heralds of "the Coming One are not in vain. Some still hear the Gospel of the Kingdom, believe, and obey; and through faith and patience become heirs of the promises. A definite number, known to God, will compose the princely priesthood. This dispensation will last until the membership of the elect church is complete and full. For the last crown of glory a worthy wearer will sooner or later be found, and then the door of admission to God's royal family will forever be shut. To bring out the individuals, by the proclamation of God's revealed truth, who are to constitute the bride of Christ, and share his throne is precisely the object of this economy of grace to the Gentiles. The time of accomplishing this purpose is the Gospel age. The persons who are to share in the throne and priestly honor of the glorified Savior are unknown to human ken.

Although the world knoweth them not, they will one day be owned before the angels of God, and an assembled world, as the purest, the noblest, and most Christ-like beings that the perfecting discipline of earth, and the blest influences of heaven, have brought forth. While we hope for ourselves, and those with whom we share in the intercourse of fellowship, in the Church of God, we must bear in mind that God's elect are, every way, a peculiar people. Like Christ they are loving trustful, and self-sacrificing; humble, candid and pure; forming a lowly estimate, of themselves, though the children of the highest.

They have been chosen from the ranks of the poor, from sufferings, prisons, and martyrdoms; though a few have been called in from the higher ranks of life,—and, one day, will come forth, and stand confessed as the aristocracy of the ages to come.

S. A. C.

—We may compare the troubles we have to undergo in the course of this life to a great bundle of fagots far too large for us to lift. But God does not require us to carry the whole at once. He mercifully unties the bundle and gives us first one stick, which we are to carry to-day, and then another that we are to carry to-morrow, and so on. This we might easily manage if we would only take the burden appointed for us each day; but we choose to increase our troubles by carrying yester-day's stick over again to-day, and adding to-morrow's burden to our load before we are required to bear it.—John Newton.

Sorrow's Joys.

The thorns are sharp, yet I can tread on them;
The cup is bitter, yet He makes it sweet;
My face is steadfast toward Jerusalem:
My heart remembers it.

I lift the hanging hands, the feeble knees,
I,—precious more than seven times molten gold.
Until the day when from his store-houses
God shall bring new and old.

Beauty for ashes, oil of joy for grief,
Garment of praise for spirit of heaviness:
Although to-day I fade as doth a leaf,
I languish and grow less.

Although to-day he prunes my twigs with pain,
Yet doth his blood nourish and warm my root;
To-morrow I shall put forth buds again,
And clothe myself with fruit.

Although to-day I walk in tedious ways—
To-day His staff is turned into a rod—
Yet will I wait for him the appointed days,
And stay upon my God.

Ferguson's Proof of the "Christian Era."

Our brother, Wm. Dresser, sends us in the RESTITUTION of November 10th, an extract from "Ferguson's Astronomy."

I do not propose to enter on a discussion concerning the date of our Lord's death, for I am not one who thinks prophetic truth is dependent on our exact knowledge of that date, but as Professor Ferguson has abused the prophecy somewhat, on which he mainly depends to prove—or, at least support—his position, and as far higher truths hinge on that prophecy, I propose briefly to offer a few suggestions for the consideration of the brethren.

I don't know that they are new suggestions, by any means, in fact I do know, that to many they are not, but I make bold to advance my belief, that in the prophecy known as the "seventy weeks of Daniel," lies the key to prophecy in general.

Professor Ferguson well says this is "a remarkable prophecy," but what is more remarkable, is, how men have striven to alter and amend the interpretation of King James' version, to suit their preconceived ideas respecting its fulfillment.

Dean Prideaux, in his version—in many respects strained and absurd—(see Clark's Com. vol. 4,) does not materially alter the text, and does not in any way affect the general sense; neither as far as I have been able to learn, do any of the various translations, of which there may be some twenty or thirty. Books have been written, and chronological tables formed, to prove variations in the succession of the Persian dynasty, and Tomes of prophetic interpretation have been based on what this prophecy was supposed to teach.

Now, this argument of Professor Ferguson's, gives me an opportunity to question briefly the popular conception of this prophecy.

Dan. ix. 25, reads: "Know therefore, and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem unto Messiah the Prince, shall be seven weeks, and three score and two weeks," (i. e. 69 weeks).

Professor Ferguson says: "This commandment was given to Ezra by Artaxerxes Longimanus, in the seventh year of that king's reign." Ezra vii. 11 -26.

Now, where is there anything said about a command to restore and build Jerusalem, from the 11th to the 26th verses of the vii. of Ezra? Nowhere! Professor Ferguson then is wrong in the commencement of his data, and away go all his fine calculations respecting the Sun, Moon and Stars which are things requiring considerable accuracy.

The command to build Jerusalem was given to Nehemiah, not to Ezra, (Neh. ii. 6-11,) it was a command to build the city that Daniel refers to, the city of Jerusalem, not the temple. If this fact, the text affords convincing proof, "the street shall be built again, and the wall, even in troublous times" (verse 25,) confirmed by the facts as recorded by Nehemiah. Neh. iv. 16-10.

Professor Ferguson says: "From this accomplishment—building Jerusalem—till the time when Christ's messenger, John the Baptist, began to preach the kingdom of the Messiah, was 69 weeks, or 483 years."

The prophecy says nothing of the kind; it says: "From the command to restore Jerusalem to Messiah the Prince," (not to John the Baptist) should be 69 weeks, or 483 years.

I shall not diverge here to prove, that "to Messiah," means to the advent, and not to some particular epoch in his career.

The Professor says, from John's advent as a preacher, "to the beginning of Christ's public ministry, was half a week, or three and a half years, and from thence to the death of Christ half a week, or three and a half years in all, from the command to restore the city, to the death of Christ, 70 weeks, or 490 years."

Why does he say that John preached three and a half years, and Jesus preached three and a half years, making the required 70th week—and that Jesus died at the close of that 70th week? Simply because he knows not the Scriptures; the prophecy says Messiah shall be "cut off" after the three score and two weeks," which is the closing period of the total 69 weeks, and not where the Professor and others would have it, at the close of the 70 weeks.

Professor Ferguson says, that in his half of the week, "Christ preached and confirmed the covenant of the Gospel with many."

The prophecy says, the covenant to be confirmed with many, is for one week, (i. e. seven years) Is the covenant of the Gospel a seven years covenant, or an "everlasting" covenant? Clearly the latter, then the covenant and the 70th week, to be confirmed by the "He" for seven years, is clearly not the "everlasting" Gospel covenant, and therefore, not the one which Professor Ferguson says Christ confirmed.

The professor says, "after the 70 weeks, the city and sanctuary were to be destroyed.

The prophecy says, this was to happen after the 69 weeks, not after the 70th, ver. 26.

No wonder there are so many wild calculations, so many very doubtful chronologies, when the word is so heedlessly divided; the fact is, the "70 weeks of Daniel" read as follows:

1. From a certain specified command, to Messiah the Prince, was to be 69 weeks, total 483 years; (ver. 25) without controversy, that is a fact.

2. After this time, during a period of, say, 70 years, from the birth of Jesus, to the destruction of Jerusalem, (and therefore not in the remaining 70th week of 7 years, because exceeding that period nine times) two notable events occurred, concerning Daniel's "people and holy city," (to which alone this prophecy has reference) those events were, the death of their Messiah, and the destruction of the city, by the "people of the prince who shall come." ver. 26.

3. "He," or the prince that shall come, shall confirm the covenant of a week, with many of Daniel's people—Jews—but in the midst of the week, or after 3½ years, he shall cause "the sacrifice and oblation to cease," and shall cause a final overthrow of the city, in the "overspreading of abominations," with which he shall make it desolate, "until that which is determined shall be poured upon the desolator" (margins, ver. 27.

Here are the three divisions of the prophecy, first, the 69 weeks, second, the interregnum, or "times of the Gentiles." Rom. xi. 25, third, the 70th week, yet to be accomplished.

I believe, all the prophets could be marshalled, to support and confirm this plain, straightforward reading of the Scriptures; but necessarily, such a task is not to be undertaken here.

In closing this criticism, however, I call attention to these pertinent facts: These 70 weeks are the allotted periods of Jewish time: if they were accomplished at the death of Jesus the Anointed, then Jewish time is complete: a view, which I do not think would be found to accord well with prophecy in general. Again, that the peculiar division of the prophecy, is in itself an evidence of a purpose, and no purpose so reasonable as a division of its fulfillment.

THOS. C. WEEKS.

MT. PLEASANT, MO.

"A typographical error in Bro. Dresser's article, makes the Professor say 'seventy-two weeks, or four hundred and thirty-four years.' His after calculations show plainly that it should be as we state above.

New Things.

We all like new things, such as new clothes, new shoes, new houses, new books, new pictures, and new sights. And we like new things sometimes, because they are better than the old ones ever were. But all cannot have new things; they cost too much money, and so they have to put up with the old ones. I will tell you of some new things which you can all have. They are worth more than money, but all can have them free. Here are some of them.

1. The Lord's mercies. "It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed, because his compassions fail not. They are new every morning; great is thy faithfulness. Lamen. iii. 22-23.

How thankful should we be for such mercies, which come to us fresh and new every day. Our life, health, reason, food, clothes, sunshine, rain, air, and all good things that we enjoy, are always new.

2. A new heart and a new spirit. "A new heart also will I give unto you, and a new spirit will I put within you; and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you an heart of flesh. And I will put my spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my judgments and do them. Ezek xxxvi. 26-27.

Every sinner needs a new heart and a new spirit, just as much as these Israelites, and we may all have it. We may be renewed in the spirit of our minds. We may be transformed by the renewing of our minds. If we will pray as David did. "Create in me a clean heart, O God; and renew a right spirit within me." (Psa. li. 10), God will hear our prayers, and we shall have joy instead of sorrow, love instead of hate, and shall love to do right as well as ever we loved to do wrong, because God has made our hearts and our spirits new.

3. A new creature. "Therefore, if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold all things are become new." 2 Cor. v. 17. So we are told to "put on the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts, and be renewed in the spirit of our minds; and that ye put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness." Eph. v. 24-25. So we are to put away lying, and stealing, anger, and lust, for these are the works of the old man, and we are to put on truth, and love, and peace, and purity, and righteousness, and so not be the vile, wicked sinners we have been, but each turn over a new leaf, when we become new creatures. God will make us new all through. If we will only give up all to him, to do and suffer all his righteous will.

4. A new body. "Our conversation is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body." Phil. iii. 20-21. These poor, old, feeble, crazy frames shall be changed to immortality in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye: or if we be dead and turned to dust, we shall rise up in glory when Jesus comes at the last great day. Now we are made new inside. Then we shall be new all through, spirit, and soul, and body.

5. A new earth. "Behold I create new heavens and a new earth." Isa. lxv. 17. "We according to his promise look for a new heavens, and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." 2 Pet. iii. 13. "The meek shall inherit the earth, and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace." Psa. xxxvii. 11; Matt. v. 5. That will be a good world: there will be no sin, sorrow, pain, or death there. Let us seek a home there.

6. A new Jerusalem. "I, John, saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband." Rev. xxi. 2. What a blessed city that will be, and all the redeemed shall dwell there.

7. All things. "Behold I make all things new. He that overcometh shall inherit all things." Rev. xxi. 5-7.

What blessed new things these are. We may have new mercies, a new heart, become new creatures, new men, have new bodies, a new earth, a new Jerusalem, and all things new. May the Lord prepare us to receive all these things.—Bible Standard.

Discussion.

As some of the brethren might like to know what I am doing, I would say that I have just closed a discussion with J. W. Randall. This discussion was under contemplation last September, but has been delayed on account of sickness. But in November we closed it up with a decided victory in favor of truth—or, at least, many of the people present thought so and so said.

The Nature of Man.

This was the first proposition. Mr. Randall, in his first speech, took the position that the image referred to in Gen. i: 26-27, was the spirit-man; that is, the thinking part of man; and from Gen. ii: 7, that God, in the creation, formed the body out of the dust, and then breathed into man's nostrils the breath of life, and the body became a living soul. So you see, says he, we have got a body and soul; the soul being the life of the body. Then we have a living animal. Then he put into the soul a spirit; so you see we have got a body, a soul, and a spirit; and the soul, being the life of the body, can be destroyed; but the spirit being the life of the soul, cannot be destroyed. Why? because the spiritual part of man, which is the image of God, that is, in short, a part of God, is the real man; or really the thinking part of man. Giving for proof 1 Thess. v. 23; Matt. x: 28, and Rev. vi: 9; also the rich man and Lazarus, and the thief on the cross, but, in fact, he just acknowledged all that we teach—that there is no life out of Christ, and that none but the righteous have the promise of eternal life:—thus destroying all he had said before.

Brethren, his arguments were thin; so I will make my report short.

In my first speech from Gen. ii: 7; iii, 22-24; 1 Cor. xv. 45, I showed the two families;—the earthly family, and the spiritual family. I also showed the two seeds—the natural and the spiritual;—one the first Adam; the other the second Adam; and that as it is in the natural, so it is in the spiritual.

I wanted to close the debate on his admission that there is life only through Christ, and should have done this, but I wanted to get all the scripture before him that I possible could, I did get over 80 passages before the people; which was answered with the admission that he believed in the resurrection of the dead. I asked the question, whether a man would be resurrected that did not die: and whether; if the body be only the house that the real man lives in,—there could be a resurrection of the real man,—and that if this were the thinker he must perish: for in the very day that his breath goeth forth his thoughts perish. Ps, cxlvi. 4.

On the second proposition, that the Kingdom of Jesus Christ is yet in the future. My first argument was based on the restitution of all things spoken of by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began. Acts. iii, 19.

My second argument was based on the promises of God to the fathers. I also showed that the past dealings of God had a great deal to do with the future; and that God made covenant with Abraham with regard to the land of Canaan which was promised to Abraham and his seed; that he confirmed the same to David and his seed, Christ being that seed—and that Christ had the promise to set on David's throne. The promise to Abraham; Gen. chs. xxii-xii—to Isaac. Gen. xxvi—to Jacob Gen. xxiii and to David and his seed, Isa. lv. 3—Luke i, 31—and that Dan. ii. 44,—would not refer to Pentecost, because that was the time symbolized by the legs of the image,—and the Kingdom could not be set up till we got to the feet.

In Mr. Randall's first speech he made Col. i, 12-13,—Rev. i, 9, his strong tower.

At last he acknowledged that the meek shall inherit the earth, and that Abraham will inherit the land of Canaan; although he first stated that Caleb and Joshua had inherited it. But finally agreed with Stephen, Acts vii. But enough. I had an easy task. May the day speedily come when men will cease to pervert God's word.

Union Movement in England.

The following declaration of faith is sent to us by a brother, in England, with the request that we publish it in the RESTITUTION. The declaration has signed to it one hundred and thirty names. We have not had time sufficiently to examine the points set forth in the four propositions presented as the basis of union. However, we cheerfully give place to the declaration:

UNION OF EFFORT FOR THE RESTORATION OF APOSTOLIC DOCTRINE.

This form to be signed by all who are willing to be recognized as Co-workers in trying to bring about a unity of effort for the restoration of apostolic doctrine, and who can subscribe to the four following points of doctrine, not as conditions of faith, but as results of faith, caused by and drawn from a true knowledge of Gospel teaching, which are as follows:

1. That the Scriptures teach that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God. That he came from God, and was manifested in the flesh as Jesus of Nazareth.

2. That the Scriptures teach that Jesus Christ came to give eternal life to all of them who should believe in him.

3. That the Scriptures teach that all those who willfully and knowingly reject Christ "shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power."

4. That the Scriptures teach that the "same Jesus," who, after death and resurrection was "taken up into heaven," shall come again and establish his kingdom upon the earth.

At a recent Sunday-school convention held at Birmingham, Conn., after extended discussion, the following resolution was adopted: "That this convention earnestly recommend to all churches within this district the holding of but one preaching service, and a Bible service in place of the second, in which pastor and congregation may join with the Sunday-school in the study of the Scriptures."

OBITUARY.

BAKER.—Near Mapleton, Bourbon county, Kansas, November 30 1875, Squire Baker fell asleep in Jesus, in his 53d year.

His quiet, kind, Christian conduct won for him the respect and confidence of the community.

LEWIS HICKLES.

CHASE.—Father Chase, died, Dec. 17, 1875, at Eaton, Lenawee county, Michigan, from apoplexy. Bro. Artemas Chase, [illegible]

Brother Chase's health had been failing for about two years previous to the time of his death he was able to be about. On the morning of his death he arose [illegible] his fire as usual; retired himself from before the fire, he clapped his hands to his head, and exclaimed, "Oh, my head!" then staggered across the bed, he said to his wife, "I am dying!" these were the last words he was able to speak and he died in about thirty minutes

Thus fell asleep in Jesus our much-loved brother. He leaves a companion, two sons, an adopted daughter, a large circle of relatives, and the church, to mourn his loss. But they mourn not as those who have no hope, for they believe that he now sleeps in Jesus, and all that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him.

Brother Chase was formerly a resident of the state of New York, and when Brother L. H. Chase went there some fifteen years ago, to visit him, and preached the good news of the kingdom of God he believed, and obeyed the Gospel. About three years afterward, he moved to Eaton with his family, where he continued to reside until his decease. Since learning the truth, he has ever lived a consistent Christian life. Laboring in word and in doctrine as opportunity presented, through his efforts, and those of his brother above mentioned, a body of believers has been called out, numbering about fifty, who abide in the promises of the Gospel. They meet every first day of the week, to hear the Word, and attend to the ordinances of the Lord's house. Here our brother will be missed, as Brother L. H. Chase is nearly 70, and his health is fast failing him.

The funeral services were held at the meeting house of the Friends, who kindly offered their house for this they have our many thanks. The house was a large one, and was well filled. The writer delivered the funeral discourse, from John xiv: 3, showing that the Lord had gone to prepare a place for his people, and that he would come again to resurrect the righteous dead—those who sleep in Christ—and change them that are worthy, make them immortal, and give them the victory over death and the grave, that they might sing the songs of the redeemed, and reign with Christ on the earth. And while we look for these things, we with patience wait for them, knowing that if we fall under the hand of death, and fall in Jesus, when he who is our life shall appear, we also shall appear with him in glory. And then, and not till then, shall we meet our loved ones who are now sleeping in Jesus. In view of these things, with the Revelator, we cry out, "Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly. Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus."

Mourning Lied.

TO CYNTHIA M.

"Favor is deceitful, and beauty is vain, but a woman that feareth the Lord, she shall be praised."

Go, turn the panoramic page
Of distant far historic age;
Mark how it fared with him who hung
On flattering words of kingly tongue:
How at the jealous despot's frown
His own familiar friend went down;
How fickle thousands praised to-day,
To-morrow turned the head away;
How oft the proud, old world beguiled
His cheated devotee, and smiled.

How beauty held the gaping throng,
And reigned a queen in hearts of song;
Or drew as captives to her side
The frozen sons of stole pride;
Till Time at last resentful strown,
Had o'er beauty's graces thrown
A veil of wrinkles dark and cold
And called her stupid, bent and old,
The while she turned her eyes to rev.
Her courtiers vanished utterly.

Ah! true the prophet's words of old,
Wrought out in sentences of gold!
For earthly favor is but dross
Though bought with years of pain and loss,
Too oft those years of service prove
The fatal theft of envious love;
And Faith and innocence implore
In vain at heartless tyrant's door;
Who deserves much of royal praise,
With life the debt of Fate pays.

But loving favor from our God,
Though often proved by chast'ning rod,
Is all unlike the grace of kings
Or changing voice of fickle rings;
It changes not—if we be true,
But ever grows more rich and new.
For fool, for wise, for young, for old,
'Tis better chosen far than gold.
There is the Rock of strength for man,
The one sure goal of every plan.

Though Beauty fade and love decay,
God's loving grace endures for aye;
And she who most our Father fears,
Who loves him most and most reverers,
Shall win most true and heart-felt praise
Through all these toil-some, fleeting days.
Ah! love such praise as this be thine,
Dear loving child of Truth divine!
A woman praised for fearing God,
For treading where the Savior trod!

The Two Witnesses. Are they Moses and Elias?—No. 5.

The interval between the numbers of this series has afforded opportunity for presenting through the RESTITUTION, opposing views. Hence it has been suggested by some, that the two witnesses were the old and New Testament, and by others Enoch and Elijah. Interpretations offered to remove or avoid difficulties which were supposed to be insuperable against the the conclusion that they were Moses and Elias.

Let us try these positions by the unerring word of truth, and the light of reasonable probability.

1. Are they the Two Testaments or Covenants. The law and the gospel?

It would seem to suffice to cite the record in Rev. xi. in refutation of this assumption. They are there said to be "killed"—"Their dead bodies" are said to "lie unburied in the streets of the great city" and they are called "two prophets,"—descriptions which apply only to the living persons or beings. Hence we infer they must be men, not inanimate things.

2. Can they be Enoch and Elijah. Because these were translated without experiencing death, it is supposed that they were thus reserved miraculously to appear in the closing scenes of Rev. xi. This is the one argument for choosing Enoch instead of Moses, to be associated with Elijah, on the occasion of this last day attestation for Jesus. But when we remember how little we know of Enoch, as a prophet, or witness for God—and that he flourished before Abraham was called and before the Jews became the chosen people of God, we can hardly accord to him any superiority over Moses, the great law giver to Israel and the declared type of the Christ, and we can hardly suppose Enoch to appear in a place a scene among a people to whom he would be a stranger. Besides Moses' record as the servant of God, is not surpassed by any other prophet, as we learn from Deut. xxxiv-10, and I take it to be almost certain that the two witnesses to Jesus on the Mount of Transfiguration were the same who reappeared and finish their testimony as in Rev. xi-7. and with the testimony already presented before.

From these premises then, we conclude that before the Lord comes to set up his Kingdom, as declared in 15th, verse. Moses and Elias, his two witnesses, shall appear on earth, in Jerusalem, and "finish their testimony," begun in Israel, continued on the Transfiguration Mount, and finished" by thier tragical death at Jerusalem, as related in 7-10 verses, and according to the rule prescribed in the sure word of prophecy.

Against this conclusion, it may be objected that v. 3, declares that the witnesses "shall prophesy, 1260 days, clothed in sack cloth," that, on the generally accepted theory of a day for a year calculation in prophecy. The duration of their prophesying will exceed the limits of any human life of which we read in scripture, therefore, that the argument proves too much. But let us in this instance, count this as literal time. If so then 1260 days are three years and a half, corresponding with the duration of our Lord's own testimony, and in Jerusalem, of which this seems to be the antitype. That this is a natural and proper interpretation would seem to appear from the fact stated in verses 8-10, that their "dead bodies shall be unburied in the streets of the city (then in the possession and power of their enemies,) for three (literal) days and a half." The literal interpretation being necessitated in order to make good the statement in verse xi, that then "they are to stand on their feet and live again," by the spirit of life from God entering into them,—a process and result which could hardly take place without a special miracle, after they had been three years and a half unburied. After such a long time, and in that tropical climate, their dead bodies unburied would have passed into dus..

It is submitted to the candid reader that the context and all the circumstances of the scene described, plainly show that the narrative is literal, and that the days of this prophecy must be literal days.

We can hardly conclude that in these latter days, and at a period yet future, so long a period as 1260 years of prophesying is yet to occur; and all this to happen, too, before the Lord's coming and kingdom, for it is evident, from verses 15-18 that these events—this unfinished career of the witnesses—is previous to the kingdom.

It seems clear, then, that these two witnesses are to appear and testify before the establishment of the Lord's kingdom, but it must not thence be concluded that they are to occur before his coming to his saints. Many passages in the Bible show that these events are to be separated by some interval of time, the length of which has probably not yet been revealed to us.

Daniel ix: 24, 25, expounded in the light of history, shows that the seventy weeks are not yet fully accomplished—for they were determined "upon thy people" (Israel, as well as "upon thy holy city," (Jerusalem), and were to extend up to Messiah, the Prince." Now, although they embraced the era of the birth, work, death and resurrection of Jesus, they were to extend up to Messiah, the Prince," whose career as King of Israel and Prince of peace had not yet begun. Seeing that his priestly functions at God's right hand era not yet finished, and must continue until he takes the sceptre and comes as David's King and God's Son on Zion.

We learn from Daniel x: 24-27, that all the events therein predicted require seventy weeks for their accomplishments—490 years. Among these events is the anointing the Most Holy as Messiah, the Prince. We repeat, this has not been done. He has been already anointed as Prophet, and as Priest, but not as Prince and King. This last, and perhaps highest and greatest development of his Messiahship is in the womb of the future. Thus we see that although seventy weeks indicate the period allotted by his Father for accomplishing the events enumerated in the prophecy, it by no means follows that the seventy weeks are to be continuous, or in close succession, one directly after the other until all expire. This is proven in ix: 24 to end; for there we see the period of seventy weeks, fractured into two subdivisions, seven weeks and three score and two weeks. This disposes of sixty-nine out of the whole term, leaving only one week remaining; and then the 27th verse seems to dispose of one half of this remainder, in the words, "in the midst (or middle) of the week, or three years and a half, which was exactly the length of our Lord's life and career as a prophet or public teacher in Israel. It is significant that the remaining one-half—three years and a half—is just the period assigned to the time of the two witnesses in Rev. xi.

Here the question naturally arises What becomes of the long interval of time elapsing between the sixty-nine, or sixty-nine and one-half weeks of verses 26 and 27, and the end of the prophecy?

To answer this, it is necessary to advert to the well-established Bible distinction between Jewish and Gentile times. The former embraces the period elapsing from the calling of Abraham—which was the origin or beginning of Jewish times—onward to the fulfilling of the promises made to him, which are yet future; whilst the latter embraces the time included from the calling of the Gentiles, (Acts xv,) to the "fulfillment of the times of the Gentiles," (Rom. xi: 25,)—a period yet in the future, but now about to expire.

After the calling of Abraham, the Gentiles lived, as Paul told them at Athens, (Acts xvii) in times of ignorance which God winked at,—did not regard them as his people, but gave them up to their idolatrous worship. So, on the other hand, after the calling of the Gentiles at the house of Cornelius, God turned his back on the children of Israel and gave them up to their willful blindness and perverse rejection of the Messiah. Hence Israel now abides in times of ignorance, and the Gentiles in times of knowledge.

Thus the first have become last, and the last, first. But this relative position of the two will not long remain for Paul testifies that "when the fullness of the Gentiles is come in (expired; all Israel will be saved." God's favor and mercy will then return to his ancient people, and this remnant of three days and a half Daniel's remaining week, and of John's 1260 days will be absorbed and consumed and then Messiah, the King and Prince, will establish his throne and kingdom as in Rev. xi: 15. and elsewhere in the sure Word of Prophecy.

This conclusion seems further strengthened and fortified by Rev. x. 6, when the angel, standing on sea and land, lifts up his hand to heaven and sweareth that "there shall be time no longer," that is, Jewish time. because the Gentile time had then commenced to run.

From these premises, are we not justified in concluding that the Jewish time of seventy weeks was all concluded at the final overthrow of the Jewish commonwealth—the destruction of Jerusalem—except the three and a half years remaining after Daniel's sixty-nine and a half weeks, and that that remainder will be occupied by the two prophets—who will be Jewish witnesses for Jesus, and will finally seal their testimony by martyrdom in the streets of the city of the Great King?

Their miraculous resurrection as related in v. 11, will be the token and immediate precursor of the end of the Gentile powers and governments, and of their utter destruction by the coming and kingdom of Messiah, the Prince, in irresistible power and great glory.

The position and relation of saints to these events which seem to be so imminent as to be expected to burst upon us at any moment, will next receive our earnest attention, lest they come upon us unawares, and find us sleeping when we ought to be wakeful and watching. Being forewarned, let us be forearmed, for it would be a calamity never to be sufficiently deplored, if, like the foolish virgins we be found unready, and so denied admission to the marriage supper of the Great King.

All scripture concurs in describing the fearful judgments which our offended Creator will speedily pour upon the nations who have so greatly sinned and whose punishment is necessitated by Divine justice. It is the indispensable means of bringing them to their senses and enforcing their subjection to the authority of the Great King whom God hath appointed to rule them in righteousness. It is written, "When the judgments of the Lord are in the earth, the nations will learn righteousness." It is pretty certain they will never learn in any school less stern.

Now, will the saints then on earth be exposed to these calamities and sorrows, or will they be taken out of their reach? At present we know that God's people are exposed to the same sufferings that afflict their fellow-men. The ravages of pestilence, the horrors of war and the terrible evils of famine affect all alike. It is impossible to read the prophetic judgments, threatened and yet fulfilled on the people before the kingdoms of the world are overthrown by power from above, without seeing that all previous chastisements from heaven are not to be compared, in violence and intensity, with those which are to follow in these latter days. Where, then, will the servants of God be when this great wrath commences?

Judging the future by the past we naturally conclude that as God mercifully protected and delivered Noah and Lot, Israel in Egypt, his servant Daniel and others in Babylon, and his saints at the destruction of Jerusalem, he will not permit the disciples of his Son in these latter days to be involved in the general ruin. In this connection we may recall many divine promises and pledges of relief and deliverance, recorded for the consolation and comfort of those "who have fled for refuge to the hope set before us in the Gospel." We cite as samples of these, one from each Testament: Isaiah xxvi. and John xiv. Construing the first in its context with the xxv. and especially recurring to the 12th and 20th verses of the [illegible]xvi., we read in view of this impending vengeance, "Lord, thou wilt ordain peace for us," etc.; and "Come, my people, enter thou into thy chambers and shut thy doors about thee; hide thyself, as it were, for a moment, until the indignation be overpast, for behold, the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity; the earth also shall disclose her blood and shall no more cover her slain." In Jno. xiv. the words of Jesus are reassuring and full of comfort, to the same effect. "Let not your heart be troubled. Ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions. If it were not so I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you, (doubtless in one of these many mansions,) and if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am there ye may be also." No, too. Paul tells us that when the Lord comes to his saints they shall be caught up to meet him in the air—that our gathering together will be with him—that he shall come with all his saints, and they shall be ever with the Lord. Now, to come with his saints, they must previously have been with him. Taking all the testimony into the account it seems clear that before the Lord comes to judge the nations and award to them their proper retribution, he must come to his saints—their gathering together must be to him. They will be summoned to meet him "in the air—in the clouds," both quick and dead, when he will take them out of the way of God's impending judgment to that "place he hath prepared for them in the mansions of his Father's house, whence, in due time, he will come with them to the earth, to judge the contemporary nations and rule over them in his kingdom, power and glory, thus fulfilling his own prophecy in the last clause of what we call the Lord's Prayer.

Amen and amen!

The Deep Importance of the Re-standing From the Dead.

BY H. ASHCROFT, M. A.

"If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable." 1 Cor. xv. 19.

It may be said that the sacred writers in thus uniformly representing death as a sleep speak only of the body, and do not intend by such language to intimate that the slumber extends to the whole personality. Here I will again summon "Archbishop" Whately to my assistance,—taking the opportunity or acknowledging my great indebtedness to the writings of that truly thoughtful and judicious man. He says, "I never could learn what is meant by that expression 'sleep of the body,' for the words convey to me no distinct sense. We understand what is meant by a man, or any other living creature, being asleep; but we never speak of a stone, or a clod of earth, or a piece of bone, or any other inanimate substance, sleeping; and so to speak, would appear quite unmeaning. Now a dead carcass is (as far as regards the present question) nothing more than a clod of earth. * * * To speak of a carcass thus decayed, decomposed, and dispersed in all directions, as asleep, seems to me a use of language which destroys the purpose for which language was designed: namely, to convey a distinct meaning." The sacred writers must therefore have intended to convey the impression that the whole man lapses at death into the condition which they describe by the word "sleep." Hence, we have them making such assertions as the following: "In death there is no remembrance of Thee; in the grave who shall give Thee thanks?" "Put not your trust in princes, nor in the son of man, in whom there is no help. His breath goeth forth (and there is nothing else that does go forth), he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish." Now if it were true that a man at death carries with him all the recollections of a lifetime, and begins then to think as he never though before, it seems to me that such language as this compresses and conceals a tremendous truth, while at the same time it gives prominence to what is (on this supposition) self-evident, and exceedingly unimportant. We can hardly imagine that these holy men of old, who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, would have so written concerning the death-state, if the real facts were so widely different from what they were representing.

Most of us must have felt some difficulty in harmonizing to our own satisfaction Paul's language when speaking of the dead in Christ as asleep, and the terms in which he contemplates his own dissolution. When he refers to those who have died, he uniformly represents them as being really dead or asleep, awaiting the resurrection. But when he comes to speak of himself as confronted by the solemn issues of this mortal life, he adopts a very different style of expression. With himself, absence from the body means presence with the Lord. To die is gain. He has a desire for the returning, and the being with Christ, which is far better than to remain longer in this world of care and sorrows. Now, how is this? Certainly Paul could not expect to have greater privileges granted to him in respect of this matter, than were the lot of others who might have been equal to him in fidelity to the great Master; he could not expect to be enjoying conscious blessedness in the presence of Christ, while all who had died previously to him were asleep in the dust of the earth. How then are his apparently conflicting statements to be reconciled? We know but one answer to such a question that is at all likely to commend itself to your judgment, and that is this: To a person who is in a state of perfect unconsciousness there is no interval whatever between the moment of his falling into that state, and the moment of his awakening from it. Time(to his perceptions) is annihilated. If death be such a condition, then, to the person himself, sudden death is sudden glory, albeit a thousand or ten thousand years may intervene between the one and the other. To survivors (of course) the length of time which to their friends appears dreary and sad—that all this while they should be without remembrance—incapable of praising God—having neither wisdom, nor knowledge, nor device—that David should not have ascended into the heavens—that it should only be "touching the resurrection of the dead," that God declares himself the God of Abraham and of Isaac and of Jacob, thereby intimating his purpose and determination to bring them forth again on some future day; all this appears very gloomy doctrine when we give the imagination alone full play. But when we bring the understanding to bear upon the subject, we view it in a far different and much more consolatory light. Paul was perfectly justified in saying, "To die is gain," because to him death would be immediately succeeded by a glorious resurrection. He used no unwarrantable language when he spoke of being "absent from the body and present with the Lord;" because the very instant he breathed his last would, to his own perceptions, be at once followed by the sound of the last trumpet which shall summon all the holy dead into the presence of their Lord and King. Our favorite author, whom we have already quoted, (and who adopts this line of argument with great force) makes this quite clear, reminding us that, "Reason tells us (the moment we consider the subject) that a long and a short space of time are exactly the same to a person who is insensible. The long interval then between death and the day of judgment (supposing the intermediate state to be a profound sleep) does not exist at all except in the imagination. The faithful Christian may be practically in paradise the day he dies." This may account for the fact that Paul, when speaking of believers who had died, represents them as being asleep; while when referring to his own death, he seems, (on a superficial view) to speak as though he did not expect to wait until the resurrection, until he realized that presence with Christ he so ardently desired, and gained the crown of righteousness which was to be bestowed "in that day."

The apostle's argument then, was, that unless the resurrection takes place they that are thus asleep in Jesus are perished. I trust the view just taken of their condition will help to restore to its own place of importance a doctrine which has been too much quietly ignored, and nullified by theories which Paul does not in any of his epistles so much as once recognize, and which greatly tend to make the gospel of our salvation void.

Notice again, Paul regards the resurrection as of such supreme importance that, if it is not to occur, he considered that he was in no sense advantaged. He had all along been undergoing grievous suffering on account of the faith, but all would go for nothing unless the resurrection took place. "What advantageth it me if the dead rise not?" Now if Paul's happiness in a future state was in any sense (or for any period of time) independent of the resurrection, this question was quite beside the mark: and there was no sense in his supplementing it by the heathen motto: "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." Think of a man of Paul's manifold labors and distresses being on no higher a vantage ground than any epicure whose god was his belly, and whose glory was his shame! Just imagine all that rigid discipline and self-denial and subjection of the body which he practiced, "if by any means he might attain unto the resurrection from among the dead," all of no use whatever! Had we no other argument before us to prove the certainty of the resurrection than that which is supplied us by Paul's noble unselfish life, that of itself would be quite sufficient to convince us. Is such a man to be in no sense advantaged after all? Yes, if there is no resurrection of the dead.

Finally we come to the argument of our text. If the resurrection is not to be, then Christians "have hope in this life only." "Hope is a light shed down from heaven to cheer a dark and troubled scene. It is like moonlight borrowed from the sun to mitigate the darkness which it cannot dispel." Sad must that condition be in which there is no hope. Many have hope, but it is "in this life only." Of the revealed future they know nothing, and therefore their anticipations of what is to be must needs be built upon conjecture and guess. Most people believe in a hereafter of some sort; but Paul went so far as to say, that if the dead rise not, then there is no hereafter of any sort; and Christian men and women are reduced to the level of the most ignorant and degraded of their species who have hope "in this life only." Many heathens had hope which reached out beyond the present life; but because their hope was not in the resurrection, it was a hope that was doomed to perish and make them ashamed. If you follow the teaching of Paul, you will cherish no expectation of a future life that are disassociated from the resurrection of them that sleep in Jesus. This masterly argument simply shuts us up in his gospel who proclaimed himself "the Resurrection and the Life." We must either be in Christ, or we must forego all blessed anticipations whatsoever that go beyond this life only. Are you prepared to accept the alternative? Some false versions of the gospel there are which do not thrust matters to so palpable an issue, and which will let you cherish "hope in Christ" without any reference to that great event to which Paul so absolutely joins it. You are at liberty to determine whether you will build your house upon the rock or upon the sand. But, remember, you do the latter in view of the impending storm; and Christ himself has faithfully warned you of the result: "And immediately it fell; and the ruin of that house was great."

Whoever is disposed to account such a subject as this tedious and uninteresting, or without any good practical tendency,—whoever is inclined to consign to the realm of uncertainty and speculation a truth which has been reasoned out so clearly and conclusively by one who had seen Christ Jesus the Lord, and who had received this special communication from him,—whoever has this light near to him and yet refuses to walk in it, and through prejudice or sheer indolence, or both, remains contentedly ignorant of that which the spirit has so manifestly revealed,—may well suspect his own spiritual state, and doubt whether he will be accounted worthy to obtain that age, and the resurrection of the dead. If the subject is not important, I should like to know what there is in the whole domain of human thought that is important! If we can attain nothing like certainty concerning it, I should like to be told the reason which led the apostle into all this elaborate argumentation. If you would come to a knowledge of the truth, you will require to spend less time on dress, and eating, and drinking, and paying mere complimentary visits to each other's houses, and reading books which are no manner of profit. You will need to be determined that, cost what it may of theological reproach—hurled at you from every quarter by an apostate and unbelieving orthodoxy,—cost what it may of patience and candor and diligent research, you will get wisdom, and that with all your getting you will get understanding.

Foreign Notes.

The latest news concerning the diplomatic crisis, which has for its immediate center of interest the eastern end of the Mediterranean and for its remote consequences no one knows what, are delightfully non-committal. Bismarck and Gortschakoff have been in consultation, and have, it is said, agreed not to raise the eastern question—which is quite capable of raising itself, should occasion demand. Nor do they favor an international conference regarding the Suez canal. From Vienna it is announced that the proposals of the three Northern powers, having been amended to suit the ideas of the Porte, were definitely agreed to on Friday. These stipulations, nominally require the establishment of perfect equality between Christians and Turks. The representatives of the Western powers at the sultan's court are to be informed of contemplated acts, touching questions at issue, so that their respective home governments may have opportunity to advise or remonstrate as the occasion seems to demand. If there is the usual basis of truth to support these dispatches, it would appear that the powers are concocting something that will greatly curtail the independence of the sultan. He is, however, busily preparing for war with all the resources at his command, and so is Montenegro, the latter country having effected a loan of a million dollars, believed to be guaranteed by Russia. The Herzegovinians, it is said, have refused to consider the proposals of Turkey. Semi-officially it is intimated that England will favor the repeal of the treaty of Paris, so that the Western powers may feel more at liberty to interfere in Turkish affairs.

THE RESTITUTION,
Plymouth, Ind. co.

Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the transmutization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

CORRESPONDENCE.—The Editor must not be understood as endorsing all the sentiments expressed by correspondents whose articles are inserted under this head. Each writer is alone responsible for the articles he over signatures. If the teaching of any writer is not endorsed, an article setting forth the views of the party differing may be forwarded. Free discussion of Bible doctrines on all sides will be allowed, but the Editor reserves the privilege of criticising those communications which antagonize a belief and obedience of the Gospel as a means of salvation, or which undermine its principles.

The Wages of Sin.

The wages of sin is death. Rom. vi. 23.

My subject suggests three leading points of inquiry:

1. What is sin?

2. What law has been sinned against?

3. What is its punishment?

1. "Whosoever committeth sin, transgresseth also the law; for sin is the transgression of the law." "For where no law is, there is no transgression." Then there must be law before there can be sin.

2. What law has been transgressed?

The law that was given to Adam in the garden of Eden.

This is the only law which existed before sin, and is therefore the only law that could be sinned against. It consists in a few brief words said to Adam. "And the Lord took the man whom he had formed, and put him in the garden of Eden. And he commanded him, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat; but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it, for in (or after) the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die."

This law required complete and perpetual obedience, and for transgression in a single point the penalty was death. This was the death that has passed upon all.

"Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." "The wages of sin against this law is death."

This is the only law that punished every transgression with death. Moses' law appointed to death only for a few special crimes. So also of human laws. But this law appoints to death for every transgression.

There are no grades in the penalty for transgressing this law. The only punishment it threatens is death. By this fact it can be distinguished from every other law known to human history. This is the only law that existed before sin entered the world, and is therefore the only law that made it possible for man to sin.

The jurisdiction of this law.

Was this law given to Adam to have jurisdiction over him alone, or was it to have jurisdiction over his race? "God had said to them, Be fruitful, and multiply and replenish the earth, and subdue it; and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth."

Evidently the law given to Adam was to have jurisdiction over him and over all his posterity as long as he had provided for them to live, and to have dominion over all the animals below him, and over all the earth. If Adam had not sinned he would not have died, but would have lived forever under this law, by eating freely of the tree of life.

When Adam sinned, he did not go out from under the jurisdiction of this law, but was held to its penalty. And as the death penalty of this law has passed upon all men, its jurisdiction must be over all men, and wherever death is found.

This is the law that God prepared for the kingdom when he made the world, and therefore its jurisdiction must be as extensive and as perpetual as the kingdom itself.

3. What is the death threatened in this law? What does it mean?

"Thou shalt surely die," is the simple description of its punishment. If we can ascertain what this description means in a single instance, we shall know what it means in every instance under the jurisdiction of this law.

This death is affirmed of the whole man.

The Lord said, Let us make man in our image. He formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul. He put the man he had formed into the garden of Eden, to dress it and to keep it. And he commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat, but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it, for in (or after) the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die.

This is the only man and the whole of the man mentioned in this history. This is the man who was to live by breathing the breath of life, and by eating the fruits of the earth. The fruits of the earth were no part of the man. The breath of life was no part of the man. The man was made of dust—not of dust and breath, nor of dust and breath and food; but he was made of dust alone. If there is any other man, or part of a man not included in this sentence, the history makes no intimation of it. The second time the subject just as it the man made of dust was the only man intended to be punished. Therefore we conclude that this death is affirmed of the whole man.

This death was the whole of the punishment.

"Thou shalt surely die," is all the punishment mentioned. If this is not all the punishment that was intended, we know not what the rest of it is, for there is nothing said about it. We therefore conclude that the death described in this law is the whole of the punishment.

This death was final.

The punishment in this law is just as final as the penalty of any other law so far as the record is concerned. The declaration that, for transgression, Thou shalt surely die, is just as final in its sense as is the declaration that for murder thou shalt surely be hung. As nothing is said in this account about any further punishment, we do not know that any was intended; if there is to be any further punishment, we do not know what it is, for the record is silent upon the subject. Therefore we conclude that the punishment described is final.

The death, then, is the death of the whole man, and the whole of his punishment, therefore it is final.

What does this death mean?

The first explanation is this: "And to Adam he said, because thou hast hearkened to the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree, of which I commanded thee, saying, thou shalt not eat of it, cursed is the ground for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life. Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth unto thee, and in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread till thou return to the ground; for dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return."

It was the same man that was made of death, that was to return to dust again. This explains what death means. Thou shalt surely die, means to return to dust again.

His sorrow was to be during the days of his life, and not after them. He was to earn his bread by wearisome toil until he returned to the ground from which he was taken. This explains the conditions of his life previous to, and while under sentence of death.

The second explanation.

In order to secure the execution of the sentence passed upon Adam, "God excluded him from the tree of life lest he should eat of it and live forever." This shows that the meaning of this death is, not to live forever.

The third explanation.

"And all the days that Adam lived were nine hundred and thirty years and he died." This shows that the meaning of this punishment is to die so as not to live. That all the days that he was to live had passed away before his death occurred. He was to live out his life, which was to be cut off by death. Thus we have three explanations of what this death means which are in complete harmony. The words, "thou shalt surely die," are explained to mean, dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return. Not to live forever, and to die so as not to live. If this death means anything else, there is nothing said about it in this second, and therefore, we do not know anything about it. Does the statement, "Thou shalt surely die," mean more than "to return to dust," or "not to live," "and he died."

Then was not all that was threatened against Adam for transgression, executed upon him? Has the law any further demand upon him? Has he not returned to the ground from which he was taken? Is he not as though he had not been? Is not this the death that has passed upon all men? Then, is it not true that the full wages of sin is death?

Has this law ever been changed? Has it ever been amended? If God's judgment in this law was just and true, and righteous altogether, then, will it ever need to be changed? If God is immutable, can it ever be changed?

JOEL A. SIMONDS.

The Old Covenant.

Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah. Jer. xxxi. 31.

For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel, after those days saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts; and I will be to them a God and they shall be to me a people. . . . In that he saith, A new covenant, he hath made the first old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away. Heb. viii. 10, 13.

BRETHREN:—I often hear and read that the new covenant was made over 1800 years ago.

Now let us go back in the Bible to the time that Jehovah—I am that I am—stretched forth his hand to fulfill the promise made to Abraham four centuries before.

Well, after he, through Moses, led Israel, according to the flesh, out of Egypt, through the Red Sea, unto Mt. Sinai, or Horeb, he there informed them that if they would obey his voice and keep his covenant they should be a peculiar people unto him. See Exod. xix. 5.

By what kind of reasoning or philosophy can any one claim, teach and preach that that if and the sequences were actually a covenant, called by prophets and apostles the old covenant? Let us see.

Again, after such an unscriptural declaration as I consider the above one to be, to claim that the Gentiles are under the covenant God made with the house of Israel! Astonishing!

Now let us notice the parties to this covenant. In Exodus xix. 5, the "if" is spoken, and a due preparation or sanctification by all Israel, then under Moses' instructions they assemble at the foot of the mount to hear "my voice" utter "my covenant," or "ten words," as recorded in Exodus xx. and in Deut. v. Then, and not till then, did Israel hear "my covenant," which they had promised to obey.

Q. Who heard the voice from the top of the burning mount?

The whole house of Israel, assembled at the foot of the mount.

Who are the parties to that covenant?

God upon the part of the first part; His voice utters the covenant; and Israel, upon the part of the second part, hears and promises to obey. Moses is the mediator of the covenant, between God and Israel.

What was the object of that covenant?

The land promised, and to which they were journeying at that time.

Were those ten words or ten precepts, or ten commandments called at that time of God through Moses a covenant?

Yes. See Exodus xxxiv. 28; xxxi. 18; xxxii. 15, 16; compare with Deut. iv. 13; x. 4; and by reading Ex. xx., and Deut. v., you will find the ten words, and why he added no more at that time.

What was written on the two tables of stone by the finger of God?

And he wrote them the ten words in tom two tables of stone, and delivered them to me. Deut. v. 22.

What were they called then?

The tables of the testimony.

Where were they placed?

In the ark made of shittim wood, under the mercy seat.

What was that ark called then and ever afterward, in the Scriptures?

Ark of the covenant. See Deut. xxxi 9, 25, 26; Num. x. 33; Josh. iii. 3.

Can this covenant, written by the finger of God, upon two tables of stone, and given by Moses to be deposited in the ark, under the mercy seat, be the law written by Moses in a book and commanded to be put by the side of the ark of the covenant of the Lord, saying, Take this book of the law, and put it in the side of the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God, that it may be there for a witness against thee? Deut. xxxi. 25, 26.

No, for this reason: The law, consisting of commandments, statutes and judgments, was given to Moses in the mount after the covenant had been uttered from Sinai's burning summit, in the day of the assembly.

Were not the ten commandments, or the covenant, in the book of the law?

I believe they were, but not a part of the law, for this reason: When Jesus was asked by the lawyer, "which is the great commandment in the law?" Jesus said, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment, and the second is like unto it. Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets." The covenant might have been placed as a preface, or appendix, as the constitution of the United States and the declaration of Independence are found in the same book with our statutes, though no part of the statutes, at all, by no means.

Are not the ten commandments the moral law?

They are never so called in the Scriptures, by prophets, or apostles, or Jesus.

Well, then, of what does the law consist?

Of all commandments, statutes and judgments, as found in Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers and Deuteronomy, beginning thus: "And the Lord said unto Moses, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, etc." See Exod. xx. 22.

But did not Moses give a law to the children of Israel?

No; he had none to give; but he was the mediator of the covenant that God had made with Israel, and as they failed to hear judgments and penalties connected with the violation of that covenant, Moses was commanded to say unto the children of Israel "Thus saith the Lord.

S. S. HAYDEN.

The Millennium.

To the Editor of the Herald, Baltimore, Sir:—In reading over the editorial in the Herald of the 4th of January on the "Millennium" one could not but be struck with the fact that the writer had been so preoccupied with other studies that he considered major importance, or that he considered the subject that he was then dealing with of such minor importance that he has not "posted" himself sufficiently to be able to give a correct view of it.

The first error that he falls into with regard to the Millennium is the confounding of it with millerism. The semilarity of the first syllable in the names has led to some confusion, the writer thinking evidently that they were both Mill-something-or-other. But two greater antitheses cannot easily be found notwithstanding this coincidence, Mr. Editor. On the one hand Miller (the founder of Millerism) taught that the earth on which we dwell, was, by a sudden and imminent conflagration to be wiped out of existence in the universe of God. On the other hand the ancient and well known doctrine of the Millenium teaches that on this same planet of ours there will be 1,000 years of peace, plenty, and prosperity, during which nation shall not lift up the sword against nation neither shall they learn war any more.

On the one hand Millerism is a recent invention founded on the popular error that the earth is to be consumed and destroyed by fire. On the other hand Millenarianism (if we may use the term) is a doctrine well known to have been promulgated by the most ancient christians (for proof of which we may refer to Gibbons' well known chapter on Christianity in the "Decline and Fall") and which is founded on the scriptural doctrine that the earth endureth forever.

Millerism teaches in perfect accord with popular nations on the subject—the immigration of all the righteous to some other sphere in the milky or other way. While Millenarianism teaches the ultimate reign of Jesus of Nazareth over our earth then peaceful and happy during his benign administration. Thus we see that the syllable Mill is by no means a conjunction to connect the two subjects.

To the denunciation of the writer aforesaid with regard to the weak-mindedness and wickedness of the doctrine of the Millennium we might reply that the world would be astonished upon further investigation of the subject upon whose heads he has poured his vituperative decision. Not proceeding at present to give the scriptural argument and the testimony of prophets and apostles, we might mention the well known fact that the doctrine of the Millennium was taught by the most eminent of the ancient Christians namely such as are known to moderns as the "Church Fathers." In more modern times we have such men as John Milton, the celebrated statesman, pamphleteer and poet. We have such men as Joseph Priestly, the physosopher and friend of President Jefferson, and known to science as the father of modern chemistry whose centennial was celebrated a few months ago both in this country and England. And such men we find are denounced by this writer as weak-minded and wicked. Men whose talents have swelled the admiration of two continents and whose lives and morals were above reproach.

But apart from all such personal considerations is it foolish or unreasonable to suppose that the earth on which we live is the work of a great and omnipotent intelligence in opposition to the theory that it tumbled together somehow and formed itself into shape. And is it a sign of weak minds to suppose that the same omnipotence will ultimately "take himself this great power and reign" through His representative, Christ, in opposition to the doctrine that the beautiful planet of ours has been chucked into space whirling and left to be run by wicked men. There is no doubt that professors of theology have made many and grave errors in their surmises with regard to the glorious times on which is founded their hopes; namely the advent of the King of the Jews. But do such errors prove that there is no King? No "peace and good will among men?"

How was it in the science of testimony with regard to the distance of the sun for instance. First in early times it was supposed to be a few miles above our heads, then it was found to be a few hundred miles, next it turned out to be thousands and now we have it millions and we don't know whether it will be billions soon or not. But still we confidently believe there is a sun, at least those of us that have the blessed gift of sight and we are not apt to have our faith shaken that there is a sun and also that the sun is somewhere even if Professors A, B, or C, cannot tell the exact distance or find out the exact spot. And can those that profess the name of Christ and believe in the words of his apostles doubt the return of him that loved them and that washed them from their sins in his own blood, because theologians cannot date his advent? Because Mr. Miller got excited forsooth, or Dr. Cummins, of London, had a theory of time that was false, therefore shall our brightest hopes be blighted, and therefore shall our night of sorrow never be illuminated by the "Bright and the Morning Star." Because, alas! some folks have been secured into a lunatic asylum by the preaching of Mr. Miller that our planet was to be exploded like Thomas-sellus barrel of dynamite touched off probably by the tail of a comet. Therefore Mr. Editor shall the lion of the tribe of Judah never return; and therefore shall the lamb that was slain forever absent himself from his weeping and wailing bride and she be left to mourn in sadness and despair?

J. F. G.

Justice and Equity.

I have been a tolerably close observer of matters and things in passing thus far through life, and among other things I have observed that some men support religion just as long as religion supports them; others profess religion as long as it costs them nothing, and abandon it as soon as a draft is made on their purses for building meeting houses, or sustaining preachers, or entertaining strangers, and in general the burden has to be borne by a few in every congregation. Now those upon whom the burden falls ought not to complain, for they are the only ones that will be prepared for settlement when the Lord comes—they are the only ones that can give an account of their stewardship. But the man who values religion on account of the support he derives from it, and the man who considers it worth nothing, are both at fault; and such men will be found without a passport when they come to pass the strait gate. The only passport that can be depended upon must read as follows: "I was hungry, and you gave me food; I was thirsty, and you gave me drink; I was naked and you clothed me: I was sick, and in prison, and you visited me; I was a stranger, and you entertained me," &c. These things you have done to my disciples, which is the same thing as though you had done them to me. The foregoing is the substance of the passport which men should obtain in order to pass through the strait gate, which leads to life eternal. How foolish men will look who approach the gate without the passport; they will be like the foolish virgins, who had lamps, but no oil in them, at the hour of midnight, when the bridegroom came. The fact is, that religion has been made to consist too much theory, and too little of practice. There is too much said about head and heart-felt religion, and too little about practical religion. The best proof a man can give of his religion is by his works; this is the way Apostle John recommended, and with him no religion would pass as pure and undefiled but that which relieved the distresses of fatherless children and widows.

But when I began to write, I intended to say, that as meetings which lasts two or three days or more, I am of opinion that a table should be spread at the common expense; or, in other words, that the expense should be defrayed out of the treasury, and that while thus worshiping we should have all things common—I mean all that we eat and drink during the time. Does not Paul hint at something like this in one of his letters to the Corinthians? and was not this the practice of the Jerusalem church while they continued to worship from day to day? They held the longest protracted meeting, perhaps, that has ever been held in any place, and during the whole time they had all things common; but after the meeting broke up we have no proof that the common stock continued. For afterward we read of poor saints in Jerusalem, which should not have been the case had all things remained common among them. All must have been poor alike, or else there could have been none poor. Affectionately your brother in Christ.

SAMUEL FRANKENBERGER, M. D.

What War has Done.

Dr. Fridaux states that, in fifty battles fought by Cæsar, he slew one million one hundred and twenty-two thousand of his enemies. If to this number we add the loss of troops on his side, and the slaughter of women and children on both sides, we shall probably have a total of two millions of human beings sacrificed to the ambition of one man! If we assign an equal number to Alexander and the same to Napoleon, which we probably may do with justice, then to three military butchers we may ascribe the untimely death of six millions of the human family. Sir Walter Raleigh says, "It may be affirmed that the number of those that have been slaughtered by their fellow creatures exceeds the number of inhabitants that were at any one time living upon the face of the earth; yet very few of this infinite number, untimely slain, were ever masters of the grounds of the disputes for which they suffered, or the true reasons of their being led to battle; the truth, with much artifice, being kept from all but those who were parties to the designs resolved on."—Selected.

THE RESTITUTION

PLYMOUTH, IND.....Feb. 23, 1876

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT

☞The following letter of John Wesley we clip from the last number of Littell's Living Age. In writing upon the subject of itinerant ministers, he says:

"For fifty years God has been pleased to bless the itinerant plan, the last year most of all; it must not be altered till I am removed, and I hope it will remain till our Lord comes to reign upon earth."—A. D., 1788.

☞C. W. Wendte accepted a call to become pastor of a Unitarian church in Cincinnati, on condition he should not be called upon to administer the Lord's supper. In view of the fact that Mr. Wendte does not believe that Christ will ever come again, and when we learn that it is to show for Christ's death until he does come, we think he should not administer the supper "whatsoever is not of faith is sin." Paul.

☞We hope our readers will subscribe for the child's paper, Sunshine. It is really the most readable and instructive child's paper that we have ever seen. Brother Willcox needs the encouragement of every friend of truth, and we hope they will favor him with at least one subscription. The paper is not only handsomely printed, but is well illustrated. It is just the paper for the young. See Bro. W.'s notice in this number.

☞A part of the time we were in the Advent chapel, and a part in the Methodist, the Presbyterians uniting, and also the Christian preacher. We think a careful observer would have been puzzled to tell to which denomination each one belonged. Our hearts were united by ties stronger than creed bonds—the love of Jesus.

So writes M. G. junior editor of the World's Crisis. We have no objection to Bible union, but we are at a loss to know how any believer in the Bible view of man and the personal coming of Christ, can so manage his words as to be taken for an orthodox! or all the orthodox talk the plain Bible? If we understand the Bible, there is a difference between the language of Ashdod and Canaan.

☞The ground on which the title "Rev." is allowed to dissenting ministers by the recent decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England is that the word is not a title of honor or courtesy which can be claimed by the clergy of the Established Church as a right. The judges hold that it is simply an epithet, "an adjective used as a laudatory epithet," a mark of respect and of reverence, but nothing more.—Exchange.

From the above it appears that the clergy have been defeated in their attempt to force all dissenting ministers to abandon the word "Reverend." It seems rather hard for the courts to take away the only distinguishing badge these gentlemen of "the cloth" possess. All common sense people are coming to the conclusion that Christianity is a system of principles and not of titles. Now let the word "elder" cease to be used as an epithet, and we shall come nearer to the Gospel rule.

Do Sceptics Agree?

Sceptics make merry over the fatally feuds of Christian churches, and, at the same time claim to be a happy and united brotherhood, fighting to free the world from priest-craft. As a rule, sceptics have never organized or united to build up anything, their mission has been to undermine faith in the Bible. For some years, however, all shades of infidels, free thinkers, liberals and religion haters, have been trying to unite and build a memorial hall to be known as THE PAINE HALL, Boston, as the modern Athens, was to have the wonderful altar, with the ancient inscription, TO THE UNKNOWN GOD. The whole army of Bible haters have been working with commendable zeal to erect a monument, but before they have an opportunity to enjoy the results of one love feast together, they become malignant and irascible. Mr. Leavers, editor of the Boston Investigator, infidel, pitches into Henderson, a correspondent of the Truth Seeker, another infidel sheet, in the following style:

We think that we are in duty bound to add in justification of Mr. Underwood, that considering from whom the report of his conversation comes, it is not entitled to any credit, because we know that the informer Henderson is addicted to misrepresentations. He said, for instance, in the Truth Seeker, so called, that upon one occasion which he previously named, "Mr. Mendum swore by the holy smoke!" A sillier or more untruthful story was never invented. Mr. Mendum is not a fool, even if Henderson takes extra pains to appear like one. Again: Henderson published that we said he was "a d—d meddlesome Scotchman!" This is another of his wicked imaginings, and not at all characteristic of us. We are not a swearer, but if he had represented us as saying that he is a presumptuous Scotchman, or an unscrupulous Scotchman, or a vain and arrogant Scotchman, he would have got our style and told the truth also. The trouble with Henderson is, "he draws upon his imagination for his facts," and of course his facts are imaginary, existing only in his fertile but disordered brain.

So it seems that even scepticism is not a complete cure for the ills of human nature. The leaders of the Paine Memorial Hall are leaving pain to complete it, but as they believe there is no cure for pain, they will have to stand it.

The Stone of Israel.

In last week's issue we publish an article from a correspondent upon the above subject. The writer claimed that another great personage is to arise whose mission, under Christ, is to gather the nations, etc. The only text which seems to favor that idea, is Gen. xlix. 24, "But his bow abode in strength and the arms of his hands were made made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob; from thence is the shepherd the stone of Israel.'

We do not understand that the shepherd, the stone of Israel, is to come from Joseph, but from God. Some early critics were in doubt as to the true antecedent, but it is now generally agreed that no reference is made to Joseph. Dr. Clarke translates the words as follows:

"By the hand of the mighty one of Jacob, By the name of the Shepherd, the Rock of Israel."

The Douay version has it, "His bow rested upon the strong, and the bands of his arms and his hands were loosed, by the mighty one of Jacob: thence he came forth a pastor, the stone of Israel."

To say that a great personage is yet to arise from the line of Joseph, seems to us to be rather far fetched. The view has been set forth at great length by the Mormons, who hold that another personage is yet to arise, and gather the nations, but at best it is an unsupported hypothesis, and is not maintained by the plain word of the Lord.

Abraham, the Father of Both Circumcision and Uncircumcision, or Jew and Gentile.

One included just as much as the other, in the Abrahamic covenant. Rom. iv, 6-12; Even as David also describeth the blessedness of the man unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works, saying, blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin. Cometh this blessedness, then, upon the circumcision only; or upon the uncircumcision also? for we say that faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness. How was it then reckoned? When he was in circumcision, or in uncircumcision? Not in circumcision, but in uncircumcision. And he received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had yet, being uncircumcised; that he might be the father of all them that believe, though they be not circumcised; that righteousness might be imputed unto them, also. And the father of circumcision to them who are not of the circumcision only, but who also walk in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham, which he had, being yet uncircumcised. Therefore it is of faith that it might be by grace; to the end the promise might be sure to all the seed, both Jew and Gentile. Not to that only which is of the law, but to that also which is of the faith of Abraham, who is the father of us all.

1. In all the apostles' writings, in reference to the Jews and Gentiles, as distinct classes, he uses the circumcision to denote Jews, or Israelites, and the uncircumcision to denote the Gentiles. He never uses the words Jew and Gentile, synonymously. He never calls a Jew a Gentile, nor a Gentile a Jew. As shown in a previous article, he unites these two old bodies into one new body—organization—and gives the new body a new name, which distinguishes it from all other bodies, viz.: Christians, or Christ's body, or the seed of Abraham. In this new arrangement, there is neither Jew nor Gentile, but they are both one in Christ. They are Abraham's seed by being Christ's, not by being either Jews or Gentiles.

2. The covenant was made with Abraham before he was circumcised, that he might be the father of both the circumcision and the uncircumcision, or of Jew and Gentile. Thus, neither class has any peculiar or exclusive claims upon Abraham as their father. Neither nationality or genealogy constitutes either class the children of Abraham, but the faith of Abraham, or the faith of Jesus, which is the same thing. Gal. iii, 7-9; Rev. xiv, 12.

3. The oath and covenant of God make the same promises sure to all the seed, whether they belong to the circumcision or uncircumcision, or Jew or Gentile.

4. This covenant confirmed with an oath, constitutes all the children of Abraham, not through the law, but through the righteousness of faith—the joint heirs with Christ of the world. Rom. ix, 13.

We read, "For the promise that he (Abraham) should be heir of the world, was not to Abraham, or the seed, through the law, but through the righteousness of faith." Thus, repudiating the position that the law, or its righteousness, gives any peculiar or exclusive claims to the Jews over or above the Gentiles. But the apostle goes a step further and boldly affirms that the position that makes the Jews, or they of the law, heirs through the righteousness of the law, makes the faith void, and the promises of none effect; ver. 14. "Therefore," he concludes, "it is of faith, that it might be by grace; to the end the promise might be sure to all—Jew and Gentile—the seed; not to that (seed the Jews) only which is of the law; but to that (seed, the Gentiles) also which is of the faith of Abraham, who is the father of us all, both Jew and Gentile; ver. 16.

Thus, again are we plainly taught that that great national barrier, the law that had so long separated Jew and Gentile, is now leveled with the dust, so that both may have access to the Abrahamic covenant, on precisely the same conditions, and be made equal heirs to the same glorious covenant. So far from the law giving any title to the promises covenanted to Abraham and his seed, it nullifies every title, and must be abandoned before there can be any hope of attaining such a title at all.

But we are told that the Gentiles never had the law. If he refers to the Sinaitic law, it is fully granted. Nor did Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, nor the twelve tribes of Israel, for four hundred and thirty years after the Abrahamic covenant was made, and confirmed with the oath of Almighty God have that law. But did the law nullify the covenant, or make its promises void? Emphatically, no! Hear Paul on this point, also: "And this I say, that the covenant that was confirmed before, in Christ, the law which was four hundred and thirty-two years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of no effect. For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise; but God gave it to Abraham by promise. Wherefore, then, serveth the law? It was added because of transgression, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made." Gal. iii, 17-18. The law was no part or appendage of the Abrahamic covenant. It existed four hundred and thirty years before the law system was inaugurated, and has existed eighteen hundred years since its abolition. The law system was only a temporal arrangement, designed to restrain the overt actions of the men for whom it was instituted, until Christ should come; and though his twelve apostles and their associate preceptors proclaim the Gospel or the covenant made to Abraham, to all nations, Jews and Gentiles, as the great law of faith, justification, and joint heirship of the the world. Gal. iii, 8; Rom. ix, 13. All the promises affixed to the law were temporal. Obedience to all the commandments and ordinances, only gave the promise long life, and prosperity in the land.

Referring to the promise of eternal life, through the Abrahamic covenant, alone, the apostle says: "For if there had been a law given, which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been given by the law. But the Scripture hath concluded all, both Jews and Gentiles, under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them (whether Jew or Gentile) that believe." Ver. 2-22.

It is further claimed that Christ died only for Israel, and not for Gentiles. Paul triumphantly answers and confutes this objection. He says: "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse—stigma—for us; for it is written, cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree." Ver. 13. Why did Christ die the accursed death of the cross? For the exclusive benefit or salvation of the Jews or Israelites? No. He adds, "That the blessing of Abraham might come one the Gentiles, (not a few Gentiles,) but the Gentiles as a class, in contrast with the Jews as a class. But we are told by those who manifest the same prejudice against the Gentiles that another class manifests against the Jews, that the Gentiles had no school master to bring to Christ. To which I would reply: 1. That the Jews, as a nation or a people, have to this day rejected the instructions of their school master. As well have no school master as not to heed his teachings. 2. Gentiles have the same school master, as for instructions relative to everlasting life, and the everlasting inheritance, through the promised seed, and heir of the world, that God's people had before the law was added to the covenant, underlaying this whole system with all its types and shadows, was the Gospel as the great law of faith and an endless life. 3. The Gentiles have him of whom all the law and prophets spake—the great antitype of all the types in former ages. Christ is the school master in this dispensation, to teach both Jew and Gentile. Having been vested with the authority of heaven and earth, he commanded his apostles to make disciples, or organize schools for him in every part of the habitable earth, teaching his pupils or learners, to observe all his rules, or commandments. Mat. xxviii. 18-20. The great law of faith, justification, righteousness, and salvation, in His school, is the covenant made with, or the Gospel preached to Abraham, before he was circumcised, that he might be the father of both Jew and Gentile, united in one school.

In this dispensation, there is one law, school and teacher, for Jew and Gentile, viz.: The Gospel. Paul refers to this rule of faith and righteousness in Rom. i, 16-17. He says: "For I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first and also to the Greek. For therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith; as it is written, the just shall live by faith." By comparing verses 15 and 16 it will be seen that Greek and Gentile are spoken of synonymously.

According to the foregoing the Gospel is the law, or rule of faith, justification, life, and salvation, both for Jew and Gentile. Of the same import is the following language of the apostle. He says, "And the Scripture foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the Gospel to Abraham, saying in thee shall all nations be blessed."—Gal. iii, 8. Thus, the Gospel preached to Abraham is the law of faith, or the rule of faith and justification for the Gentile world. Paul places the law of faith in contrast with the law of works, as the only rule of faith and practice in this dispensation. He says, "But now the righteousness of God, without the law, is manifested, being witnessed by the law and by the prophets." To declare, I say, at this time, his righteousness; that he might be just and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus. Where is boasting then? It is excluded by what law? Of works? Nay; but by the law of faith. Therefore, we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law. Then to prove that both Jew and Gentile are amenable to the law of faith, or the Gospel he exclaims. Is He the God of the Jews, only? Is He not God of the Gentiles, also? Yes, of the Gentiles, also. Seeing it is one God which shall justify the circumcision (the Jews) by faith, and the uncircumcision (the Gentiles) through faith."—Rom. iii, xxi, 26-30. Thus, in this dispensation there is one God, one Savior, one Gospel law of faith, for Jew and Gentile.

Addressing a church composed of Jews and Gentiles, Paul commands them to "bear one another's burdens and so fulfill the laws of Christ."—Gal. xi, 2. Referring to the old law system with its bondage, and its civil penalties in contrast with the great law of faith. Paul says, "For the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, hath made me free from the law of sin and death."—Rom. viii, 2. That old legal system affixed no mercy, no grace, on conditions of faith, or any other conditions.

Matthew xvi. 19.

"And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven."

Brother A. D. Carter, of Buttersville, Tama county, Iowa, writes: "I desire an exposition of Matt. xvi.

Not knowing the exact point of difficulty existing in his mind relative to this verse we will be under the necessity of answering more at length than otherwise would be necessary. This shall be our apology for the length of our exposition.

Then to the principal topics in the verse. And first we call attention to

THE KEYS OF THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN.

KEY—This word is used as a symbol of authority frequently in the Bible. See Isa. xxii. 22; Rev. i. 18; iii. 7. Campbell on the keys of the kingdom says, "stewards always wore the keys; and the giving of a key was a token of this office." Also upon this word we find in the Diaglott a foot note which reads: "It is said, that when the Jews made a man a doctor of the law, they used to put into his hands the key of the closet in the temple where the sacred books were deposited, and also tablets to write upon; signifying that they gave him authority to teach and explain the scriptures and law of God to the people."

NUMBER—It is generally supposed, as the term here is used in the plural that Peter was invested with two symbolical keys. One authorizing him, to preach the glad tidings of the resurrection of Christ to the Jews on Pentecost day and the other to the Gentiles; and as evidence for this position Acts xv. 7, is quoted, where Peter in the general council of elders, apostles and the church of Jerusalem, arose and said, "Men and brethren, ye know how that a good while ago, God made choice among us, that the Gentiles, by my mouth, should hear the word of the gospel, and believe." But there is no more evidence that Peter here in this council in A. D. 40 had reference to the conversation near Cesarea in A. D. 32, than there is that he referred to the vision while in Joppa upon the house top in A. D. 41. Again, when we compare Acts ii. with Acts x, we find that in substance the same things were declared, and the same things were required—faith and obedience—upon both occasions. Not two laws, but one law of induction to both Jew and Gentile.

WHEN USED—If the plural form of the word key is to be understood as relating to two parts in the commission given to Peter, then it must have reference to the finding and the loosing in the text; one key used in finding on earth and in heaven, and the other in loosing on earth and in heaven. Both keys used in the deliverance of every discourse. One "in he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved," and the other in he that believeth not shall be damned."

OF THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN—It is sometimes thought from the remark of the Savior here to Peter that he was the first who ever proclaimed to the world the law of induction into the kingdom and that many of those to whom he proclaimed it actually entered into the kingdom. But that the kingdom of God or heaven is not yet established is very evident when the following scriptures are read in the order in which I here give them: Luke xvi. 16, compared with Luke xix: 11, 13; Acts i. 6, 7. Now as these three texts are read together, read in the same way Col. i. 13 with Acts xiv: 21, 22; Luke xxi: 24, 31; xxii. 24, 30; Matt. xix. 17-28 with xxv. 31-34. Then Peter's charge must have been simply to proclaim to the world a law by which they might become heirs in the kingdom when it is established. Peter was not the first to proclaim to the world the terms of heirship in the kingdom, for the terms of heirship in the kingdom to a patriarch were known by Abraham, the terms of heirship in the kingdom to the Jews under Judaism were known by Moses, Aaron, Joshua, David, Solomon and all the faithful Jews. Then his charge was simply to introduce the terms of heirship for the Gentile age.

TERMS OF HEIRSHIP.

The terms of heirship into the kingdom in all ages—Patriarchal, Jewish and Gentile, have been, and still are, faith in the coming kingdom and obedience. But the commands under each have differed from the other. The terms proclaimed by Peter for the Gentile age are to be found either in specific or comprehensive terms, or both in his first discourse after his qualifications by the holy spirits descent upon him. The specific terms mentioned in the discourse after faith are found in Acts ii. 38. The comprehensive terms are found in the same chapter and ver. 40.

To learn then what is contained in the expression "with many other words did he testify and exhort," we will refer to other terms upon which heirship is specifically stated. Then in addition to, (after faith). Repentance and baptism in ver. 38, we have Acts xiv. 21, 22 "much tribulation. 2. In Rom. viii. 17, we have the joint-heirship suspended upon the condition, "if so be that we suffer with." 3. In John iii. 3, 5, we have the heirship suspended upon a birth of water, and a birth of the spirit. 4. In 2 Peter i. 5-11, we have in addition to faith as terms of heirship into the kingdom, virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness and charity, and by these, and through these, not before a calling and, an election to the heirship made sure. Then following the election, not before, comes the abundant entrance into the kingdom.

PETER'S PRE-EMINENCE.

A great deal has been said and written upon pre-eminence. But this pre-eminence does not consist, 1. In his being the foundation of the church. For inspiration does not sustain such an idea. But to the contrary James and John occupy with Peter the same position in the metaphysical building see Gal. ii. 9. Again all the apostles and prophets occupy in the metaphysical building an equal place with Peter Ephe. ii 19-21. Further Christ is that foundation, and no man, not even the Pope can lay any other. See 1 Cor. iii. 11. And lastly, the text does not justify such an idea. The word Peter in Matt. xvi. 18 comes from the word Petros a noun in the masculine gender, and the word rock comes from the word Petra a noun in the feminine gender, and therefore they cannot mean the same thing. The church then is not builded upon Peter, but upon THE CHRIST.

2. Peter's pre-eminence did not consist in receiving more power than the other apostles; for they received the the same commission and the same qualifications as he. See Matt. xviii. 18; John xx. 21-23; Luke xviv. 45-49; Acts i. 4-8; ii. 1-14.

3. Peter's pre-eminence did not consist in becoming bishop over the mother church—the first established by the apostles—the church in Jerusalem; for all history contedes this to the apostle James.

4. Peter's pre-eminence did not consist in having a position in the church at Rome, for there is no positive proof that Peter ever was in the city of Rome.

5. Peter's pre-eminence did not consist in having a successor to apostleship; for notwithstanding all that the Romish or English church may claim there are twenty-seven links missing in the chain of succession. See A. Campbell's and Bishop Purcell's debate. Furthermore Judas Iscariot was the only apostle who ever had a successor. Inspiration as evidence. See Acts i. 15-20.

Question.—If ministerial authority to establish churches and to administer the ordinances of the Lord's house acceptably, is to be derived through the apostolical succession from Peter, what about all the churches established, and work done by Paul for three years after his conversion? See Gal. i. 15-19. Here Paul who was the apostle to the Gentiles received not his commission from Peter to whom the keys were given, but from the Lord Jesus Christ himself.

Corollary.—Then Peter's use of the keys was not to confer ministerial power upon any one.

Further, in planting of churches Paul's work far exceeded that of Peter's. Again, in the importations of the miraculous power of the spirit to primitive church officers we find that other apostles were his equals. See Acts vi. 6; viii. 14-18; xix. 6; 1 Tim. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6.

Peter's pre-eminence then by the reception of the keys did not consist. In becoming the fou[illegible] church. 2. Not in the [illegible] greater power than the other apos[illegible] 3. Not in becoming bishop of the mother church planted by the apostles. 4. Not in becoming bishop of the church at Rome. 5. Not in having a successor. 6. Not in the conference of ministerial power.

But simply in becoming the honored one to first proclaim to the world under the Gentile age the terms for heirship in the coming kingdom. When this duty was discharged upon the day of Pentecost, then his pre-eminence ceased.

Local Libraries.

DEAR BRETHREN:—Upon consultation upon the subject of having a local library composed of such tracts and books, in small lots, best calculated to advance the cause of truth, in regard to the kingdom of God in all its details, we have come to the conclusion to try the experiment, with the confident expectation that it will realize our hopes, if persistently followed up as any other business must be in order to succeed. We propose to procure a variety of works in tract and book form, that we may be enabled to furnish readers information upon all the leading topics of the Bible concerning the plan of salvation. These tracts and books are to be kept by a librarian, and taken out and duly returned by readers and inquirers after truth. We also propose to connect this library with a school of investigation, either in the form of a Sunday school or a Bible class. The librarian is to see to loaning out the books and having them returned.

Therefore, Be it resolved; that the editors of the RESTITUTION send us samples of all such books and tracts as they may possess that may pointedly teach the leading doctrines of the Scriptures; and in sending samples they are directed not to send books exceeding fifty cents a volume in price; for which the payment according to a price list will be duly forwarded. From this sample list we will make out our complete order for our library.

And we, the undersigned, do most heartily recommend this plan to all the churches of God scattered abroad.

Signed:—Martin V. Burnside, Perry Parson, John Knife, Henry Kinfe, George Links, H. L. Lehman, J. P. Wagoner, Daniel Lehman, J. P. Knife, Wm. Eller.

P. S. We are closing a series of meetings conducted by Bro. J. F. Wagoner, an able expounder of God's Word, and, as a result of rightly dividing the word of truth, in its ancient purity, eight intelligent men and women have been brought into Christ, to walk in newness of life induced by the rich recompense of reward, to deny the deceitful lusts of the world; to God be all the praise. Yours for the truth.

The Sympathy of Jesus.

The sympathy of Jesus—who
That ever sobbed one sorrowing breast
On some kind bosom, fondly true—
Some human bosom, like our own,
And felt how much those lips close pressed.
That hand close clasped, could calm our fears,
Can turn turn oo this far toolerer breast.
Without a gush of thankful tears?

The earthly heart on which we lean,
May have its separate griefs to bear—
Griefs, though unspoken and unseen,
Yet rankling all the deeper there.
Its fathers strength may seat -tain
The torture of an own distress;
And still we add our burdening pain,
Unconscious how the weight may fall.

But he whose human feet have trod
Earth's hills and valleys—He who knew
No sympathy but that of God,
Though linked with all, that erred it, too—
Knows all our yearning, all our need,
Not strong to bear our inmost smart—
He loves to feel the throbbing head
Close laid against his pitying heart.

To Him, that on the throne of thrones
He wears one lowly nature still!
To think that amid the loftiest tones
That through the eternal mansions thrill,
Earth's humblest pleader he will hear,
That only tears his anguish tell,
That sobbing voice falls on his ear
More sweet than Gabriel's ever fell.

Then, sorrowing spirit, take the grief
Thou ne'er to mortal couldst disclose,
And he will give thee sure relief,
Touched with the feeling of thy woes:
And thou shalt understand how sweet,
How filled with more than human bliss,
How dear, how tender, how complete
The sympathy of Jesus is!

Faithful.

MRS. M. D. A. CROZIER.

Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day and forever.

Thou art the same—my poor soul changes oft,
Now near, now far from thee;
Thou art the same—thy faithfulness to-day
Repeats the yesterday.

Why learn I not this truth? Why fail I so
Thy constant love to see?
Why can I not as true be to that love
As thou to me?

Forever—'tis not thou forgettest me,
But I thy wondrous grace;
'Tis mine own sin that draws the curtain down
Before thy face.

Duality Theology.

What a striking contrast exists between the teachings of the Bible and orthodoxy! The following summary will show the points at issue, which to say the least, are sufficient to cause one to think seriously of orthodoxy.

1. Orthodoxy presents two hopes, one to be realized at death, by the spirit, the other to be realized by the body at the resurrection. Whereas, the Bible teaches but "one hope," which embraces the coming of Christ, the resurrection of the dead, and the fulfillment of the "promises made of the fathers." Proof, Eph. iv. 4; 1 John iii. 2-3; Acts. xxiv. 14-15; Acts xxvi. 6-9; Gen. xiii. 14-18; Gal. iii. 15-19.

2. Orthodoxy teaches that man will have two rewards,—one will be given to the spirit at death, the other, ("the full reward") will be given at the judgment. The Bible teaches but one reward, which is now reserved, in heaven, and will not be given till Jesus comes, who will bring it with him; instead of men going to heaven to obtain it. This reward will be an inheritance of the earth forever, in an immortal state. Proof, Matt. v. 12; 2 Pet. i. 2-5; Rev. xxii. 12; Col. iii. 2-4; Isa. lx. 20; Rev. v. 9-10.

3. Orthodoxy teaches two judgments; one takes place when the soul goes before God, and then they have another when the "soul re-unites with the body at the judgment day;" thus making two. The Bible teaches that nothing is to be judged "before the Lord comes," and that God "hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world" by his Son. Proof, 1 Cor. iv. 5; Acts xvii. 31; 1 Tim. iv. 1-3.

NOTE.—Has God ever promised two trials for one life of probation? Why judge a man twice for the same acts? It is not God's way of proceeding.

4. Orthodoxy also presents two kingdoms, one to be enjoyed in this life, the other is above the heavens, or as the poet has it,

"Beyond the bounds of time and space,
We look forward to that happy place,
The saints' secure abode."

This kingdom is to be given at the judgment. The Bible teaches that Jesus has gone to "receive for himself a kingdom and to return," which is to be given to the saints at his second coming. And this kingdom will be "under the whole heavens," and not above, as poets say. Proof, Luke xix. 11-15; 2 Tim. iv. 1; Rev. xi. 15-17; Dan. vii. 13, 14, 17, 18, 27. Proof, 1 Tim. ii. 5; John xv. 26.

5. Orthodoxy presents "two hells,"—one is the intermediate place wherein the soul is retained until judgment. The second hell will not be until after the judgment, and that will be eternal. On the other hand the Scriptures teach but one place of punishment, and that is to be on the earth, at the end of the millennium, at which time the wicked will be "destroyed forever." Proof, Prov. xi. 31; Job xxi. 30; Psa. xci. 7; Rev. xx. 1-15.

NOTE. The Bible no where teaches that the wicked are to change hells! Neither does it teach that they are to stay in one till the judgment, and then be cast into another. The destiny is "death." Rom. iv. 23; Ezek xviii 4, 20; James v. 20.

6. Orthodoxy teaches two second comings of Christ, one when good men die, the other at the final judgment; one figurative, the other real. God's Word talks about a second coming of Christ, but nothing about two more. That coming is to be personal and visible. Proof, Heb. ix. 26 28; Acts i. 11; Dan. vii. 13; Matt. xxiv. 29-30; 1 Thess. iv. 13-17.

7. Orthodoxy claims that man has two natures—the soul which is immortal, and the body mortal. The Scriptures teach that the soul is subject to death as the body, and that it dies And that immortality is not put on till the resurrection, and then by those only who have sought for it. Proof, Josh. x. 28. 37, 39; Josh. xi. 11; Psa. lxxviii. 50; Ezek. xviii. 4; James v. 20; 1 Cor. xv. 53-54; Rom. ii. 7.

8. Orthodoxy also talks of two baptisms, sprinkling and immersion. The Bible presents one baptism, which is a planting in the likeness of Christ's death, a burial, a going down into the water. Proof, Rom. vi. 1 4; Acts viii. 36-39; Eph. iv. 1-4.

9. Orthodoxy tells us about a "double sense," being attached to the Bible; that is to say, there is a literal sense and a mystic sense. Hence two meanings. Jesus has told us, however, that God's Word is yea and not nay, and Peter informs us that no prophecy of the Scripture is of any private interpretation.

NOTE. This two-sense doctrine has given rise to the double theology noticed above, and no wonder the world is led to believe that nothing certain can be known about the Scriptures.

10. Orthodoxy presents two ways of proving a future life. They first say man must live forever, because his soul is immortal and cannot die. Then again, he must life forever, because he is to be raised from the dead. Both theories cannot be true, scripturally speaking. For one or the other is needless. If a man can live forever without a resurrection, it is useless to rest the argument for a future life on that event. But the Scriptures show that the resurrection is the only way of obtaining a future existence. Proof, 1 Cor. xv. 17, 18, 32; John v. 28.

11. Orthodoxy teaches that there are three Gods. "God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost." Whereas the Scriptures teach that there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus;" and that the Holy Spirit is sent from the Father and the Son.

The reader will perceive that the foregoing contrast, that the Word of God stands opposed to the teachings of men, in all the great features of theology. Now which will you receive? The two theories are before you. The Word of God, and the Word of man. Jesus says, "In vain they do worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men." Matt. xv. 9. Be careful, then, that you are not heeding the sayings of men instead of what God has spoken. Light and darkness, truth and error, God and Belial, Christ and the world, life and death, are all before you; and it is left for you to make your choice as to which you will serve.

The solemn realities of the judgment will portray your destiny. Oh, then, may you heed the warnings of the truth, obey its voice, stand firmly to the revelations of truth amid the traditions of men, and all will be well.

God has spoken and desires you to listen to his voice. The sacred truths which the Bible records, are confirmed by the awful symbols and majesty of the Most High, will you neglect them? Will you go with the guilty tide until it rolls over the avalanche of eternal death? Error can do you no good. It will at last lead you to the grave of the unwary. But truth believed and obeyed will sanctify and redeem you, and give you a home of eternal rest on the bright plains of Eden restored when Jesus shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously. May you and I, dear reader, be found among the white-robed throng, with shining diadems, and waving the palms of victory on the sunny landscapes, where the good of all ages will join in the anthems of eternal praise.

Turkey is rich with ships, and has fifteen immense ones, valued at $2,000,000 apiece, that are rotting for want of use. They lie idle in the Bosphorus all summer, their only use being to fire salutes every Friday when the Sultan goes to the Mosque. They never go to sea, and if they did they would be likely to founder in the first gale, for they are clumsy affairs, and the Turks are poor sailors. The only voyages they make are when in the spring they are taken out of the Golden Horn and anchored in the Bosphorus, a distance of about two miles, and when in the fall they are taken back to their winter quarters in the Golden Horn.

Berean's Casket.

PREPARED BY G. M. MYERS.

We are frequently, when submitting to an audience that the primary meaning of the word spirit as given by all lexicons is wind, air in motion, the breath of the mouth, a principle contained in the air, by some one met, urging that the definition cannot be correct, because it will not make sense to substitute it for the word in every place where that word occurs in the Bible. With equal success we can reply that the sense will be rendered very absurd to supply the qualifying terms, immortal, or never-dying, before this word wherever found. We give below some of the diverse kinds of spirits spoken of in the Bible; and let those who contend earnestly for an immortal and never-dying spirit, try their hand at substitution or supplying.

Correspondence.

Dear Brother G. M. Myers: Your welcome letter of the 12th inst., enclosing letter and $4 from church at Fonthill, Ont., received with thanks. May God bless the dear brethren and sisters who so kindly aid me and others in the work. I have been unable to get out of the house for a week past, on account of an attack of chronic rheumatism, but am better this morning with hopes of being entirely well in a day or two more. Was to baptize several last Saturday, but it was postponed on account of my sickness. Think I can attend to it this week. The prospects are very good here for a church, but it is coming up through much tribulation I have held about fifty meetings here from first to last and the opposition is the most bitter I ever experienced at any point. Indeed it is now thought that if I preach any more, I shall be rotten egged. But I shall go straight ahead, trusting in the Lord. As soon as I can I will try and go over to Shawneetown as you suggest. Am going to try and get me a horse to ride through the country. My wife is now fully in the faith and will be immersed as soon as I am able to go into the water. She came freely and voluntarily. Yours in the one hope. AMOS SANFORD.

DEAR RESTITUTION:—It is with pleasure I drop you this note, for the encouragement of all who read your valuable paper and who look for the coming of Christ in his kingdom as set forth by the word. Many of your readers have looked with wonder at the great work Brother Moody has done, and is doing. It seemed to me that he is the John, the baptist of these latter times, crying: Prepare ye the way. Now, Brother Moody is building a very fine church here, which is to be paid for when completed and dedicated to the Lord clear of debt. They have a large Sunday school of earnest workers, and during Brother Moody's absence, Brother Eardman, a very learned gentleman, has been his successor in preaching and reading the word to this people. And he is a true scholar of the word. At the request of a few friends, he met us in the parlors of Brother F. M. Rockwell, an earnest worker in the Young Men's Christian Association, and who is anxious to know the truth. Among the ladies and gentleman present, was a number of theological students, and it was with intent interest all beheld to the explanation of the word. With the cordial consent of the pastor and trustees of the Immanuel Baptist Church, another meeting was held on Monday evening and are to continue them weekly. A goodly number assembled and listened with close and anxious thought as the speaker explained the future coming of the kingdom I say to me it was a pleasure as I listened to the words and thoughts as they came from the mouth of the speaker, and seemed so strange to many and yet so familiar to one who is a careful reader of the word and of your valuable paper. He says this doctrine of Christ appearing and kingdom, is making wonderful strides in these latter days, and while he was speaking, I thought of the cruel taunts and insults that many worthy men like Brother Sanford, Magruder, Stevenson, Wilson and others get, because they are poor in this world's goods and do not preach a fashionable religion. Go on ye slighted and rejected ones of worth, for if ye sow now when Christ comes, who is our life, then shall ye reap. Mysterious are thy ways, O, God. Yours truly,

C. H. ADAMS.

Gleanings.

PREPARED BY G. M. MYERS.

I. N. Robins, of Shenandoah, Penn., under date of Feb. 8, writes:

"I came into the truth about one year ago. We have seventeen here in the faith. Ten of this number came in lately. We are all with the exception of one, formerly Methodists. We call ourselves Christadelphians; but, however, we are thorough restitutionists, and prize your paper very highly. I cannot find any difference in the faith. If there is any wrong with the Christadelphians, we would be glad to know it. For we will prove all things and hold fast to what is good. I will say, as for your paper, I believe it to contain the whole truth."

Respectfully, J. R.

The term Christian signifies a follower of Christ; the term Disciple of Christ, signifies a learner of Christ; and the term Christ-adelphian, signifies a brother of Christ. We cannot see any great wrong in any one desiring the name, who has complied with the law which entitles him to appropriate it: "For whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother." Matt. xii. 50. These are significant terms applicable to the individuals of the body—the church; but Christ-adelphian church, Christian church, Disciple's church, Baptist church, Methodist church, Presbyterian church, and many other names worn now-a-days, are entirely strangers to the Bible. The Bible talks of the church of Christ and the church of God. But we are happy to learn that prejudice in many directions is breaking away; and welcome Bro. Robbins and the church at Shenandoah among us as co-workers; and pray that our labors together may be pleasant.

OBITUARY.

HERRON—Jan. 17, 1876, Brother George Herron, of Cambaze, Mo., in the 65th year of his age

Brother Herron was a strong believer in the Gospel of the Kingdom of God. He died in bright hope, awaiting the glad day of rest.

Pamphlets at Reduced Prices.

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS:

Having been obliged, on account of our want of means, to leave the field in the proclamation of the coming kingdom and reign of our Messiah on the throne of David, in and through the dispensation of the fullness of times, or rest day that remains to the people of God now—ding of the one thousand years of Revelation—, and its kindred truths, therefore I write a few lines to inform the brethren that when traveling with the tent, Brother C. F. Sweet and myself saw the necessity of a small work on "Primitive Christian Faith," and as Brother Sweet had the manuscript on hand, we concluded to get out an edition; also another edition of the "Tree of Life" and "Colloquy" combined, by C. F. Sweet. With our own means, and the help of others, we got out the pamphlets. On account of the hard times in this region of country, we were obliged to cease in our mission work with the tent, and therefore we have quite a few of the pamphlets on hand.

I am anxious to have these silent preachers at work. What I have on hand I will dispose of at reduced price:

Eight of the "Primitive Christian Faith" for $1, postage paid. Six of the "Tree of Life" and "Colloquy" combined for $1, postage paid. Original price, 20 cents single, or $2 a dozen.

Who will help to scatter them, and thereby help me, for I need help, and I do not want the pamphlets to lie idle. I am at present preaching to the little church here, and shall go to other places as duty may demand. Pray for us.

Yours, in the hope,
JOHN T. ONGLEY.

To the Friends of Truth Who Read the "Restitution."

Relying on the earnest desire for a child's paper, so often expressed to us through the RESTITUTION, to me personally, and in various other ways, I have brought out "SUNSHINE." The January number was sent you with the hope that it would meet with your approval, and receive your support: but upon reflection, and a further examination of other papers published for the children, I decided to double the size of "SUNSHINE," without increase of price, thus giving you the largest and cheapest paper now published for children in the world.

It is now absolutely without a rival in the field, and cannot fail to please all who see it.

I have done this without pledge, without donations or assistance of any kind, and without capital; relying on the merits of the paper itself, your desire to have it, and your generosity and sense of duty to the people to sustain it and carry the enterprise through successfully. Thus far, but little more than one-fourth of those to whom the RESTITUTION is a regular visitor, have responded with even a single subscription.

Now, are you friendly to the enterprise? Do you wish it to prosper? Does the paper meet your expectations? If so, will you do anything to sustain it? Will you send me your subscription? Will you do what you can to get others to subscribe?

If you wish to see the February number before subscribing, send ten cents for sample copy. It is printed on fine tinted book paper, is illustrated, and contains, besides a large quantity of reading matter for old and young, the beautiful song: "The Light of the World is Jesus," which is alone worth a year's subscription.

Remember that "SUNSHINE" is now a large eight-page monthly, illustrated with cuts, and music, and only costs fifty cents annually, postage included.

Direct to "SUNSHINE," Box 456, Fort Atkinson, Wisconsin.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

I am arranging with Brother, C. P. Graham, of Waynesville, Illinois, to hold a meeting at his place, commencing March 24th; and then I expect to go to Indianapolis and other points. Now, if any of the brethren living on the I. C. Railroad, or other portion of the route I will have to travel, want meetings, let them write me at once, and they can be accommodated, and save traveling expenses. While out on a lecturing tour I want to speak twice a day—say at 2 p. m. and at evening. I use Elder Adams' large Illustrated chart, or "Map of all History," which is 22 feet long by 30 inches wide. And it will pay any of the brethren or others wishing knowledge, to give a week's time to its careful study.

Address, AMOS SANFORD,

Battle Song of the Church.

H. BONAR.

Fear not the foe, thou flock of God,
Fear not the sword, the spear, the rod,
Fear not the foe.
He fights in vain who fights with thee;
Soon shalt thou see his armies flee,
Himself laid low.

Come, cheer thee to the toil and fight;
'Tis God, thy God, defends the right;
He leads thee on.
His sword shall scatter every foe,
His shield shall ward off every blow:—
The crown is won.

His is the battle, his the power,
His is the triumph in that hour;
In him be strong.
So round thy brow the wreath shall twine,
So shall the victory be thine,
And thine the song.

Not long the sigh, the toil, the sweat,
Not long the fight-day's wasting heat,
The shadows come.
Slack not thy weapon in the fight,
Courage! for God defends the right;
Strike home! strike home!

Restoration of Judah and Israel.

BY JOSEPH SAMUEL C. F. FREY.

Author of a Hebrew Grammar. A Hebrew, Latin, and English Dictionary. And Editor of Vander Hooght's Hebrew Bible

After commenting on Zech. xii, 10-14, Frey quotes Dr. Fuller, on the same, who says, "That we may perceive the connection of this prophecy. It will be proper to observe, that Zech. xi contains a prediction of the overthrow of the Jewish nation by the Romans; but Zech. xii contains a prophecy of their restoration, and this is, therefore, called 'The burden of the word of the Lord.' In ver. 1, the events of this and the preceding prophecy, though wide asunder as to time, yet very properly follow each other. Paul takes but little notice of the state of the Jews during their long dispersion, but passing over that chasm, as included in their being 'broken off,' proceeds to speak of their being 'grafted in again.' It were presumptuous to be very positive as to the meaning of a prophecy which is yet to be accomplished; but, comparing it with other prophecies of the same event, the following particulars appear to be conveyed by it: 1. That the Jews (as a nation,) shall be restored to their own land prior to their conversion; ver. 6.

2. That a grand combination will be formed against them, with a view to dispossess them; ver. 2 9.

3. That the nations engaged in this combination will be repulsed and sorely punished for their presumptious attempt; ver. 2-6.

4. That the country and city shall be united against the enemy; ver. 5-7.

5. That they shall be guarded by Providence, and strengthened to encounter the greatest difficulties; ver. 8.

6. That after these temporal interpositions, the Lord will pour upon them a spirit of grace and supplications; and they shall lament over their sins, and the sins of their fathers, particularly of having crucified the Lord of glory; ver. 10.

Finally, the remedy to all this grief is mentioned, Zech. xiii, 1. "In that day there shall be a fountain opened to the house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for sin and for uncleanliness. By looking to Jesus they were wounded, and by looking to Jesus they are healed. The first fruits of this great work appeared on the day of Pentecost, when thousands were pricked to the heart, repented, and were baptized in that name which they had despised; but the lump is yet to appear."—[Fuller. Frey then says in conclusion of his own exhaustive argument on the subject of their restoration, "Thus, I hope, I have, to your satisfaction, established, upon divine testimony, the proposition that our dear people, both Judah and Ephraim, will be brought back to their own land, and after that, be brought to the belief in the Lord Jesus Christ; yet it may not be improper to remind you of a few facts, as collateral evidence.

"It is the opinion of many eminent writers, that our people have never yet possessed all the land which God promised to our fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; but the time will surely come, when our faithful, covenant keeping God will fulfill his promises in the fullest extent. * * *

"Permit me to mention one more argument in favor of the speedy return of our people to the land of Canaan, viz.: The removal of the obstacles out of their way. Not only are they prepared by the remarkable hand of Providence to return at a moment's warning, but the way is also preparing for them. The great river, Euphrates, is drying up; the once terrible Turkish Empire is crumbling into pieces; and the determined time for the land to be trodden under foot by the Gentiles, is near its close, and kings talk of becoming their nursing fathers, and queens their nursing mothers."

I will now endeavor to answer a question frequently proposed, viz.: If the Jews return to their own land, will they rebuild the city of Jerusalem? Will they have a temple, altar, sacrifice, and priest? First, as it respects Jerusalem, there can be no reasonable doubt in the mind of those who will be guided by the plain word of God. Almost in every passage, where the restoration of our people to their own land is mentioned, the building of the city of Jerusalem, in its own place, is also mentioned. (Quotations.) Nor ought we to lose sight of the blessed Jesus himself, who said, 'And Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled,' which evidently implies that when the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled, Jerusalem shall no longer be trodden down, but rebuilt and inhabited again by her own people. (Frey then quotes Drs. Guise, Gill, and Doddridge, in support of this view,) and adds, "As it respects the other questions, about building a temple, and having an altar, and sacrifice, &c., &c., my answer to the whole is in the affirmative." * * * Why should it be thought strange to believe that our people who have, for nearly eighteen hundred years, most conscientiously observed all the religious rites which God gave to our fathers, in all countries, amongst all people, and under all circumstances, as far as the law of God allows them to observe them in a strange land, although these observances exposed them to reproach, hatred, persecution, and death itself, would, when they are brought back by the wonderful goodness of God, to the land which God gave to our fathers, build again a temple for the worship of God, erect an altar unto the Lord, and offer up their sacrifices, and observe all other ceremonies which they observed before their dispersion by the Romans? Did they not do so after their return from the Babylonish captivity? How strange and unaccountable would it appear if our people, (who, whilst the chastening hand of God was upon them for ages, were, notwithstanding, steadfast and immoveable in worshiping that God,) should cast off all their religious profession, love and attachment to him, when he has performed his promises in delivering them out of their captivity, and brought them back to the goodly land? Would not such a supposition charge them with "having denied the faith, and become worse than infidels?" God forbid that they should ever act so basely. I am aware that this sentiment is not only open to an objection, which I hope to meet by and by, but some will even charge me with heresy; for a learned and pious author has already expressed himself. He says, "It will not be denied that the possession of that land—of Canaan,—by the natural posterity of Abraham, formed an integral part of that covenant. (The Sinaic.)"

Accordingly, as long as that covenant remained in force, Israel retained possession of the land; but when Paul wrote his epistle to the Hebrews, that economy had waxed old, and was ready to vanish away. Now to me, (says this author,) "it appears that, to contend for the return of the Jews, as a nation, to their own land, is in effect to 'build again the things that are destroyed;' it is virtually denying that the Sinaic covenant has vanished away—it is pleading for its restoration—it is, in a word, denying that Christ is come; or, if come, it is denying that his kingdom is not of this world." To this, Frey says, in answer, "These are hard sayings. Here is multum in parvo. A bad spirit, bad theology, and bad reasoning. This is condemning in a lump a host of the most eminently learned and pious Christians in every age, who have believed that the Jews were to return again to their own country. Here is a sad confounding of the covenant which God made with Abraham, which had the land of Canaan for its object, the natural posterity of Abraham for its subjects, and circumcision for its seal; with that covenant which the Lord made with our fathers, when he brought them out of Egypt, which had the promised Messiah, and salvation by him, for its antitype. The former is called the Abrahamic; the second, the Sinaic covenant. Hence the latter vanished away when Christ came, as the shadow gives way to the substance; but when and where did God say that the Abrahamic covenant should be disannulled, or vanish away? On the contrary, "Heaven and earth may sooner cease than this covenant." Jer. xxxi, 35-38. These two covenants are as distinct in their nature and duration, as the covenant made with Noah, and that made at the foot of Mount Sinai. And although the Abrahamic was included in the Sinaic, yet as the former existed before the latter was made, so likewise it continued in force after the other waxed old, and vanished away."

(To be Continued.)

It is a remarkable fact that Pius IX, now in his eighty-fourth year, has already buried more than a hundred cardinals, part of them created by his predecessors, and the rest named by himself since he came into office.

Reasons for Rejecting the Resurrection of the Unjust.

1. Because the Old Testament does not teach it; on the contrary we find in every passage when punishment is set forth, it is confined to this life.

2. Because the silence of Moses and the prophets on this doctrine is, to me, presumptive evidence that it cannot be true, otherwise those under the Old Covenant were left in helpless ignorance of an important element in God's retributive justice.

3. Because the doctrine thus dishonors God who "delights in mercy," and "is just in all his ways," and who, instead of concealing such a truth from forty-two generations of Israelites, had it been for their benefit, would have acted in harmony with his declaration. Amos iii. 7. "Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets," in place of taking them by surprise when they are helpless and hopeless.

4. Because Paul declares, Heb. ii. 2, that every transgression and disobedience (under the law) received a just recompense of reward. If so, then any punishment beyond what they have already received, would be unjust.

5. Because the Scriptural signification of the term "unjust," as distinguished from "just," embraces the whole world of sinners without distinction or classification, as witness, Matt. v. 45, "Causes his sun to shine upon the evil and the good, and sendeth his rain on the just and on the unjust," (meaning the whole world), also 1 Cor. vi. 1. "Dare any of you having a matter against another go to law before the unjust, (meaning the Pagan rules) and not before the saints?"

6. Because, therefore, upon no Scriptural exegesis can the resurrected of the unjust be taught without bringing up such characters and persons as are clearly excluded in the following Scriptures, which please turn to and read John xiii. 19, 20; Job x. 18, 19; Jer. ii. 30.

7. Because of the general truth taught, for instance, by Job in chap. vii. 9. "He that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more." Chap. xiv. 12, "So man lieth down and riseth not, till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake nor be raised out of their sleep," chap. xx., etc. The exception to the rule being the righteous as in his own case.

8. Because Christ nowhere teaches it, nor uses it as an incentative to diligence as so common nowadays. On the other hand, when warning his hearers, the Jews, including his apostles, of judgments to come, ignoring any such doctrine now considered so fundamental, he points to a judgment, (the judgment of Gehennai), pertaining to this life and which, as all know, overtook them when Titus destroyed their city and nation.

9. Because the Lord Jesus in the only exposition of the resurrection which he gave, (See Luke xx.,) confines it to the righteous, and this, in answer to a question from the Sadducees, touching the matter broadly. "In the resurrection, whose wife of them is she?" The answer being, "they who shall be accounted worthy to obtain the resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given in marriage, neither can they die any more, for they are equal unto the angels," etc.

10. Because the words of Jesus, recorded in John vi. 39, 40, 44 and 54, can admit of but one interpretation, viz: That to be "raised up again at the last day," is the exceptional and blessed privilege of the righteous, otherwise his promise has no force—is, in fact, deceiving, if all or any other than the righteous are to be raised up.

11. Because it is nowhere taught in the acts of the apostles, unless the spurious words, "both of the just and unjust" in the 15th verse of the 24th chapter, are retained as genuine.

12. Because it is not taught in any of the epistles to the churches. On the other hand, we find the churches reminded of the judgments that befell the world and Israel under the law, and quoted as having been "written for our admonition," and as "making them an ensample unto those that after should live ungodly." See 1 Cor. x. 5, 6; 2 Peter ii. 5, 6.

13. Because every allusion to the resurrection in the epistles, clearly show it to be the privilege of the righteous. See Rom. viii. 11; 1 Cor. xv. The force of this chapter is overpowering. 1 Cor. vi. 14; 2 Cor. iv. 14; Phil. iii. 11. If, by any means, I might attain unto a resurrection from among the dead.—Diaglott; 1 Thess. iv, 13, 18 etc.

14. Because the resurrection is set forth as a thing of "hope," (see Acts xxiii. 6; xxiv. 15; xxvi. 6-8), which it could not be, were there an element of doubt as to its issue.

For these and other reasons, I have long since discarded the resurrection of the unjust with its kindred fables of immortal soul, hell and devil. I am, of course, aware of the existence of certain isolated texts of Scripture, which are relied upon by the numerous advocates on the other side of the question, the authority of one of which, and that the most important one, I have dared to impugn for good and sufficient reasons.

I refer to the words, "both of the just and of the unjust," in the 15th verse of the 24th chapter of Acts.

My objection to the words in the connection in which they occur, arises simply from the indisputable but strange to say overlooked fact, that the Pharisees did not, and in the nature of things could not believe in the resurrection of the unjust, but only of the just. They could not upon Scriptural grounds, because Moses and the prophets (their only Scriptures) did not teach it. As a matter of fact and history, they did not believe it. See Josephus' Book xviii. chapter 1, Sec. 3, of his Jewish Antiquities. "They (the Pharisees), also, believe that souls have an immortal vigor in them, and that under the earth, there will be rewards and punishments according as they have lived virtuously or vicIously in this life; and the latter are to be detained in an everlasting prison, but that the former shall have power to revive and live again." The conclusion from this is obvious and unavoidable, viz.: That Paul could not have used the disputed words attributed to him; otherwise he was not in harmony with the Pharisees, because they denied what he affirmed with regard to the unjust, while at the same time they "allowed a resurrection of the dead," but only of the righteous.

I cannot insist too strongly on brethren taking these facts into consideration, especially in view of the preponderating weight of testimony all tending in the same direction.

I now leave the subject to the wise consideration of good and honest minds, perfectly assured of its truth and value, and of its being the one only safe and abiding position on this important subject.

JAMES W. CRICHTON.

How to Determine the Equality of our contributions.

That it is the duty of all the members of the church, to contribute to its funds statedly, as God has prospered them, and not so that one be eased and another burdened, but by equality, is plainly stated in the New Testament. But how to come at this equality is not stated. This is the question before us. How shall each one know how much of his prosperity he ought to pay so as to be equal to what others pay of their prosperity, and so that one be not eased and another burdened. To know this would be a great relief to many members of the church, who are willing to pay all that belongs to them to pay, and would rather pay more than less.

Some think that we cannot reach anything like equality in this matter if we try. Others seem to think that our impressions, or feelings, or guessings, or, to divide what we happen to have in our pockets when the contribution is called for, is sufficiently accurate for all practical purposes. But as it is impossible to co-operate together equally, efficiently, and satisfactorily in this way, and as we all of us are more or less liable to a selfish bias, it seems necessary that some easy and impartial rule should be agreed upon by the church, by which to compare the contributions of its members.

Now, although it be conceded that we may not secure exact equality, it is believed that, "if we have a willing mind," an honest effort to come at this equality by a little calculation, will come much nearer to it than if no such effort is made. And as exact equality is the standard of perfection in this matter, the nearer we can approach to it, the better will our work be done. If, in our effort to show a more excellent way, we should fail to suggest the very best way in which it can be done, we trust the brethren will bear with us, and allow at least, that our effort is a laudable one, and an effort for a much needed reform.

As Brother Cook says, the manner of doing this work is a question "which is left to the wisdom and prudence of the brotherhood."

There are among the saints always the poor whose income does not exceed their current expenses from year to year. There are also those among them whose income exceeds their expenses and whose property increases from year to year. While it is true that all should contribute to the funds of the church as God has prospered them, it is also true, and evident to all that the first class named should not contribute as large a portion of their income for this purpose, as the second class. But, all are alike subject to current living expenses, from which they do not receive an income. Then it would be just and equal for all to pay an equal proportion of the income used in this way. Let all pay alike per cent. of this income. Let all who have an income above their living expenses, pay a larger per cent. on this part of their income, than on that which has been used in defraying the expenses of the family. Let all pay alike per cent. of this income. Then we may have an equitable rule for all the income of the members of the church.

Let us then, suggest and recommend to the churches something like the following rule as an experiment:

1. Let the church designate a stated time for its contributions, whether weekly or monthly, quarterly, or yearly, although from our experience we would think it better to be monthly.

2. Let each member of the church report, or if husband and wife and children, let them jointly report to the deacon of the church their income and their living expenses for the previous month, to be recorded in his church book of account.

At the time of making this report, let them pay into the funds of the church one per cent. of their income to the amount of their living expenses and at the end of the year, let them pay five per cent. on the balance of their net income, over their living expenses.

At Grand Rapids they pay both the one per cent. and the five per cent., monthly; at Jamestown they pay the one per cent. monthly, and the five per cent. at the end of the year. It is thought that in farming communities it is the better plan to pay the five per cent at the end of the year.

To do this, of course, will involve the necessity of keeping an account of our receipts and expenses, either in our memories or in writing, which in very many cases will be a practice worth much more than the contribution will amount to. The system can be tried, and if it works well, it can be improved, if after a thorough trial it works bad it can be abandoned. It certainly will have the merit of system and order, in theory at least.

System, though it be not the best, is better than no system. That the cause we represent needs some radical reform in this direction, is shown by the complaint of editors, of Evangelists, of ministers generally, and by the complaints of all who have had to do with raising funds in the churches. It is shown in the frequent efforts that have been made to secure more efficiency in this work. It is also shown in the necessity of the case, growing out of an almost utter disregard of a righteous equality as the basis of our contributions. Let us then work in this cause on a plan which is in accordance with the rule, "that we should do unto others as we would have them do unto us." JOEL A. SIMONDS.

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich., Dec. 1, 1875.

Man. What is He?

And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul. Gen. ii. 7.

But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die. Gen. ii. 17.

What was man after he was formed of the dust, and before he received the breath of life? He was a lifeless soul. This appears perfectly plain, even were there no other scripture to corroborate it, but by examining with an unprejudiced mind, we shall find much more to substantiate it.

Who should certainly die? Certainly it was the living soul. He did not say that the men should be separated, and one part die, and the other soar away to the skies to live in glory forever, or down to a lake of fire and brimstone, there to be tormented eternally. No. There was nothing of the kind said; but man—the whole man, should die.

And thy serpent said unto the woman, Ye shall not surely die. Gen. iii. 4.

Here is the Orthodox proof of inherent immortality, and the only proof they have between the lids of the Bible. We defy any one to find any text in the Bible even hinting at inherent immortality, except this. If Orthodoxy is willing to accept the authority of his Satanic Majesty, all right; but we prefar the word, To them who by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory and honor and immortality, eternal life. Rom. ii. 7. Here we see that immortality is only obtained by seeking for it in the way appointed; why seek for what we already possess. This heathen doctrine of inherent immortality and eternal torment has driven thousands into Infidelity. We believe that all who will lay aside all prejudice, learn the doctrine taught by the Church of God, and compare it with the Bible, will, if honest, have to acknowledge that we teach the doctrine of the Scriptures, while Orthodoxy teaches man-made creeds and heathen fables; and that they also teach the doctrine taught by the devil to eve. The Two Seeds.

In the RESTITUTION of Nov. 24th, I find an article from the pen of R. V. Lyon, headed "Who will not be blessed or saved." Among other things, he argues at length, that from the beginning, or since the fall, it was not the intention of the Almighty to favor the seed of the serpent with an opportunity of obtaining salvation from the Adamic death, because they were created only as a surplusage for punishment for mother Eve's transgression; and per consequence, would never have a resurrection from the death entailed by Adam. That Cain and his descendants were that seed; and, from the whole tenor of his argument, thus continued through all succeeding generations.

Now, if this is so, I wish to inquire, how any of the descendants of Cain escaped the deluge? It is quite certain there was none of them in the ark with Noah and his family. If his starting proposition is valid, then, since the flood, there has been no seed of the serpent upon the earth! But Christ speaks of the Jews thus, "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell." How come they to be serpents? Surely not by natural generation; but by their unbelief and wicked works, just as it ever has been since the day that Cain and Abel brought their offerings before God. Cain brought the fruit of the ground, unmindful of the fact "that without the shedding of blood there was no remission;" whilst "Abel brought the firstlings of his flock, and of the fat thereof" in faith believing, which was accepted of God. Cain's offering was rejected, which "caused him to be very wroth, and his countenance to fall;" this caused God to say, "If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted? And if thou doest not well, sin lieth at the door." Gen. iv.; Heb. xi. 4.

This unbelief led him to slay his brother, just as the unbelief of the Jews lead them to crucify the seed of the woman, the Lord of glory, in whom Abel trusted, and saw by faith.

The whole tenor of Bible testimony is in harmony with the foregoing statements, and may be stated thus: Christ is the true seed of the woman, and all that believe in him and do his will, are accepted of him. The devil is his antagonist, and is the prince of the world, and all who reject Christ and follow the serpent, are like Cain and [illegible] the serpent's seed, not by creation, but by unbelief, followed by evil works; all of whom do the will of their father the devil, just as did Cain and the Jews, and are therefore his legitimate seed.

The article of Bro. Cook's, that followed Bro. Lyon's, was an endorsement of a previous article of similar import, in which reference is made by Bro. C. to Ezek. xvi. 43-63, and applied the promised restoration "of Samaria and Sodom" to the land or territory occupied by these cities, whilst their inhabitants are left under the power of the Adamic death unresurrected, is also far fetched, and outside of the most obvious meaning of the utterances of the Spirit of God as recorded by the prophet, as seen from the following quotation: "Thou art thy mother's daughter (Jerusalem) that loathed her husband and her children; and thou art the sister of thy sisters, which loathed their husbands and their children; your mother was a Hittite and your father an Amorite. And thine elder sister Samaria, she and her daughters, that dwell at the left hand; and thy younger sister, that dwelleth at thy right hand is Sodom with her daughters." "Sodom, thy sister hath not done, she nor her daughters, as thou hast done, thou and thy daughters."

Now if this and similar language does not include the inhabitants as well as the territory occupied by Samaria and Sodom; it only includes the territory occupied by Jerusalem, whilst all of its wicked inhabitants, whose sins caused her desolation, will go free! This is but a tithing of Bible testimony that crosses this theory of no resurrection of certain classes of the Adamic race, called by these brethren "the seed of the serpent;" all of which must be jumped over or twisted around in a similar manner.

Hence, I say to all who are inclined to look favorably at this view in order to relieve themselves from another dilemma, be cautious. It is far better to be circumscribed, or even hedged up, upon some important doctrines of the Bible, than to seek to extricate yourselves by such a perversion. Sarcasms and strong expressions of denunciation, backed by the word of the Lord, when perverted, should weigh but little in the scale of truth.

THE RESTITUTION,
Plymouth, Indiana.

Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the Restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christian King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

CHARACTER OF ARTICLES.—The Editor must not be understood as endorsing all the sentiments expressed by correspondents whose articles are inserted under this head. Each writer is alone responsible for the article bearing his own signature. If the teaching of any writer is not endorsed, and the editor sets forth the views of the party differing may be forwarded. Free discussion of Bible doctrines on all sides will be allowed, but the Editor reserves the privilege of criticising those communications which antagonize a belief and obedience of the Gospel as a means of salvation, or which undermine its principles.

A Plea for the Word of God.

BY C. COLEGROVE.

There is, in the Bible Banner for July, 1872, an excellent article transferred from another paper, entitled "Argumentative Preaching." It is worthy of being reproduced, and carefully pondered. It is a just and forcible protest against a fashion, or policy, of appealing to the sensibilities and emotions of men, without solidly convincing the understanding.

I am deeply in sympathy with the general drift of the writer, in this contribution, or editorial, as the case may be. It is painful and alarming to contemplate the methods so much in vogue, so superficial, so inadequate, and often so injurious! For it is perfectly true that when an unusual degree of interest is awakened, and attention fostered on the utterances of the professed public teacher, that then if even a great good way be imparted, or a positive evil inflicted, or else, of necessity, the hearer receives in unhappy conjunction both good and evil, as in the case of the parents of our race, in a certain aspect in eating from the forbidden tree. The preacher who has command over his audience, by talent, by faction, by extraordinary zeal, sometimes is able to do either good or harm. If he teaches truth, he does great good. If he teaches error, he does great harm. If he teaches truth with error, he is doing a work so complicated and doubtful, to say the least, that every truly instructed and upright mind must feel an unspeakable sadness, because of the real incongruity and vital antagonism of truth and error, and, because in some cases, it is doubtful which has the strongest hold on the mind, and which will ultimately prevail in the mind, for the cohabitation cannot be permanent. Indeed it is inconsistent, unnatural, and abhorred, to combine truth and falsehood in a system of teaching. It dishonors the great Author of good. It degrades the true and proper office of the teacher. No matter how pleasing, how amiable, how virtuous, how eloquent, how sympathetic, a teacher may be. These very qualities may enhance his power to do mischief! No such combination of personal attraction should withdraw our attention from the subject matter of his teaching. He may even pray vocally, and solemnly, and pathetically. That does not alter the case. He may have an impressive presence, a ministerial manner, a reverend aspect, an appearance of consecration and holiness. That does not and cannot excuse him. All these advantages—all elements of power and influence, such as utterance, earnestness, depth of conviction, magnetism, never can justify the teaching and preaching of error, but only augment the teacher's capacity to do mischief.

We are tired of this great Babylon of confusion. We give no more credit to the protestantism of the nineteenth century than it is awfully and righteously entitled to, and we protest against affiliating with, or consenting unto the barbarism of compounding, or combining in abhorent union, things opposite and inconsistent on the one hand, and again against personal affiliations and combinations of good and bad teachers, or preachers and believers of notable and vital truth with teachers and preachers of Babylonish confusion of error and truth, we protest. That is just what we do, and that is just how we feel,—and we protest evermore, henceforth, and energetically protest.

We see strong men, physically, mentally or psychologically—we see them handling the word of God not with deceitful intentions, but with deceiving and misleading effect. And how tremendous is the responsibility of such men! Does their good intention profit them? They are Babylonizing or perpetuating the Babylonization of the people. Will this be justified? These preachers and teachers are wedded to their idol and darling ideas of immortality in Adamic man, the old top-root and mother of many foul and false ideas, and vain suppositions. They preach what they call the Gospel or Jesus Christ, and as we view it, it is a Gospel corrupted, perverted, and distorted. We see them ruling by certain authority—by a sympathetic, a magnetic, a social, and if you please, religious force. The atmosphere of the meetings is an atmosphere, in which something supernatural, unusual, and, in a certain sense, awful, is present. But what would a sharp analysis, by a master of the chemistry, detect? We reverence nothing that merely claims to be sacred, unless it can furnish proof of its sacredness. It is a time for the exercise of a rigid diagnostic and scrutinizing faculty. Everything must be thoroughly searched and tried by the word of God. In vain in every other test. In vain every pretension of authority, holiness or truth. We have no respect for any claim not confirmed by the verdict of God's word. That is the grand conclusion.

What then is the character of much so-called conversion to God? The agency of conversion we know, is the truth, and the spirit of God accompanies the truth. But the strength and breadth of a conversion is in proportion to the truth of the agency, and the truth of the doctrine by which, and to which a man is converted. Now just try this by any fair test. Suppose a man were converted to Jupiter. It would be a perfect piece of vanity, for every doctrine of Jupiter is heathenish and corrupt. Suppose a man were converted to any false god. Of what avail? Suppose a man were converted to a being represented as the true God, but very falsely represented. What then? Suppose the true God were preached as a being that practiced according to his system of penalties, a cruelty that equalled or surpassed all that was ever imputed to any deity of paganism. What then? Or suppose he were on the one hand represented as merciful, and then this merciful trait antagonized by a representation of inconceivable severity, with infinity of duration. Suppose there were a perfect jumble of mere fancies ruling the mind of the teacher claiming to be a messenger of the true God, and every discourse was more or less infected and infested with ideas wholly foreign to the revelation of that God, and all this jumble were uttered, and rehearsed, and illustrated, and enforced with sacred favor, and dogmatic earnestness, and even tears! With zeal and tenderness, and every element and energy, and ingenuity of public and private address. What then?

Now, a conversion to God, seems to imply a fair representation of what he is. God's word divulges God's character, and also man's nature. Therefore who can overestimate the importance of a just and true representation? Hence, the human understanding is the medium through which a true conversion is wrought. Appeals to feelings are, in themselves, worthless. A play-actor can draw tears. We have heard groans in an audience to which a missionary was narrating the details of his sufferings by heathen villains. But true religion is inseparable from the truth—the truth that instructs—and that instructs to edify and save. But what must a Being of purity, a being who demands attention to His perfect word, and whose word is the perfection of wisdom—what must He think, or how must He regard the flagrant perversions and misrepresentations of His word?

Alas! alas! the dragon is still incumbent and pregnant with his vicious presence in the air, and active and alert, with every art, with persistence and malice, and the instinct of evil, and the pride of irreparable revolt, and personality fiercely antagonised to God. And we are in the midst of Babylonish mystery and confusion on every hand.

We cannot, therefore, any longer fraternize with the popular system, with its abettors, or officers,—its instruments, expounders, and champions. We cannot. And this we do for truth's sake, and when we say truth's sake, we can say, God's sake. There is nothing for it, but such a conscientious separation as shall serve the utmost of an upright witness bearing to God's great law, which is His whole revealed will and real mind. I would never unite in any religious meetings with any man who champions the flagrant falsehood of Adamic immortality, with its brood of corrupt sequences, all of which oppose the grand vital truth of our time, and all time, that Christ is coming again—of our time, especially—that he is coming speedily, speedily, speedily. We have great charity, in the sense of a desire for the sincere and speedy repentance of every teacher of orthodox illusions—a repentance, the substance of which is forsaking; but no charity in the sense of allowance or connivance toward current and heinous iniquities of doctrine. Costly churches, splendid pulpits, great decorations and charming music, will never sanctify or extenuate the iniquities. Eloquent preaching will not do it. Personal duty will not do it. Extraordinary individuality will not do it. Truth—truth alone, is that which will endure. Let us be faithful and plain in the crisis of the ages. The brethren of Christ overcome satan by the blood of the Lamb and by the word of their testimony. Remember that. What a high calling then of God's loyal and faithful people! The times are indeed critical, and powerful with an index of the speedy coming. Not least of all is the grand testimony of the Pyramid of Ghizeh! This altar and pillar in Egypt (Isiah xix, 19) has a mighty voice! It tells of the kingdom of the son of man, and that its coming is just at hand. What watchfulness, what carefulness, what zeal, what patience, what expectation, and what anointing do we not need?

SARDINIA, N. Y., Feb. 22, 1876.

Moral Ruin.

Is it not possible for a moral being, in the exercise of his own free will, so to ruin his moral nature, and to exhaust all the resources of God's power, wisdom, and love, that his salvation shall become a moral impossibility.

This question is surely one of tremendous importance; we are morally as well as physically "fearfully and wonderfully made;" complex and delicate pieces of machinery, having indeed marvelous recuperative powers, but which are nevertheless susceptible of fatal and irreparable damage. There is in the human consciousness itself an instinctive recognition—enforced by our daily experience—of the truth suggested by those most awful of all words,—"Too late!" "Too late!" it sighs like the night wind through our hearts as we think of the great opportunities of life wasted, its roots of strength and beauty become as rottenness, and the fair blossoms of its hope gone up as dust. "Too late!" it haunts the dying pillow in visions, seen by the dawning light of eternity, of wrongs unredressed, duties neglected, eternal life unwon. "Too late!" it will be heard from the sweet Bridegroom's lips, at the closed door of the marriage supper of the Lamb, telling the weeping soul of the crown that has been forfeited, and "the prize of the high calling" lost. "Too late!" It will be the thunder-crash of doom, carrying with it the keenest agony of the second death, when "Whosoever is not found written in the book of life shall be cast into the lake of fire."

The existence of the law is unquestionable, and from its operations there is no escape. If we take any delicate piece of mechanism,—a watch for example,—we know that the glass may be fractured, the hands may be lost, even the main spring may be broken, and yet the maker of it will readily undertake to repair it; but in another case the instrument may have been subjected to such a degree of violence, and the works may have been so extensively injured, that he hands it back to us with the words, "No, sir; I can do nothing with it; it is utterly ruined; that watch will never go again." So, in like manner, by some violation of the laws of health, by ignorance, or imprudence, or vice, we may superinduce various forms of disease, which, nevertheless, the recuperative powers of nature and the resources of medical science can avail to overcome; but if this violation of hygienic laws be persisted in, the damage to the physical nature may become so aggravated as to be altogether irremediable; we say, in such a case, the man has ruined his constitution;" that he is—a most graphic term!—"a wreck;" yea, a wreck deserted by its crew of vital powers, and drifting hopelessly and rapidly on the shore of death.

And is it not so also in regard to man's moral nature? The laws of God's moral government—laws as undeviating, as universal, and as inflexible as those of the physical world—may be violated, not indeed with impunity, but without inevitably fatal consequences; such violations may even be repeated again and again, and assume a variety of evil forms, and yet the sinner not be beyond the reach of salvation. Nevertheless all along, one of these laws, at once one of the most terrible and the most slow to reveal itself, is at work, sapping the very springs of the perverted moral nature. It is the law of the formation of habit. When once a moral habit is formed, it is indeed difficult, nay, becomes after a certain time, so far is the creature concerned, impossible to change it. We will to travel a certain road, which, at the commencement, we were free to take or to refuse, but when we have proceeded a certain distance, habit breaks down the bridges between us; the will loses its elasticity, it is warped in a certain direction, and at last becomes fixed and fossil in the position it has assumed. How strikingly is this law recognized in the prophet's question: "Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots? then may ye also do good who are accustomed to do evil." Jer. xiii. 23. And in the same light, perhaps, we are to read the awful words,—as the Divine judgment pronounced upon a state fixed, invariable, and eternal:—"He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he that is filthy, let him be filthy still." Rev. xxi. 11.

Nor thus alone may the irretrievable ruin of man's moral nature be brought about. The will may perish as well as be perverted. The argument of Kant against the Cartesian theory of the immortality of the soul, from its assumed simplicity, is here equally applicable. "Kant showed that while the soul could not cease to exist by any diminution of its extensive quality, that the argument from its simplicity did not exclude its extinction through the gradual weakening of its forces and the successive relaxation of its intensive quantity. For even memory has always a degree which may be indefinitely decreased,—so of self-consciousness, and so of all the other faculties."

Hence there is nothing in the essential nature of the will as a moral quality,—that is the power to choose between right and wrong,—to prevent its becoming gradually weakened and at length virtually extinguished; so that its possessor, losing the distinctive endowment of humanity, and being no longer capable of probation, shall sink morally to the level of the lower animals and perish like them.—William Maude, in Rainbow.

The State of the Christian Church Till the Resurrection and the Saints Reign.

There is no reader of the RESTITUTION, I presume, who doubts that the best days, and most effective labors of the Christian Church, were those in early apostolic times; but many may not have noticed the facts that lie at the bases of an intelligent view of this subject, in ancient or modern times.

1. The great council of apostles, elders, and brethren, was convened to consider the question raised as to the necessity of circumcision, the dispensational ordinance of Moses, in order to be saved by Christ.

They quoted the Word, and recognized the Holy Spirit, and so were able to announce a decision in the spirit of the Gospel. Amen. Acts xv.

They had no officer or prescriptive rule of organization, like a constitution and bye-laws, to which they could refer for the case for a decision. The Word and Spirit of God alone were appealed to for the settlement of that question. This was in striking contrast with official, or ritual, or all other sectarian authority. They took counsel of God through his Word and Spirit.

2. Peter and Paul met with the brethren at Antioch; and as Peter was swayed by his Jewish prejudice to indicate a prejudice to indicate a preference for the Jew, and separate himself from the Gentiles, the like question was raised, and then settled by a like appeal to God's dispensational truth, as to justification by faith in Jesus, one offering, once for all.

As Peter bowed to Paul's reproof, so far as appears, the Gospel gained a triumph. Peter's deportment in accepting of "correction, and instruction in righteousness," is deserving of the highest praise. In this way all matters of dispute should be determined. And it wants for this result only a heart to bow to God; grace and truth in all things.

3. These facts show how misunderstandings arise, even among good men, and how essential it is that the Lord should be held in supreme regard. His truth should be the common standard of faith and obedience, to all alike.

4. But here I think is the point of failure in church organization, and discipline, and labor. As "we know in part, and prophesy in part;" as "when we would do good, evil is present;" as "when we preach to others, we need to keep our bodies under, and don't do it;) Satan often gets the advantage over us,"—ere we are aware. Then, no organization avails to convince the world, or honor the name we bear, for then the human elements may prevail in the church "with every evil work."

Furthermore, in the parable of the sower, three kinds of hearers add nothing to the harvest. The tares grow together with the wheat till the harvest and thus the predicted apostacy has become commensurate with Christendom. Nay, it occupies the great centres and high places, and claims control in all church affairs. All the New Testament prophecies by Jesus and his apostles note this state of things, and compare it to the days of Noah and Lot.

5. But this may appear to the unthinking too discouraging to be profitable to any. My answer is, that it is best to be undeceived. It is best to know the truth, and so be free indeed, from the curse that rests on the apostacy—the Babylon of the last days.

These facts do not discourage or disparage church union. They only serve to show the fundamental error that has prevailed, the error of taking the shadow for the substance—the name for the real thing.

6. One frightful fact must or should strike the thoughtful believer, in relation to this whole matter. It is this: All professing Churches have taken one primal form, one general method of organization. As crystalization in nature proceeds according to its law, in every case; so in the departure from the faith—the apostacy, in Greek—all ecclesiastical organizations follow the primal type. They may be only inchoate, immature and undeveloped; but as they go on in the strength of organization rather than in the power of God, they belong to "Babylon the great."

7. There is no substitute or compensation for the presence of the Spirit and word of God—divinely supreme.

All that are in Christ by faith—the obedience of faith—constitute the church as a whole. All such should, in every place, "give themselves to one another in the Lord," then they should set things in order on the apostolic pattern, "not in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God." Amen.

To sum up the whole, I add that Christians are now surely no more already perfect than was Paul. The great majority of professors seem of the wayside, stony and thorny ground, hearers. The prevailing type of church organization, from Rome to the Rocky Mountain Mormons, is not from above, and hence we are led to the conclusion that the organization of the church remains, with the rest, to the people of God. Then the body will enjoy the presence and direction of its only head—Christ Jesus, the Lord. Then the gathering of the people will be to him from the four winds of heaven. Then, and not till then, will the present fragmentary and scattered members of the body of Christ be complete, and so one that the world may know. John xvii 21-24; 1 John iii. 1-3.

To build up church organizations now, seems like building upon the waves of a stormy sea.

Get ye up; this is not your rest. Here we have no continuing city (or church), but we seek one to come. Heb. xiii. 9—11.

The divine pattern for the church will obtain its place, like the kingdom, only at and after the second coming, and in the world (age) to come.

Till such time we are shut up to endure, seeing him who is invisible, but bound to the same subjection to the Word and Spirit of God that characterized the apostolic church, who had no confidence in the flesh.

Respectfully submitted as my mite toward the right apprehension of this important theme.

Sowing.

He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him.—Psalms.

This beautiful figure is prophetic of the church and mission of the Son of God. He came from the Father bearing the precious seed of which himself was begotten. The corporeal embodiment of that Word which said, "Let there be light and there was light." He it was who went forth to sow the precious seeds of truth represented in the parable, and as He went He wept over the sins of humanity, sympathized with their sufferings, and offered them the rich fruits of the Tree of Life. Isiah foretells his grief and the travel of his soul, and then changes the sad scene of his humiliation, and flashes before our vision his glory and triumph. "He shall see his seed, he shall prolong his days and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand."

"He that sowed the good seed is the son of man." Here is brought to view the fruit of the sowing with tears, the season of dawning harvest, the foretaste of the joyous reaping time. "The good seed are the children of the Kingdom." They are the outgrowth of the incorruptible word of God, which is said to live and abide forever. Christ the first fruit—the rich, ripe sheaf presented to the Lord of the harvest with rejoicing. And then with his coming, cometh the harvest; the glad season of rejoicing and gathering of sheaves. No more weeping and waiting for the precious fruit of the earth. Then shall the field and the garden be made vocal with voices of angel reapers, and be reckoned by the glad song of the redeemed. May the harvest soon come.

Curious Calculation.

The vast number of inhabitants who do live, and have lived, upon the face of the earth, appear, at first sight, to defy the powers of calculation. But if we suppose the world to have existed six thousand years; that there now exist one thousand million; that a generation passes away in thirty years; that every past generation averages the present, and that four individuals may stand on one square yard, we find that the whole number will not occupy a compass so great as one-fourth the extent of England. Allowing six thousand years since the creation, and generation to pass away in thirty years we shall have two hundred generations, which, at one thousand millions each, will be two hundred thousand millions, which being divided by four persons to a square yard, will leave fifty thousand millions of square yards; there are in a square mile three millions, ninety-seven thousand, six hundred square yards, by which if the former sum be divided, it will give sixteen thousand one hundred and forty-one square miles, the root of which, in whole numbers, is about one hundred and twenty-seven, so that one hundred and twenty-seven miles square will be found sufficient to contain the immense and almost incredible number of two hundred thousand millions of human beings.

—They that have no sin in their conscience, may well have no shame in their face.

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT

☞Bro. Myers is now holding meetings in La Paz and Lakeville. He reports excellent meetings in both places, and anticipates addition to the truth.

☞Bro. Wm. Mills, of Goodland, has sold his stock of goods, and will retire from the mercantile business. Bro. Mills is an excellent business man, and maintains the respect of all who have done business with him. We understand that he yet holds control of the hall and building, and that meetings will continue as usual. Brother Wilcox speaks there next Sunday, he having moved there. We understand that the next quarterly conference is to be held in Goodland. Particulars next week.

☞It is with sorrow that we announce the death of sister C. Thomson, of our little congregation in Plymouth. She died last Saturday evening, after an illness of three weeks. She was a firm believer in the blessed Gospel of the kingdom of God. She was baptized some years ago, by Bro. R. Corbaley, and has continued in the faith, and died in full hope of seeing the King in His glory with all who are His at His coming. May we all live worthy of that Kingdom soon to be established under the whole Heavens. We are, one by one, passing under the power of the enemy, but may it be that we rest in hope of a blessed immortality promised in the Word of the oath unto the fathers.

☞Dead heads are as numerous in the Gospel field as in any other. There are many persons who are "dead heading" their way to the kingdom of God. They have means for bank stock, railway bonds, new farms, and fine carriages, but none for Christ. The cause which is nearest their heart is the cause of Christ, they love to hear and read the Gospel as preached in the apostles times, but their pockets belong to Cæsar and their gold to Mammon. Their heads were converted to God, but their pockets yet remain the property of a morbid selfishness. So they are on the dead head train running at full speed for the central depot of destruction. Men are dead heading their way to the eternal city. Oh, child of earth! remember that no ticket will let you pass the golden gate, but that on which is written loyalty to Christ and his Gospel.

Time-Setting Again.

We learn from the Detroit Evening News, that Joseph Cockroft has embraced the heresy of definite time, as set forth by a man named Patterson, of Listowel, Canada. It is a matter of profound astonishment and regret that any sane man should ever become bewildered by such vagaries. This man Patterson says the signs of Christ's coming will appear on the 4th day of March, and that Christ will appear in person April 1st. Mr. Cockroft has given up his business, and is now laboring with zeal to promote the new faith. They dip their converts in water three times, after the manner of the Dunkards, and claim to have miraculous gifts after baptism.

It appears that any wild, hair-brained man can excite certain persons to almost any degree of fanaticism. Jesus has told us, "Ye knew not when the time is." And again, "At such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh." This language ought to settle it with every true disciple of Jesus that all time-setters are under a species of insanity. We hope our brethren everywhere will openly discountenance all such fanatics, and stand firmly upon the Word of God. The truth has enough to bear, without taking to itself all the mountebanks who come under the garb of religion with their special message from heaven.

Superstition.

There are many people even in our day who are more or less influenced by superstition. To see the new moon over the right or the left shoulder becomes an omen of good or evil. Astrologers and soothsayers, witches and necromancers have grown fat in purse in pandering to the superstitions of the common people. Any unusual occurrence in the heavens or upon the earth has been seized upon as a means of impressing fear upon the credulous. Spiritualism under all of its varied forms and conflicting positions has gained multitudes of votaries. The Catholic church yet holds sway over the masses of Europe by means of traditional miracles. The wild savages use incantations through their medicine man. Indeed superstition holds sway in many places where the light of the gospel now shines. Any work commenced on Friday is considered very unfortunate by some. The flight of a bird, lowing of herds at night, dogs baying at the moon, thunder in the winter and many other like things are looked upon with great dread by many people in our times.

There is but one antidote for all such superstitions, and that is embraced in the one word, knowledge: Ignorance begets fear. Paul, in addressing the Athenian court, said: "I perceive that in all things ye are too superstitious." The same is true in our times. Men stand in need of more light upon the most common themes in daily life. It is the special work of the gospel to dispel fear, turn man away from idols, take away the traditional notions about life's mysteries and present a tangible hope based upon the promises of God. When the Word dwells in men instead of human vagaries we have the true and only remedy provided by Heaven.

Revelations of Coming Glory.

It was not by verbal description alone, that the apostles obtained that clear and accurate knowledge of the future, that enabled them to write so forcibly and fully in relation to coming events. There was such an unveiling of what shall hereafter transpire in connection with the Kingdom of God, the glorification of the Lord Jesus, and the exaltation of the saints, as gave them almost the advantages of a direct cognizance of all these things as sensible realities. They not only carefully wrote down what they had seen and heard, while with the Lord Jesus, as the spirit brought all things to remembrance, but they also wrote as clearly of things to come, through certain wonderful representations, as of events that had already transpired. By these manifestations the manner of Christ's coming, His glorified condition in the kingdom, the blessedness of the redeemed church, and the grandeur of the new creation, have become objects of as distinct apprehension, as the events of history. Of the apostles, Peter, James, John, and Paul, were particularly favored with revelations of future glory.

The transfiguration scene was one of the most remarkable manifestations of future events by visible symbols, and other sensible exhibitions. It was regarded, by those who witnessed it, as having a special reference to the coming of the Savior in his kingdom, and, particularly, to the manner of that coming. In the transfiguration was displayed, by the witnessing apostles, as beholders or spectators, an outward and visible similitude of the glory, and majesty, in which the Lord Jesus Christ will come the second time, to judge the world, and take His kingdom. Now, as to the manner of this coming, the plain and explicit statements of revelation teach, that the second advent of Messiah will be in power and great glory; and that all His saints will accompany Him. In the order of events there are two stages, in the transition from heaven to earth, when our Lord returns.

In the first stage he comes to the aerial, attended by the holy angels. Here, summoned by the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God, and gathered by His attending messengers "from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other," He is met by the whole host of the redeemed. This glorified company is composed of two classes; one of which has been raised from the sleep of death, and the other changed in a moment by that transforming power and spirit, that invests all with the likeness of the Lord, and makes them partakers of His heavenly attributes, and divine nature. In these chambers, they are hidden for a little time, till the indignation be over-past when the Lord cometh out of His place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity. Isa. xxvi. 20-21. Concealed in the pavilion, they are safe in the time of trouble. Ps. xxvii. 5. But there is a second stage in the advent. From the aerial, the Lord, and the ascended saints, finally descend to the earth, to inherit the promised kingdom. The leading particulars connected with the advent then are;—Christ will come in the heavenly clouds, and bring with Him an immortalized assemblage, who have been raised out from among the dead multitudes, or changed from among the living millions. Now let us see how perfectly the transfiguration depicts the power, coming, and majesty of earth's future monarch in all the above particulars. In the first place, we are informed that the countenance of our Lord was so altered that it shone as the sun, and that His raiment became white as the light. We, in the next place, are told that Moses and Elias appeared in glory. And, lastly, that a bright cloud, enveloped the transfigured Lord with Moses and Elias. We greatly misapprehend this last circumstance if we figure to ourselves a mere atmospheric collection of vapory mist lit up by the rays of the sun. This was not its nature. It was a glorious luminosity floating, cloud-like, in the atmosphere. In such a resplendent vehicle our Lord ascended into heaven, and in such clouds of substantial brightness, as in a moving pavilion of light, will he and his glorified church descend to this earth. In the transfiguration, then, the Lord Jesus, in his gloriously changed condition, became the representative of himself at his future coming; and of the two glorified personages that appeared with him, Moses was the representative of the class to be raised from the dead, and Elias of the living who shall be changed. The shining nebulosity was a miniature likeness of a glory that shall cover the heavens at the revelation of the Lord Jesus Christ. Hab iii. 3.

The design of this vision was not to illustrate the condition of separate spirits, even if such had an existence, but was to the chosen apostles a visible image of the power and glory in which Christ and the redeemed will appear at his second coming. 2 Peter i. 17. As no separate souls, or spirits, will accompany the Lord when he returns, they, consequently, have no representative in the vision; and, therefore, it is illogical, far-fetched, and even absurd to quote this scripture as proof of conscious existence in the death-state.

In this vision the disciples behold the anticipation of Christ's final glory.

They saw "the Son of man coming in his kingdom." This constituted the "sign from heaven" that the Jews so often demanded as the conclusive demonstration of the claims of Jesus to the Messiahship, and which was refused to them, upon whom miracles had no effect, though granted, unsolicited, to the disciples. They would receive nothing as proof, short of such a display as the prophet Daniel connects with the coming of the Son of man in his glory and kingdom. Dan. vii. 13, 14. The prophet Zechariah shows the effect of this ocular proof upon the Jewish people when it shall be given. Chs. xii-xiv.

This prepares the way to understand definitely something concerning "the sign of the Son of man in heaven." His coming to the aerial will be in Shekinal glories. A brightness more resplendent than the sun will surround him and his angelic escort. In the far distant ether it will seem like a new and dazzling star taking its place in the spangled firmament. Its appearance is the theme of rapt contemplation in prophesy. One "that heard the words of God, and knew the knowledge of the most High, which saw the vision of the Almighty, falling into a trance, but having his eyes open; hath said: I shall see him, but not now: I shall behold him but not nigh; there shall come a Star out of Jacob, and a Sceptre shall rise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab, and destroy all the children of Sheth." Num. xxiv. 16, 17. Here Star symbolizes the personage and sceptre the dominion of the monarch that will rule Israel and the world. Peter also uses the same expression in connection with the Lord's coming. We have also a more sure word of prophesy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day star arise in your hearts." 2 Peter i. 19 The vivifying influences of this heavenly orb of life will quicken into a renewed existence hearts that have long stood still in death. The Revelator gives the very language of the Lord: "I am the root and the offspring of David, and the bright and morning star." Rev. xxii. 16. The bestowment of eternal life, and an inheritance in God's kingdom, is thus expressed in this book, "and I will give him the morning star." Rev. ii 28.

The coming of Jesus Christ to the outer confines of our system is the rising of the Morning Star on the dawn of the day of the Lord; to him, in his heavenly surroundings of substantial splendors, will all his saints be gathered; on the bright sea of glass they will sing the victor's song; and here receive the victor's honors and rewards. When opened graves shall tell of the risen dead,—when some familiar faces shall have mysteriously evanished from the busy scenes of life,—when a new star shall beam in the distant firmament, then will it be known what is meant by the "sign of the Son of Man in heaven."

Paul was not without wonderful revelations. Indeed he was taught his knowledge of the Gospel in this manner. He says: "I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ." Gal. i. 12.

The first appearance of the Lord to him was in the manner demanded by all the unbelieving Jews;—a visible coming in his glory. Subsequently, he was instructed in the truth, and directed in his ministerial travels by direct intercourse with the ascended Messiah. Among the wonderful revelations made to him was a vision of Paradise and the heavenly country, which he localizes in harmony with other Scriptures. 2 Cor xii. 1-4. In 2 Pet. iii. 5-13, we have the arrangement of three distinct constitutions of the heavens and the earth. The first obtained before the flood, being "the heavens that were of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water." Paradise and the tree of life were originally in this constitution of things. "The heavens and the earth that are now," are next in order; but they are transitory, and will pass away in the day of the Lord. The third divinely constituted arrangement is the "new heavens and a new earth in which dwelleth righteousness." In this coming state is located the paradise of God and the tree of life. Compare Rev. ii. 7, with Rev. xxii. 2. It is in this "third," or "new heaven and earth," that the saints are to obtain their inheritance. Rev. xxi. 7. John was in a peculiar state when "the things which must be hereafter" were presented to him in vision. He was "in the spirit," and, in this supernatural condition, beheld, among other wonders of the future, the glorious consummation of the "restitution of all things, which God hath spoken of by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began." Paul, when he received his revelations, was in a supernatural state which, in Acts xxii. 17, he calls a trance, and which he professes himself unable to explain in 2 Cor. xii. 2, 3. He was caught away (not up) and, like John, beheld in "visions and revelations of the Lord" the third heaven with paradise restored. Paradise was not above the stars in the first arrangement of the heavens and the earth, neither will it be in that new and eternal state of restitution, in the third and final condition, when the earth is filled with the glory of God. These visions prompted all that lofty diction so characteristic of the Apostle Paul; and the grandeur of some of these expressions can not be transferred to any other language than the one in which they were originally penned. See Greek of 2 Cor. iv. 17. For him ever after these wonderful revelations earthly things had no charm. A heavenly citizenship,—a heavenly enrollment,—heavenly places,—and the glory which shall be revealed in the children of God,—all to be attained through the resurrection from the dead,—became current forms of speak with him. Moses looked over into the promised land in its earthly condition, but Paul was permitted to look over into the coming and eternal glories of all things made new. May we meet him and all God's saints in the paradise of God.

Earth's Morning.

BY MRS. H. V. REED.

"Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning."

Earth's night has been long and dark; her soil has been marred with the curse, her skies have been clouded with storms, and her children wasted with suffering and death.

Her thrones are filled with tyrant kings, her republics are swayed by corruption and misrule, her vision is darkened by clouds of war, and her bosom is rough with the bodies of the slain.

It is night in the halls of national council, and night is shrouding the weary church. Her watch-fires are burning low, and some of her sentinels are asleep at their posts. A few faithful watchmen are sounding the cry that the morning cometh, but it falls upon ears that are dead with slumber, or hearts that are benumbed with the wine of the world.

The faint light of coming dawn touches the distant mountains, but only a few hearts are watching its pearly tints. Soon the gray dawn shall turn to silvery light, and crown their rugged brows with glory. Soon the stars of night shall yield their place to the star of the morning, and it shall flash in splendor before the eye of the faithful watcher.

To him that overcometh, is the promise, "I will give him the morning star." It is the language of him who is both the gift and the Giver. It is a pledge that to him that overcometh he will give himself. What dearer promise hath perfect love than this?

He will give himself. All that is his will he give to his bride; his inheritance is her portion; his birthright is her power; his kingship is her glory; his life is her immortality, and his love is her crown.

"Joy cometh in the morning!"—then shall the sleepers awake and sing, and earth herself shall be glad. While the night curtains are drawn around us, our loved ones are falling at the post. One by one they fold their weary hands and close their loving eyes. The fevered brain is cooled, the throbbing pulse is stilled, and the beating heart is hushed.

They are resting in their dusty beds, sleeping in trust upon the promise of coming morn and coming glory. Soon the cold seal of death shall be broken, and his strong hands be loosed, for he who holds the keys of the grave hath promised that light and life shall crown the sleepers with gladness.

"Weeping may endure for a night;" but the night is far spent and the morning is near—even the morning without clouds. The night once passed, it is forever gone—no trace of its darkness remains—no shadow of its curse lingers on the landscape—none of its tear drops can stain the bright robe of the morning. The long, anxious hours of the night watch are done away, its heart-aches are passed, its sorrows are gone, and "joy cometh" in that fair millennial morn that ushers in the perfect day of eternal rest.

What is Truth?

All power is given to me in heaven and in earth: Go ye therefore, and teach (or make disciples or Christians) of all nations, baptizing them in, or into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and, lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the age.

Go ye therefore and teach all nations; a positive and express command. Did the apostles obey the injunction of the Master? so we infer from the record we have given of their labors. Their commission for teaching, or preaching the gospel, was upon the itinerent plan. How strikingly their habits, manner of life, labor in the Lord's vineyard, contrast with modern gentileism. They received no calls of 5,000, 10,000, 15,000 20,000 or 325,000, to become pastors or settled preachers, over wealthy, aristocratic churches; with edifices costing millions of money, gorgeously decorated with spires piercing the heavens, imitating the one built upon the plains of Shinar. The contrast is very great, looking from any standpoint we choose, but none so fearful as when we compare the gospel taught, or preached by the holy apostles of the Son of God with modern Gentile theology. Well and truly did the apostle Paul leave his solemn charge to his son Timothy.

Hear him: "I charge thee therefore before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and kingdom; preach the word; be instant in season, out of season, rebuke, exhort with all long suffering and doctrine." Why such a solemn charge and upon such light authority? The answer is continued in the next verse; because they will not endure sound doctrine. How fearfully, and exactly, have the words of the apostles been fulfilled. We are not wide of the mark, when we affirm that we know of no doctrine taught by modern theology, but is more or less at open variance with the plain reading of the Bible. How different would have been the result, had men endured sound doctrine, or had they heeded the Master's command to his apostles, teaching them to observe, or do, all things whatsoever I have commanded you. But how wide the departure, and how fearful the result. Anything passes current amongst the denominations for gospel. The good news of the kingdom of God is seldom, or never named. And yet the kingdom of God was the leading idea in the teaching of Christ, and his apostles. The second personal coming of Christ, to raise the dead, and reign upon the earth for the ages do not enter into the gospel taught by the modern theology, in the nineteenth century. How insignificant and sinful is modern Gentile teaching compared to the great and sublime truths taught, and commanded, by the writers of the Old and New Testament. And how few are the obedient believers of the gospel; so few that a child may write them. How many are dreaming of a good time coming. The world is to be converted. So we believe; but not till the nations have drank the wine cup of the Lord's fury to its very dregs. See Jer. xxv. They believe the Lord will go forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem, and the nations will learn war no more. So do we; but not till after the Deliverer comes to Zion, and turns away ungodliness from Jacob. We must first have the antitype of Noah and Lot's days, which is hard upon us, before the good time coming, or the antitype of David's reign. The rebels must be cleared out of the land before we can have the mild and peaceable reign of the greater than Solomon. Everything in its proper order, and divine arrangement. Modern religionists have got things fearfully mixed up. How harmonious and beautiful are the utterances of the holy spirit, through the prophets, Christ, and his holy apostles. No joining, but one grand harmonious whole, plain, literal, and true.

Go ye therefore and teach all nations. This certainly implies a forward, and an outward movement. It was a very peculiar characteristic of the christianity of the commencement of the gospel age. They went everywhere preaching the Word. What is it to preach the Word? it is to preach Christ, or the Anointed. What is it to preach Christ, to set forth his character and attributes as the Son of God, as the Savior of the world; preach him in the offices he has filled and is yet to fill; prophet, priest, and king. Surely here is subject matter sufficient for the largest intellect without preaching the sad errors of the day. How heartsickening to read through the papers the notices of A., B., and C's subjects preached upon, which have no more to do with the gospel, or good news of the kingdom of God, than they have to do with the moon, and under a heavy eclipse at that. A fearful day of reckoning is at hand. Dreadful indeed will be the consternation that will seize these prophets of error; when the cry shall be made, "Behold the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him." But joyful, beyond expression, to the humble servant of the Lord Jesus Christ, who has given the household meet in due season. Behold I come quickly; to reward every man as his work shall be.

NEWELL HOND.

Infidelity.

A refined and subtle infidelity has poisoned our literature and our education. It lurks too often under the attractive guise of pleasant tales and novels, or it is published under the form of so-called learned "Essays and Reviews." It hides itself with duplicity under the prophet's mantle, and it is given forth, instead of the oracles of God, from the professor's chair and from too many of our pulpits. Our universities and our public schools are infected with it; and the men who have sworn at their ordination to "banish and drive away all erroneous and strange doctrine contrary to God's Word," are now corrupters of youth, their guides in the path of irreligion, and the teachers of unbelief.

Hence the hollow condition of things all over Christendom: social and political, and moral ties are all broken together. Infidelity and unbelief are the parents of disintegration, of dislocation, and of disorganization, and of disorder; they corrode the cement which binds society together. Where there is no religion, there is no bond of union. Nations and communities which are leavened with infidelity are like timber that is worm-eaten, or like walls and battlements without mortar, ready to fall to pieces at any moment.

—SELECTED.

To Fault-finding Parents.

There are times when it is necessary to censure and punish; but very much more may be done by encouraging children when they do well. Be, therefore, more careful to express your approbation of good conduct, than your disapprobation of bad. Nothing can more discourage a child than a spirit of incessant fault-finding on the part of its parents, and hardly anything can exert a more injurious influence upon the disposition, both of the parent and child. There are two great motives influencing human actions,—hope and fear. Both of these are at times necessary. But who would not prefer to have a child influenced to good conduct by a desire of pleasing, rather than by fear of offending? If a mother never expresses her gratification when her children do well, and is always censuring them when she sees anything amiss, they are discouraged and unhappy; their disposition becomes hardened and soured by this careless fretting; and at last, finding that, whether they do well or ill, they are equally found fault with, they relinquish all efforts to please, and become needless of reproaches.

The End Near.

The second we must terminate before the third we begin. The decline of the Turkish empire indicates that the time is short. It is now but little more than the smouldering ruins of a burnt and depopulated city, or the spent fires of a wasted volcano. At the same time the elements of the third we are in process of formation. And the time is near. The Gospel offers of pardon and salvation are now made to all who believe and repent: but at the termination of the second we these offers will cease; for the heirs of the kingdom will all be redeemed and the number of the elect will be saved. The door is yet open to all who come at the Gospel call; but it will soon be shut, and the Gospel dispensation end. "Be wise to-day; 'tis madness to defer." To-morrow may be too late. Make haste to enter in, or you may be forever excluded from the first resurrection and its consequent blessings. Prophetic Times.

Spanish news, via Madrid, makes out the condition of the Carlist cause as absolutely desperate. Don Carlos is reported to have fled to France. Alphonso takes command of the army, and the Cortes thanks the troops.

The Voyage.

We're out on th deep, and dare not sleep,
For the night is drear and dark:
And the billows roar, as we near the shore,
And toss our feeble b...k.
CHORUS.
Then we'll watch and pray
Till the dawn of day,
Our voyage will then be o'er.
Then we'll shout and sing
Praises to our King,
Upon the golden shore.

Our pilot's voice tastes our hearts rejoice,
For he tells us land is near:
Though the white crests foam, we'll soon be home,
With the friends we love so dear.

Now the willows wave o'er the pilgrim's grave,
But their sleep will soon be o'er;
And they'll rise and join in the songs divine,
Upon the golden shore.

Our trials here, they seem severe,
But soon they'll all be o'er;
And we shall rest, with all the blest,
Upon the golden shore.

Correspondence.

Brother Read:—DEAR SIR:—I write a few lines to let you know where I am. I came to Florida for my health, and the climate has improved my health so much that my cough has nearly left me. As soon as my lungs got strong, I commenced lecturing on all the great truths of the Bible. The news went out that a minister was preaching a new doctrine, and people came for 10 miles around to hear what I would say. I showed them that the promise made to Abraham was yet in the future, so far as blessing the nations are concerned, and that the Gospel is good news of the kingdom, and that it is future and is to be the fifth kingdom on earth, and that it will fill the whole earth, and that it would remain forever. The people said it was new to them, but were anxious to hear. The Methodist house was opened and I gave ten lectures on the great truths of the Bible. Some five came out and embraced the faith. I received invitations from different parts of the county to come and preach to them. I never got into a community where the Word appeared to take root as it does in Florida. I preach every Sunday morning and evening, and sometimes evening of week days. I shall remain in this state until next May. You may put this in your paper if you think it worth a place in your valuable paper—THE RESTITUTION. Enclosed, please find $1,10 for THE RESTITUTION.

M. S. HUBBS.

Brother Read:—Since my last note in THE RESTITUTION, I have visited LuTerne Co., Pa., by the request of my beloved Elder, D. T. Ross, pastor of the Six Principle Baptist Church in ——. Gave twenty-sev n sermons in twenty-two days, aside from taking a part in all the social meetings.

Congregations large, and continued to increase to the end. Good attention given to my message. People were stirred up to examine. A number requested immersion, and some resolved to start anew in the service of the God of Israel.

Sold twenty-four copies of my book, and gave away n quantity of tracts on the Sabbath; and I am in hopes that some will conclude to take THE RESTITUTION. But this fault-finding and begging by those who pretend to preach the Gospel, is a detriment to the circulation of THE RESTITUTION, and doing the brethren of the one-faith injustice in Canada, and in the States, where I am acquainted, and there is no preacher better acquainted with them in the former place than myself. And if the time should arrive, that I should have occasion to make the same complaint, I shall conclude the fault is in me, and not in them; and that my labors are needed among them. Hence under no obligations to aid me unless they invite me to labor among them. And I shall feel justified in leaving the ministry and engaging in a business more lucrative.

Had an urgent request to hold a series of meetings with another church of the same order, but Mrs. L. is sick; therefore duty calls upon me to be at home. Notwithstanding, I find some twelve letters lying on my table, containg urgent requests for me to come and preach to the people in their localities; and some among them who have embraced the truth under my labors, wish me to immerse them.

Yours, in love with the truth as taught by the prophets of Israel.

B. V. LYON.

Brother Read;—I have not had a number of THE RESTITUTION for many months, and, on that account, I feel somewhat lonesome, and isolated from the dear brethren and sisters. THE RESTITUTION was to me a medium of communion with them, but now I feel as though a tie had been severed, or that my spiritual powers require such food as the paper was wont to bring me. I am persuaded that the sound doctrines contained in it are spiritual food, calculated to nourish and strengthen us, and cause us to grow in grace and the knowledge of the truth, until we shall become strong men and women in Christ.

I presume the reason why I have not continued to receive it, is my arrears on subscribtion. I am owing you something, but I do not know how much, as the paper was suddenly discontinued, and no bill of indebtedness was received. My being in arrears is the result of poverty and hard times. Truly, I find it hard to support a large family on the wages of myself alone. But, while doing so I find a bright hope of the glory soon to be revealed, dissipates my gloom, lightens my burdens, and inspirits me with good cheer. By faith I see the shining towers, the glittering spires of the city of our God. By it I mount up as on eagle's wings, and view the heart-cheering scene. There it lies before me in my vision of faith. There are its green vales, its vine-clad hills, its perennial verdure, its silver lakes, its rolling river of life. All over its wide fields, in rich profusion, are its ever-greens whose leaves fade not, and whose fruits fall not. Its verdant hills echo back the glad voices of the redeemed of the Lord. Those hallowed precincts are instinct with heavenly emotions, and invite us to enter. Cheer up! dear brothers and sisters: the night is almost gone, and the red streams that herald the day are seen in the east. Soon—very soon, we shall hear the rumbling of the chariot wheels of the Grand Commander of the heaven'y host, and the pole star of hope to the people of God. Awake! ye who sleep, for the bridegroom cometh! The Desire of all nations is at hand: and who can abide His coming? Give up the loins of your minds, be sober, and hope unto the end for the glory of the Lord is about to be revealed, and all nations shall see it together. Then shall our hardships end, our griefs be assuaged, and our tears be wiped away.

My son has become obedient unto the faith, and has been immersed into the name. With this exception, I stand alone in the faith at this place. There are a number who believe pretty much as we do, but they put their light under a bushel, by calling themselves by pet names, and refusing to be immersed into the Christ.

Fraternally Yours,

S. V. KELLER.

DEAR BRETHREN:—It may not be amiss for me to write of the labors of Eld A. F. Dugger in this section. He came here about a month ago, and preached twice in the Latter Day Saints (Josephites) meeting room.

He went to Rock creek, of this county, and there labored effectively in developing and organizing a little church of about eleven persons. He remained thereat eleven days. From thence he went to West Irving, Tama county, where is now thrusting in his sickle to reap. I accompanied him thither, and we were made to feel at home by Elder J. T. Prime and his estimable wife, at whose domicile we stayed while there. May their kind hands and loving hearts be rewarded. It was then that I intended to a long since manifest duty, to be baptized. My reason for not attending to it before, is simply this: Since my faith was formed, I had found none of the like faith, capable and worthy of attending to it, being almost isolated. Bro. Dugger's health is so delicate that he refrains from administering in that ordinance.

The church at West Irving is in a good condition. While there I saw also the following kindred in the gospel, not before mentioned: Jno. Fliz, Levi Marsh, E. Mershman, H. Cady, Levi Shugarts, A. Root, and Sister Adams. Elders Dugger and Prime commence a series of meetings at Shugarts school house, a point four miles from West Irving, on this, the 22d of February. In the latter part of next week, meetings will be resumed at Rock Creek in this (Jasper) county.

Yours in hope of the coming kingdom,

C. WALDO AYLES.

Foreign Missions and the One Faith.

BY A MINISTER OF THE GOSPEL.

Religious missions have been described as "an attempt to produce in distant and unenlightened nations an uniformity of opinion on subjects upon which the missionaries themselves are at fierce and utter variance; thus submitting an European controversy of eighteen hundred years to the decision of a synod of savages."

I fear there is too much justification for this very satirical assertion in the actual condition of religious belief, both at home and abroad. Our modern sectarian strife and rivalry cannot be otherwise than most perplexing to an intelligent convert from heathenism, as it is to any Englishman, who has made it the subject of much thought, and who has tried to interpret it in the light of sundry New Testament commands, which are to the effect that believers should "mark them which cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine" apostolically delivered Rom. xvi. 17: that they should be perfectly joined together in the same mind, and in the same judgment. 1 Cor. i. 10; and that they should stand fast in one spirit, with one mind striving together for the faith of the gospel." Phil. i. 27.

It may be said that, while these various sects differ in some minor and unimportant particulars, they are all agreed as to the essentials of our Christian faith, and are all preaching the same gospel. I would it were so! The only cure for divergent religious opinion is for all classes of Christians to hasten back to the one faith. The command is, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature: he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned." There is no ambiguity here. Our Lord's words suggest nothing that is at all calculated to divide the opinion of christian men on the important matters referred to in that commission. But are the churches agreed concerning the three great points of this test, the gospel, belief, and baptism? It is notorious that they are at utter variance in their opinions upon these matters. The great majority of them are teaching that baptism is of no consequence whatever except in the case of infants, and then a few drops of water sprinkled on the face are quite sufficient." Others who have renounced this folly, yet hold that he who believeth and is not baptized shall be saved, according to that method of salvation which has been divinely instituted. But I hold that we have no more right to put in the negative particle here than we have to leave it out of the very important place it occupies in the ten commandments. What God may do outside the provisions of Scripture, it is not for us to say. We have to concern ourselves with that which has been written. There has been but one baptism instituted by Christ. Modern Christendom professes to recognize the validity of more than one. Let no man deceive you. Things that are different can not be equal to the same thing.

Then, is modern Christianity united in its conceptions of saving faith? Paul told the Corinthians the gospel would save them if they kept in memory a certain word which he preached unto them. An inquiry into the nature of his communication to these persons will at once show that he did not regard as sufficient for salvation a mere historical faith—a belief in certain occurrences that took place in Judea several years before the time he wrote.

He himself has given us a lucid definition of that faith, without which, he tells us, it is impossible to please God. That faith by which the elders obtained a good report, and which was accounted unto Abraham for righteousness, fastens itself on things hoped for—things, therefore, which are yet to come. We are Christ's house "if we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope, firm unto the end." On the other hand, a mere belief in things hoped for, which ignores the only foundation of Christian hope,—which expects to come into possession of the property irrespective of "the death of the testator,"—which does not include a confession of things already transacted, is not enough. The eye of faith must be turned in both directions; it must look backward on what has already taken place, and it must look forward and heartily take in the things of hope, whose nature can readily be ascertained by consulting those Scriptures which treat of the one hope of the saints of God. Anything that God has not distinctly promised can never be an authorized object of faith to a Christian man. Hence it behooves us to ascertain what that is which the word of God warrants us in hoping for. With all our religious feeling and our perfect sincerity, if we have not the one faith, directed towards the one hope of our calling, we cannot secure the recompense of the reward.

The churches, however, are by no means of this opinion. In some instances, belief of any sort, and in anything, is regarded as having no connection with salvation. And many have professed to "get religion" in recent revival services, who are profoundly ignorant of the one hope of the primitive church. Generally it is considered that a saving faith is nothing more than "a sure trust and confidence that Jesus loved me and gave himself for me." Indeed, here in England there are well nigh as many different sets of ideas about the way of salvation as there are denominations, most of which have no clear knowledge of those things hoped for, without faith in which it is impossible to please God.

Now if we read Paul aright, there is but one faith. The name of the faith of "Christendom" is legion, for they are many. The writer whose words I quoted at the beginning, speaks of an European controversy of 1800 years. This is false. If he means to trace anything like our modern sectarianism so far back as that. No doubt there was a controversy going on at that remote period, but what was it all about? It was not about the final doom of the ungodly; for the Christians of those days believed that "sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death." It was not a controversy about the state of those who had already died in Christ; for the Christians of those days did not regard the resurrection as a useless institution, but believed that without it "we have hope in this life only" and are in no wise advantaged, and that it is necessary if those who sleep in Jesus are not to perish. It was not a controversy about baptism: for there were no unbaptized believers in those times. Their disputations were generally intended to prove that Jesus of Nazareth was the anointed one, the Son of God, and that he had risen from the dead, to furnish assurance that by him God would one day rule the world in righteousness. The apostles reasoned out of the law and the prophets, persuading their hearers concerning none other things than Moses and the ancient seers did say should come. This European controversy is a very different affair. I am did not preach against Apollos, nor Apollos against Cephas, nor James against them all. These men were the exponents of one faith—which, had all men followed, we should not have had the ecclesiastical kaleidoscope of the present hour.

And what about the gospel our missionaries preach to the heathen, and which the clergy preach to the fellow-countrymen at home? Is there uniformity of belief among them respecting it? We doubt it. And we very much question whether if there were such uniformity, it would be of the true Scriptural order.

Had I been chosen to the honor attaching to the character of a missionary to the heathen, I should have tried to preach the apostolic gospel. I should have made it my first business to understand precisely what that gospel was which our Lord authorized his apostles to go forth and preach, and which except a man believe he shall be damned.

Were this work mine, I should take up my concordance and examine all of the texts wherein the word gospel occurs. I should thus be constrained to go forth and preach the gospel which (as Paul tells us) God preached unto Abraham, when he said, "In thee shall all nations be blessed."

My gospel would be based upon the promises made unto Abrahnm and his seed forever. Its subject matter would be that which was delivered to Israel in the wilderness: "As I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord." Num. xiv. 21. "For," the apostle says, "unto us was the gospel preached, as well as unto them; but the word preached unto them did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it."

I should endeavor to follow the example of the Christ, who went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues," and preaching the gospel of the kingdom. Should I chance to encounter any unbelieving Jew, my line of argument would be substantially that of Paul when before Agrippa: "And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers; unto which promise our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come; for which hope's sake, King Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews. Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?"

Were a Sadducee to confront me I should fall back upon the gospel as given us in 1 Cor. xv., taking care to give due prominence to the fact that "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God." And were any other teacher to call my testimony in question, or to make it of none effect by his traditions, I should be justified in quoting the apostle's stern but necessary words: "As we said before, so say I now again, If any man preach any other Gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed. —Bible Echo.

OBITUARY.

THIS is to notify our many friends and acquaintances who read the RESTITUTION, of our terrible affliction. On the 24th inst., we deposit d our lovley wife and companion, one of earth's richest jewels, Elizabeth J. Hounday in her lonely house of clay, among the inhabitants of the dead. And now our hearth and little cottage look indeed like the house of mourning, where none dwelt joy and gladness. She leaves a heart-broken husband and six children, all married but two, to mourn her loss and cherish her memory.

ISAIAH HOUNDAY.

INDIANAPOLIS, Feb. 28, 1876

We have known Sister Hounday for many years. She was a firm believer in "the promises made of God unto the fathers," and we trust she sweetly sleeps in Jesus, awaiting the fruition of that hope which inspired her up during the many years past. We sympathize with her husband and family, and trust they may all direct their steps in the way that leads to the gates of the celestial city. May the troubled hope ever shine over her lonely grave, and may those who survive her entertain the same hope, and be ready for the new earth.

BUSINESS DEPARTMENT.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

In revising the mail list, some mistakes are unavoidable. If any of our subscribers fail to get the RESTITUTION, the probability is that some error has occurred, either in the entry or transfer of the name or time. All errors will be cheerfully corrected.

Also, we have a large amount of manuscript communications on hand. We are reading them all over, with the design of publishing all we can. Our paper is so small that we cannot publish all we receive. From the accumulation of written articles we are compelled to make the best selections we can, and some that are meritorious may not find a place, as we have not room for all. Let brethren continue to write, as their suggestions are not lost, even if all do not appear in the paper.

PERIODICALS.

We intended to give a more special notice of some of the monthlies and other periodicals that come to our office, either in exchange or otherwise than will appear this week.

THE EXPOSITOR AND JOURNAL sustains its high standing in its peculiar province of science.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE has some choice articles among which we would speak of the "Principalities of the Danube," and "The First Century of the Republic," as specially interesting.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE has meritorious articles in every number.

THE SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN has lately become a valuable accession to our list of periodicals.

ASIA exponent of the Jewish religion, we get the JEWISH CHRONICLE, containing many items of information in regard to the "scattered nation."

And finally, the YOUTH'S COMPANION comes as the advocate of Catholicism, with a "sea full of varied intelligence on general matters.

A tract of 31 pages has been sent us by Wm. Gibb, Esq., 128 Central Street, Newark New Jersey. It is entitled, The True Teachings of the Holy Scripture vs. Being a Summary of their Most Principal Doctrines. From a hasty glance at its contents, it seems well worthy of extended notice. For a copy, address as above.

To the Friends of Truth Who Read the "Restitution."

Relying on the earnest desire for a christian paper, so often expressed by you through the RESTITUTION, to me personally, and in various other ways, I have here got out "SUNSHINE." The January number was sent you with the hope that it would meet with your approval, and receive your support; but upon reflection and a further examination of other papers published for the children, I resolved to forfeit the idea of "SUNSHINE," with its license of price, thus giving you the largest handsomest and cheapest paper now published for children in the world.

It is now absolutely without a rival in the field, and cannot fail to please all who see it.

I have done this without pledges, without donations or assistance of any kind, and without capital; relying on the merits of the paper itself, your desire to have it, and your generosity and sense of duty to the premises, to sustain it and carry the enterprise through successfully. Thus far, but little more than one fourth of those to whom the RESTITUTION is a regular visitor, have responded with even a single subscription.

Now, are you friendly to the enterprise? Do you wish it to prosper? Then why not renew your expectations? If so, will you do anything to sustain it? Will you send me your subscription? Will you do what you can to get others to subscribe?

If you wish to see the February number before subscribing, send ten cents for sample copy. It is printed on fine tinted book paper, is illustrated, and contains, besides a large quantity of reading matter for old and young, the beautiful song: "The Light of the World is Jesus," which is alone worth a year's subscription.

I remember that "SUNSHINE" is now a large eight-page monthly, illustrated with cuts, and sparkle, and only costs fifty cents annually, postage included.

Directly "SUNSHINE," Box 496, Fort Atkinson, Wisconsin.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

I am start...ing with Brother, C. P. Grabers, of Waynesville, Ill Ohio, to hold meeting at his place, commencing March 5th; and then I expect to go to Indiana and other points. Now, if any of the brethren living on the C. C. Railroad, or other portion of the route I will have to travel, want meetings, let them write me at once, and they can be accommodated and save traveling expenses. While out on a canvassing tour I want to speak twice a day—say at 2 p. m. and at evening. I use Elder Adams' large illustrated chart, "Map of all History," which is 32 feet long by 9 inches wide. And it will pay any of the brethren or others wishing knowledge, to give a week's time to its careful study.

Address, AMOS SANFORD,

Palestine.

Lines written by Elder David Millard, while in Jerusalem, Feb. 12, 1872.

Air Palestine, though still enveloped in night—
Though wan desolation broods o'er thee—
The sun of thy glory shall rise in its might,
And the arm of Jehovah restore thee.

Though long has oppression environed thee round,
The grasp of thy foes shall be broken;
Thy mountains and valleys with joy shall resound,
For the word that Messiah hath spoken.

Thy down-trodden children, now scattered afar,
Redeemed from the hand of oppression,
Shall follow the guide of their Bethlehem Star,
To inherit their promised possession.

The cre-cent,* now waning in Mussulman pride,
Shall fall with the power that bore it;
When the banner of Him who on Calvary died,
An ensign of peace, shall wave o'er it.

Jerusalem's temple again shall arise,
Than her former, more dazzling and splendid;
When Messiah as King hath descended the skies,
And the throne of His glory ascended,

Then from Zion shall go forth the mandate of peace—
The nations shall bow in submission;
Then wars, desolation and carnage shall cease,
And the earth be Messiah's possession.

Rejoice, Palestine, that thy morning star bright,
Already has risen high o'er thee:
The Sun of thy glory shall rise in its might,
And the arms of Jehovah restore thee.

The Separateness of the Church—An Argument.

The Church of Christ is a separated community. In the world, she is not of it. She has renounced the world, in character and desire, in moral standing and in heavenly hope, she has come out of the world. Her members cannot return to the world without losing their right to a place in a body the distinctive life of which they no longer possess.

So it has ever been since the Church was founded; and so it will ever be till the Church is crowned with completion,—her discipline closed, her growth perfected, her warfare accomplished, her tears wiped away, her members made immortal and glorious. For the separateness of the Church is constitutional and essential, and consequently it is abiding.

Hence springs an argument for the supervention of a dispensation beyond the present. The revealed future of the world demands it. The world is to be saved; seeing that Christ is to have dominion "from sea to sea, and from the river even to the ends of the earth" (Zech. ix. 10), and that "the earth" is to be "filled with the knowledge of Jehovah, as the waters cover the sea" (Isa. vi. 9). In other words, the world is to be peopled with inhabitants, the majority of whom are to be righteous. Good will be the rule, evil the exception. Now we can conceive of a saved world only, as either (1.) In the Church, or (2.) out of the Church, or (3.) beyond the Church.

(1.) A saved world inside the Church would unchurch the Church.

(2.) A saved world outside the Church (a) has never yet been seen; (b) if it ever should be, that alone would form a new—a further dispensation; (c) it also would unchurch the Church; (d) and for many other reasons in an admissible hypothesis. Recognisable salvation, as a blessing actually enjoyed, is, during the pentecostal dispensation, to be found only within the Church of the living God.

(3.) A saved world beyond the Church,—in the sense of a state of things to be realized after the period of the Church's formation, growth, and militant discipline, and when the Church shall have been raised, glorified, and made triumphant,—this is the only legitimate conception, in which all divergent prophecies are fulfilled and all diverse claims are harmonized. When the Church is glorified, the world can be saved. Not till then.

A great principle is here involved. An exclusive body cannot be an inclusive one. An elect community cannot be a universal community. The Church is the former—exclusive, elect; therefore she cannot be the latter,—inclusive and universal. Therefore the present course of the Church must close, the present dispensation end, ere the latter day glory can shine forth, and the world as a whole, be a saved world. A militant Church where all are friends, would be a strange sight. A Church separated, defensive, armed, resisting,—where evil is dominant, where foes lurk on all sides; this we can understand. Its congruity is evident. But that the world should be saved, and be in the Church, and that, in such a state, the Church should remain the Church, this is inconceivable.

It would no longer be true that Christ's disciples were not of the world (John xvii. 16). They would be of the world; only a better one than now exists.

It would be no longer true "that we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God" (Acts xiv. 22). That must then be the exception at most, not, as the Apostle Paul proclaimed it, the rule.

It would be no longer true that "all they who will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution" (2 Tim. iii. 12). The world being saved, where should be the persecutors?

In fact, a large portion of Church teaching as given in the New Testament, and found most appropriate as things now are, would be inapplicable as things would then be.

The apostle teaches us that this is an "age of evil" (Gal. i. 4; [illegible] aiōn ponēros);—here is the doctrine. He bids us not be conformed to this age (Rom. xii. 2):—here is the exhortation, based on the doctrine.

That confusion of the ages which consists in making this the last before redemption's plans are accomplished, and which brings a saved world into the Church, undermines doctrine and exhortation alik . It says that the age by-and-by becomes a good age,—thereby denying that it is characteristically an evil one, as taught by the apostle. It says that by-and-by there will be nothing wrong in being conformed to the age, seeing that the age itself will have been so transformed,—will have become so good. This, at least, is what consistency would require. Seldom, perhaps, is such inconsistency met with.

Our argument thus appears to be perfectly conclusive. The more it is examined, the more fully we are convinced, will its conclusiveness be manifest.

Only in one respect will we at this time fortify the conclusion thus derived from the separateness of the Church in favor of the occurrence of yet another dispensation.

What is the chief ground of the Church's separateness? Say, if you will, that is the evil of the present time. Still the question returns, Why so evil? In the latter day it will not be so: human nature, nevertheless, remaining still the same.

The great fact which yet awaits our consideration, as going into the very heart of the whole matter, is this: That the world is an evil organization; Satan is its prince (John xiv. 30), its god (2 Cor. iv. 4), whose spirit rules it (Eph. ii. 2). This great, sad fact gives a unity, subtlety, ubiquity, and persistence to evil, which it would not otherwise have. It is diffused as the air (ibid), high as thrones and principalities (Eph. vi. 12), hoary and treacherous as the old serpent (Rev. xx. 2). Hence—pre-eminently hence—the position and attitude of the Church. She could only be formed apart from the kingdom of darkness, which lay all around engrossing the world. Those honored to become her members were bound to come out of the world, because she could not be subject to this world's prince.

Hence the Church is what she is,—a separate organism, working on the world from without, from above,—necessarily keeping her position,—standing aloof from the evil; keeping clear of the rebellious confederation. Hence the dispensation is what it is. Hence the separateness of the Church must be maintained as long as the dispensation lasts.

Thus, marking well what is the most signal cause of the dominant evil, we are confirmed in the assurance that the evil will rule while the age lasts.

To come to close quarters. The prince of the world,—has he yet been cast out, or has he not? If he has, we ought to know it. We ought to be aware that the nations are not now deceived by satan, the saints are no longer tempted by him. The best of men ought to know something of this. Their very ignorance of "satan's devices" ought to assure them that the great usurper has already gone to at least his preliminary doom. They ought to know that their warfare is not "with spiritual wickedness in heavenly places." In fact, they ought to know that they do not live in the same dispensation as that in which the apostles of Christ and their converts lived.

This ignorance of such constitutional changes can be accounted for only on the supposition: that no such change has happened,—that satan yet remains "the prince of the kosmos," "the god of the aeon,"—that no dispensational change has taken place.

The dethronement of the prince of darkness,—will it be gradual or summary? will it fill an era or form an epoch? will it be an almost unobservable process, or a bold and signal crisis? will it be a peaceful reformation or a startling revolution?

It will surely be the latter:—a summary ejectment; an epoch in the revolution of the ages and the moral government of God; a crisis as signal for outward triumph over satan as the cross was for inward advantage over his dark rebellion; a revolution among men and nations such as never yet has dawned.

All the evidence—at least, all the decisive evidence intimations—point in this direction.

When the adversary is cast down out of heaven to the earth, he has then but "a short time" before he is further cast down out of the earth into the abyss (Rev. xii. xx). As this "time" is "short,"—short in comparison with the "thousand years," during which his imprisonment continues, it follows that the entire double movement falls within and creates a crisis, and that it does not spread through an age so as gradually to modify a dispensation without closing it. Satan now has access to heaven to accuse the brethren (Job i. ii.; Eph. vi.; Rev. xii.). For distinction, we may speak (1) of satan rampant, (2) satan raging, (3) satan restrained. Between satan's rampancy and satan's restraint falls "a short time" only,—a crisis, a revolution.

Again, as merely giving another view of the same great transition, it is at the sounding of the seventh trumpet that "that the kingdom of this world" becomes "that of our Lord and his Christ" (Rev. xi). When the kingdom ceases to be under the usurper, it comes under its rightful sovereign. Well, then, this is the argument.—The seventh trumpet must of necessity rather mark an epoch than spread through an era, must rather sum up a short time than linger through a long one. All the trumpets have to sound; and, therefore, even if the seven, as a whole number, were distributed through a dispensation, still the seventh would fall at the end of that dispensation—it must come last, to be the seventh. Besides which, it is a resurrection trumpet; and so again, for this reason also, must point to a revolution, a crisis ending a dispensation.

These not uncertain intimations,—derived from no peculiar view of a difficult book, but by lying on the surface of this part of the divine word,—may serve to give distinct voice to a conclusion which must naturally commend itself to the thoughtful mind. That conclusion is, be it remembered, that the dethronement of evil in the person of satan will be swift; and so as well for its decisiveness as for its magnitude, will and must revolutionize the ages, and make way for such altered moral conditions on this earth as can be accounted nothing short of the inbringing of a dispensation unlike the present. How this conclusion does commend itself we have already seen in passing. It relieves us of all perplexity, as to the appropriateness of New Testament teaching. We are in the same dispensation that the apostles were: we have to fight our spiritual way as they did. We have not imperceptibly slidden into a widely different set of moral conditions. The Church on earth is of necessity, in the deepest sense, a Church militant.

Her separateness being constitutional and permanent must remain until she is glorified

When her warfare is accomplished, the world may become a saved world.

A saved world can never be included within the limits of an elect Church.

To refuse another dispensation is to unchurch the Church.

Restoration of Judah and Israel.

BY JOSEPH SAMUEL C. F. FREY.

Author of a Hebrew Grammar. A Hebrew, Latin and English Lexicon. And Editor of Vande Hooght's Hebrew Bible.

Besides, what has the mere restoration of the Jews to their own land to do with the coming of Christ. What difference does it make where the Jews reside, whether in Judea or Europe? You know, . . . I have proved that the Messiah has come, not from the location of the Jews, but from his having fulfilled all that was written of him in the law, in the prophets, and in the book of Psalms; and . . . I have also proved, in a variety of particulars, that Christ's kingdom is not of this world: yet I believe that he will reign on the earth for a thousand years, but not in a worldly spirit, after the manner and customs of this world.

Another writer asks: "Will the Jews, after their conversion to Christianity, be restored to any of their former peculiar distinctions?"

This writer, by putting "the cart before the horse," has run into a slough of despond; from which he thought he could extricate himself only by making a desperate leap—of spiritualizing all that the prophets have said concerning the future condition of our people and nation. Had he put his question thus, "Will the Jews be restored to any of their former peculiar distinctions, and afterwards be converted to Christianity?" all would have been plain and easy. This has been the fatal mistake of almost all the writers in opposition to the literal restoration of our people that I have seen, viz: putting the conversion of Israel before their restoration instead of after it. He objects that the New Testament speaks only of their spiritual conversion, but is silent respecting the return to Canaan, etc. Answer. The reason is plain: the Jews were, at that time, still in their own land; the only question agitated was, whether all Israel was cut off, or only a part! Nor was the literal restoration denied till ages after their dispersion by the Romans.

Next he says, "that at the time of the conversion of the Jews, there will be but one fold, under one shepherd." True, this is my belief, but that does not prevent their literal return before their conversion, and their re-establishing Judaism, and remaining, probably for forty years, till the Lord shall pour out their spirit of grace and supplication, agreeably to Zech. xii. 10-14.

Again he objects, that "the end for which God kept them distinct is answered." How does he know that God had but one end to answer, in keeping our people distinct from all other nations of the earth? If the end has been obtained, why has God kept them distinct in so wonderful a manner hitherto? Does God act without design? May not the Lord have some wise design in bringing them back to their own land, and permitting them to re-establish Judaism in all its former splendor, and afterwards opening their eyes to see infinitely more glory in Jesus and his cross than in these things, and thus laying aside Judaism, for the establishment of which they had waited so long, and trusting only in Jesus Christ, as their Savior and their God? Would not such a mode be a much greater display of the power of the gospel, than if the Jews were converted gradually in their despised state? . . .

He further objects, that "because Christ did not comply with the repeated wishes of the Jews to restore to them the kingdom, therefore he will never restore it." Answer. That Christ did not comply with their carnal wishes, was because that was not his errand at his first coming; but when did he say that he would never restore them after their dispersion, or that he would never reign personally on the earth?

Others have objected, "that their return is promised upon their repentance, and therefore their conversion must proceed." True, God expects their repentance; but repentance and conversion do not always go together. There never will be conversion without repentance, but there may be repentance without conversion. Surely their repentance cannot mean that of a converted soul such godly sorrow, such repentance as flows from a renewed heart; for this condition is to be performed before they return to their own land, but the change of heart is promised as succeeding restoration. Deut. xxx. 1-6. Ezek. xxxvi. etc. It is, however, . . . by no means true, that the patriarchal promises were conditional. The terms in which they were given were absolute as can possibly be conceived; the blessings are most evidently made to depend, not on the conduct of men, but on the sovereign will and power, the eternal foreknowledge, and the unchangeable faithfulness of Jehovah; he does not say, if thou, or thy seed; but "I have given—by myself have I sworn, I will not leave thee, until I have done that which I have spoken to the of." It is true that the covenant of Sinai was conditional, but this was only of temporal duration; even while it was in full force, the prophets foretold that the days were coming when the Lord would make a new and unconditional covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah; Jer. xxxvi. etc., and with this, (as contradistinguished from the other) the holy spirit has explicitly identified the patriarchal covenant, for he has taught us by a prophet of the New Testament, that, "the covenant which was confirmed before that of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred years after, could not disannull, that it should make the promise of none effect; for if the inheritance were of the law, it would be no more of promise, but God gave it to Abraham by promise." Gal. iii.

One objection, only, will be noticed, viz: "that if the Jews are to return to Canaan before their conversion, then it is needless to make exertions for their conversion now." But does it follow, that because we do not expect the national conversion of our people till after their restoration to Canaan, that therefore no individuals may be converted before that time? The apostle Paul, said and believed that our dear people would continue under the influence of spiritual darkness until the fullness of the Gentiles become in, yet that did not prevent him from going into the synagogue every Sabbath day, and reasoning with them from the Scriptures that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God. "Who hath despised the day of small things?" I have previously shown that a considerable number of our brethren will be converted before the nation returns, and those will not return with them but be carried thither afterwards, agreeably to Isa. xviii. (Frey's Joseph and Benjamin vol. 2. pp. 313, 330.)

Of the New Covenant. Jer. xxxi. 31-40. Frey says, (p. 311). "Although this prediction is applied by Paul Heb. viii. to the commencement of the gospel dispensation, and was actually made or established by the death, resurrection and ascension of Jesus; and although the blessings of this covenant are the same as are enjoyed by every converted sinner, yet literally and more fully it respects our nation with whom the other covenant has been made when God brought them out of Egypt. Nor was this prediction fulfilled in the conversion of our brethren in the apostolic time, for . . . the promise here is the conversion, not of a few, or many, "but the whole house of Israel and the house of Judah," verse 31. "the nation." ver 36. Just as was the Sinaic, with the nation. Hence, unto the whole seed of Abraham according to the flesh, was this covenant first to be offered. So Peter tells them in his first sermon, that the promise was unto them and their children, there and then present, i. e., the house of Judah, and to them that are afar off, i. e., the house of Israel, or the ten tribes, in their dispersion. Acts ii. 39.

"It appears therefore plain, that this promise is yet to be fulfilled in the conversion of the ten tribes as well as the house of Judah. Besides, at that time 'the city shall be built, which shall not be plucked up or thrown down any more forever.' ver. 38, 40. It is evident therefore, that our people will first return to the literal Canaan, rebuild the city, and after that be converted as a nation; and the sure fulfillment of it is more certain than the stability of heaven and earth."

There, brother Reed, that comes the nearest to Bible teaching of anything that I have seen, of human production, as I read Scripture. I got hold of Frey thus: On the evening of January 9th, at the close of the world's week of prayer, the clergyman of this place, put it on me to preach the sermon (in the Baptist house) called for in the schedule from Psa. lxxii. 17. termed "the consummation." Being in a minority of one, no alternative was left, but compliance. Well it was a glorious opportunity, a glorious theme, and by some, if not all, most gloriously enjoyed. The Lord's truth, and the love of it, helped me in unfolding the the incoming glory and righteous reign of Messiah and its attendant blessings. When through, one of the ministers asked me if I had ever seen Frey, on the Restitution, and being answered negatively, he said he supposed I had, for I used the same Scriptural arguments in proof, and followed the same line of reasoning, that he did. He then offered to loan me the work, with which I have been so well pleased that I have copied the foregoing for the benefit of any and all who may not have access to the work. All were so well pleased with the presentation of the subject that I was unanimously appointed to give a centennial discourse at the Presbyterian house on the Sunday evening following, (Jan. 16) a copy of which I send you herewith. Thus is prejudice giving way, and truth is gaining ground, and the Lord watching over and caring for his word, which 'shall accomplish that whereto he sent it,' and 'shall stand forever.' And now, brother Reed, allow me to say, I cannot for the life of me understand how it is, or has been that this question of the Jew is allowed to, or can, be productive of so much bitterness of feeling as has been manifested in relation to it. Surely there must be a sad want of the Christ spirit in those who allow themselves to be so far carried away by it—either, for or against—as to let it gender a partizan feeling. For more than fifteen years I have been in sweet intercourse with those of either view, and steadily and persistently refuse to be alienated from either, and now begin to reap the reward of peace. I say, "let us be one people."

G. W. STETSON.

The Sinner's Final Loss.

"For what is a man advantaged, if he gain the whole world and lose himself, or be cast away?"—Luke ix. 25.

1. He loses himself. Not his happiness; not the world; not the pleasing angel of hope in his breast; but himself, his very being in the universe. He might lose all the properties and acquirements that render life agreeable, and yet retain himself, continue in consciousness; let him lose himself, however, and he is immediately as if he had never been.

2. The same idea is expressed in Mark viii. 36: "What shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" Viewed side by side with our text, this language, "lose his own soul," becomes very plain: even alone, it most emphatically conveys the idea that the unholy shall ultimately cease to exist. "Lose his own soul!" what does that mean? The man is represented as losing his soul; not his happiness, nor hope, nor the Divine smiles, but his own soul. Now, what is a man without a soul? Nothing; for the idea of a man, and a soul, are substantially one. To make a man, you must produce a soul; for there cannot be a man without a soul; and to make a human soul is to make a human being, capable of all responsible functions as a moral agent, and susceptible also of suffering and pleasure. For a man then to lose his own soul, is, in other words, a soul losing itself; or, as in another text, a man losing himself; his being departing from conscious existence. A man might lose happiness, and yet keep his soul; a man might lose heaven, and the mercy and favor of God, and yet retain his soul; but he cannot lose his soul and yet continue a soul; for that would be losing a soul and keeping a soul at the same moment! Losing consciousness, an essential attribute of a living soul, or of a living self, and yet preserving it! Losing self, and yet preserving self; which is utterly impossible.

In the passage from Mark, the Greek word rendered "soul" is the same that in the context of that verse, and in the parallel passage in Matthew, as well as in many other parts of the New Testament, is translated "life;" and the verse from Mark may most properly be rendered, "What shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own life?" So rendered, it conveys the idea which is given in the text. The man is to lose his life; and when a man loses his life, is he not as if he had never been? Can he lose his life, and yet in any sense be alive? Can he be conscious of having lost that which is essential to consciousness itself? To lose life then is to cease to be, not here simply, but anywhere in space; and losing life, losing his soul, and losing himself, are only different modes of expressing the same awfully solemn thought, that the doom of the godless is that they shall be finally swept from conscious existence, as unfit for being.

3. We have now to consider another expression, "or be cast away." This is the same idea under a slightly different aspect; for you notice the man is to "lose himself, or be cast away." To lose himself is to be cast away; and he loses himself by being cast away. Now we do not think the idea is that he loses himself by casting himself away, or by rushing on to death in Gehenna; but that he will lose himself, his being, when he is cast away by the Omnipotent Judge—not cast away from hope, but from being itself. Life is withdrawn from the impenitent by the divinely appointed agents of destruction; as in 2 Thess. i. 9: "Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord;" a destruction to issue from the Lord, or of which he is the author.

This loss of self is to be irrevocable, hopeless. A man may lose himself for a while, or forever; in other words, a man may pass into the unconsciousness of death for a day, for a thousand years, or for an eternity. Now the self-loss here spoken of is eternal; they are to be punished with an everlasting destruction, not an everlasting preservation in torment, but destruction, and one that is never in the lapse of ages to be repaired. No resurrection follows the second death; the end is destruction; they shall never see life. Some have lost themselves voluntarily, or resigned their present life for Jesus and his Gospel, and now they rest in the silence of the grave. But they will find themselves again; they shall ere long awake to a new and glorious state of being, to the crown of martyrdom likewise, and the songs of salvation before the enthroned Redeemer. Alas for the apostles who preserved themselves here, or preferred life to the honor of Jesus and the purity of their consciences; they and all the godless shall be reduced to ashes, and no eye shall ever see them more. They shall be blotted from the roll of being, from the page of life. They had their portion in this life; they preferred the Now to the After, present enjoyment to immortal being and felicity. Streams may be dried up and again murmur along their ancient channels; trees that have long been reckoned dead may send forth green shoots to wave in the sunshine; the land that has apparently been cursed with sterility may anew bloom like paradise; stars that cease to shine in the high places of the firmament may afresh be kindled; but no forth-putting of Divine reviving energy shall restore to being the condemned and consumed; the long moonless and morningless night of forgetfulness is their unalterable portion.

O fearful doom indeed! but why forget
It is their choice? For men may live or die;
On wings of faith escape the penal threat,
Or with the lost in condemnation lie.
And when at length the hours of mercy fly,
And God apportions each his chosen lot,
Whom can the sinner blame, when on his eye
Night's night descends, to vanish not?
Whom can the sinner blame? what he desired he got."

THE RESTITUTION.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

HOW TO ADDRESS LETTERS.

All business letters, or communications must be addressed as follows:—

THE RESTITUTION,
Plymouth, Indiana.

Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God upon the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with him in the government of the nations; the resurrection of angels; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Communications.—The Editor must not be understood as endorsing all the sentiments expressed by correspondents whose articles are inserted under this head. Each writer is alone responsible for the article bearing his own signature. If the teachings of any writer is not endorsed, an article setting forth the views of the party differing may be furnished. Free discussion of Bible doctrines on all sides will be allowed, but the Editor reserves the right to refuse the publication of anything that is communications which antagonize a belief and obedience of the Gospel as a means of salvation, or which undermine its principles.

Moral Ruin.

SALVATION AN ABSOLUTE NECESSITY.

The will and conscience are intimately related moral qualities, and sin as a violence done to the latter re-acts as a weakening and ultimately destructive force upon the former. It is by a continuous weakening of the intensive quantity of the will and conscience that a man becomes "tied and bound with the chain of his sins." It is to this applies the prophet's warning: "Woe unto them that spin iniquity by very slender threads; till their sin becomes as a cart rope." Isa. v. 18. And just in proportion, therefore, as the conscience becomes indurated and the will torpid, responsibility—excepting so far as the present moral inability is the natural result of past voluntary transgression—is lessened; and when the fearful process is consummated; when the man has practically ceased to possess either will or conscience; his doom as a moral being is sealed, unless there exists some rectifying power beyond himself; some diviner energy by which this natural law may be superseded. And this brings us into direct contact with a truth, the momentous character of which the church is only now beginning fully to comprehend and appreciate. There is such a force; there is such an energy; it is the love of God in Christ; it is the faith that overcometh the world and sin and Satan; it is "the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus," which makes us free from "the law of sin and death." The late Bishop Ewing in his precious series of discourses, "Revelation considered as light," speaking with great power and spiritual insight on this solemn subject, says: "Sin is an injury done to our own nature—an offence against our own souls—an injury to the beautiful and good within us. It is no doubt an injury to our neighbor, to God's good universe, and to God himself. But first of all, and chiefly, it is a sin against our own nature. It is (naturally) an irrecoverable evil; for not even the Almighty power can uncommit an act once committed. It joins the irrecoverable past and brings irrecoverable consequences, and we cannot recall the dead to write another epitaph. The inscription of what we are is eternally engraven upon ourselves. We ourselves, are the books out of which the Judge is to read the sentence; for we ourselves are the crop of our own sowing; and the judgment just is what we are. Sin cannot have any other or any greater punishment than its own consequence, which is not arbitrary, but simply the fruit of the seed we sow."

"We too little realize in the daily life the tremendous importance of these things. We hear God's laws read, and know them as proclamations against sin, and deal with them as arbitrary commandments which personal relationship may affect. We do not consider that their operation is, and must ever and invariably be the same, because it is good; but we imagine that somehow we shall escape from the evil consequences of sin by some personal act of favor on God's part in the way of dispensation; and so we waddle on through life, in the belief that somehow, sometime, it will be all right, and that in some mysterious but delightful way God will—as we phrase it—be gracious to us, recall the operation of his own laws, let the past sin be as if it never had been, and let us go free as if we had never sinned. But this is impossible, and after a certain time, when a fixed habit is formed, whether for good or evil, the operation of the law and its results seem to become unalterable—stamped upon us so that, as is said, 'He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he that is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still.'"

"But what, then, you will say, is our hope? For surely the motive power is not with us; the well of life is with God. What is the meaning of Christ? Is there not a Gospel? What is the Gospel? Is it not news of salvation for sinners? Most certainly it is. There is hope for sinners: and that hope is in Christ."

"But then we must observe, that Christ comes not to deliver us from the consequence of sin or its punishment, so much as from sin itself. And he comes to deliver us from sin by setting us above its commission, and, therefore beyond the range of its consequences. He sets us above its commission, and, delivering us from the cause, delivers us from the results. He prevents its commission. He does not (merely) free us from the penalty of sin after its commission. He comes to give us a more abundant life, and by by so doing, to set us above death and its kindred. He is a Saviour, and he saves by uniting us with himself; thereby setting us free from punishment by setting us free from sin. He that abideth in him sinneth not; and, just as he abideth, he that lays hold of him lays hold of eternal life, and in so doing, passes from death unto life."

The saving power, then, which in the Gospel is proclaimed to us, is the power of Christs' resurrection-life, by our participation in which, we are made the willing subjects of "the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus," and thus "made free from the law of sin and death." Rom. viii. 2. Christ does not meet us, so to speak, on the lower plane of our Adamic nature, arresting and reversing the operation of those moral laws of which we have been speaking, and which are in themselves "holy, just, and good;" but he raises us up to a higher and supernatural plane; he brings us under the operation of a new spiritual law, the plane and law, that is, of his own divine and victorious life. This, and this alone, is salvation; the only possible salvation for a fallen being like man. "Except a man be born of water and of the spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God." John iii. 5. "If any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his. But if Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin; but the spirit is life because of righteousness." Rom. viii. 9, 10. For the point which we desire finally to bring out, the truth which it is of the utmost importance should be clearly recognized, is this: It follows inevitably from what has been said, if indeed it has been in accordance with the mind of God, that the deliberate and persistent rejection of this supernatural and divine power, the refusal thus to be raised above the operation of those moral laws of which we have spoken, as they must operate in the case of a fallen creature, on the natural plane, at once the seal of the sinner's doom and the consummation of his guilt. A seal which, if the testimony of scripture is to be implicitly received, even the hand of Omnipotence cannot unloose; a guilt which, as it can never be exceeded, so can it never be expiated. It and it alone constitutes the sinner's ripeness for final judgment, because it alone precludes the possibility of further divine action. No other sin, however aggravated, is either in its character or its consequences absolutely and eternally fatal, just because its law of death may still be superseded and overruled by the higher law of life and righteousness in Christ Jesus; but this is fatal because, while the same law of moral habit, and the same perversive and destructive action of sin upon the conscience and will, is as operative in relation to this as in relation to any form of evil, in this case there remains no higher law by which its action on this supernatural plane can be superseded. For as the man who is a drunkard, by constant indulgence in his besetting sin, ceases at last to possess a conscience regarding it or a will to control it; so the man who is an unbeliever, by his willful, deliberate, and persistent rejection of the love of God as revealed in Christ,—that is the law of God's own being and, consequently, the ultimate of all laws,—"after he has received the thorough knowledge (epignosis) of the truth," ceases at last to have any spiritual receptivity. The divine light, when it does not truly enlighten, blinds; the divine love, when it does not impart a new life, kills. The eye of the spirit is darkened; its heart ceases to beat; the man is morally and spiritually a corpse; for him "there remaineth no more a sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation which shall devour the adversaries." Heb. x. 26, 27. WM. MADDOX.

—Rainbow.

[Such is the form, in the Hebrew, of a beautiful passage which, as we have it in the A. V., no one can be expected to understand. The allusion is to rope-making. First the slender threads of yarn are spun, and then at last these are united into the thick rope. So awfully grapple those of sinful actions voluntarily committed, becoming in time the most fateful which the man had neither the power nor the will to break.

Berean's Casket.

PREPARED BY G. M. MYERS.

Brother L. S. Hatch, of Grantville, Nebraska, writes: "Will you explain Acts vii. 59, which reads, 'And they stoned Stephen, calling upon God, and saying, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit.'"

Who called?

It is by persons sometimes thought to be difficult to tell who did the calling here referred to; but the entire context unmistakably will predicate this act of Stephen.

Upon whom did he call?

In the language as it stands in the King James version, with the supplied word "God," it makes Stephen call upon God. But the word "God," as the italic letters in the text indicates, is supplied; neither is it found in the original Greek. Then Stephen must have called upon the Lord Jesus of whom he makes the request, and whom he saw, as described in verse 55.

Receive.

This word is from the Greek word dexai, and is by Greenfield defined, "right, as opposed to left, the right hand, the parts toward the right hand, to sit at the right hand of any one, to enjoy with any one the highest honor and dignity which he can bestow, to be at any one's right hand, i. e., to be one's helper, to afford aid to any one, to give the right hand to any one as a pledge of sincerity in one's promises."

The idea, then, contained in the word used by Stephen does not, necessarily mean to depart, to go out, to leave, to go the Lord Jesus, but to draw power,—support from him. Also, we find upon this text in the Diaglott, a foot note, which says: "That Booth, in his Lexicon of Primitive Greek words, gives as a meaning of dexai, sustain or support, to be sustained."

My spirit.

Out of the 383 occurrences of the word pneuma in the New Testament, it is rendered wind, life, spirit (generally), and ghost; if we may call spirit a rendering, at all, into English. The Greek term is translated into the Latin language, and there it becomes "spiritus," signifying, literally, breath, as it does in the Greek. Then it is not translated from the Latin into the English, but simply Anglicised, by cutting off its termination "us." And in this way its primary meaning is lost, especially to those who will not take the trouble upon themselves to consult even Webster's dictionary, where they might learn at least something as to the route the word has traveled.

Now, if we are not to give to this Anglicised Latin word, wherever it occurs, the meaning the Latins gave it, which was breath, then honor will compel us to to retire one step back of this, and receive the Greek word pneuma, and define it as the context in each case requires.

Then to a few examples:

1. "For as the body without the pneuma is dead, so faith without works is dead also;" James ii. 26. In this text the King James translators have put into the text the transferred word spirit, and set its definition, breath, in the margin. Then, as the text will receive breath as the rendering of the word, and it is so placed in the margin, we accept of it as correct.

2. "And they (the Jews) were not able to resist the wisdom and the pneuma by which he (Stephen) spake;" Acts vi. 10. Evidently an immortal, conscious entity is not here referred to, but eloquence, and oratorical power.

3. "For ye have not received the pneuma of bondage again;" Rom. viii. 15. Not a conscious entity belonging to bondage, but a disposition begotten in them by the law of Moses.

4. "In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, when ye are gathered together and my pneumates with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ;" 1 Cor. v. 4; see also, Col. ii. 5. Paul's spirit, we see from these texts, could not have been the thinking principle in him, for he wrote at Phillipi while his spirit was at Corinth.

5. "And he had power to give pneuma unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed;" Rev. xiii. 15. Here, again, it will not do to render the word pneuma by a conscious entity, or immortal spirit, for it would be so very consistent with the ideas of the world to say that one animal had the power to put an immortal spirit into another; or even that one persecuting power could put into another persecuting power an immortal spirit. But what meaning shall we give to the word here? The King James translators upon this passage of Scripture, have been very liberal, and given to us two renderings, putting in the margin, breath, making it Greek, and into the text the word life. In the margin, they have placed the primary meaning of the word, the cause of life, and in the text, the secondary meaning, the result produced by the cause moving upon the organism of the animal.

Now, in the text, in Acts vii, 59, instead of giving to the word pneuma its primary meaning, breath, we are led from the nature of the context to the conclusion that it should, like the text last above, have the secondary—life.

Then to sum up the points above developed, and to paraphrase the verse, we will have:—The Jews stoned Stephen, and while they were stoning him he called upon the Lord Jesus and said, sustain my life. That he gave up no conscious entity it is evident.

1. From the fact that consciousness, after it leaves the body, is never in one single case in the Bible predicated of the spirit.

2. Stephen did the calling referred to, not the spirit.

3. After the prayer, Stephen kneeled and uttered another prayer; verse 60.

Duties of Daily Life.

Life is not entirely made up of great evils or heavy trials; but the perpetual recurrence of petty evils and small trials is the ordinary and appointed exercise of Christian graces. To bear with the failings of those about us,—with their infirmities, their bad judgment, their ill-breeding, their perverse tempers,—to endure neglect when we feel we deserved attention, and ingratitude when we expected thanks—to bear with the company of disagreeable people whom Providence has placed in our way, and whom he has provided or purposed for the trial of our virtue—these are the best exercises of patience and self-denial, and the better because not chosen by ourselves. To bear with vexation in business, with disappointment in our expectations, with interruptions of our retirement, with folly, intrusion, disturbance—in short, with whatever opposes our will, or contradicts our humor—this habitual acquiescence appears to be more of the essence of self-denial than any little rigors or afflictions of our own imposing. These constant, inevitable, but inferior evils properly improved, furnish a good moral discipline, and might, in the days of ignorance, have superseded pilgrimage and penance.—Hannah Moore.

Spirit's Testimony.

The spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are the children of God.—Rom. viii. 16.

Two distinct propositions are affirmed in the above language, viz.:

1. God's spirit testifies to the truth as to who are the children of God.

2. Our spirit bears witness to the same fact.

It does violence to the language to affirm as some do, that God's spirit bears witness to our spirit. The plain statement of the passage is that the two witnesses testify to the same fact. The policy of proving statements by at least two witnesses, originated with God. See Deut. xvii. 6; also 2 Cor. xiii. 1. Now we will inquire,

1. How does God's spirit testify? Does it use any intelligent means to convey evidence to us that we are the children of God? Does the spirit use language that mortals can understand? or does it communicate in some mysterious and incomprehensible manner that can neither be understood nor communicated to others? What possible advantage would such a message as this be to any one?

Paul, in illustrating the idea of speaking in unknown language, says: "Unless there is a distinction in the tunes played upon instruments, we cannot tell what is piped, or harped; or if the trumpet gives an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself for battle? so, likewise ye, except ye utter by the tongue words easy to be understood, how shall it be known what is spoken? for ye shall speak into the air." 1 Cor. xiv. 7-9. The gist of the above beautiful illustration is this, in brief, that a communication in order to be of any value to anybody must be intelligently conveyed, and thus easily understood.

In perfect agreement with the above rule, we find that God has testified by his spirit in the ages past. See Neh. ix. 30. To the prophets did Jehovah communicate messages by his spirit, and these same messages were faithfully delivered to the people, word for word, without note or comment. See Jer. xxvi. 2.

The spirit's testimony, through the apostles, is given in the same clear and intelligent manner; all that the spirit commanded them to do, they have faithfully done, and now we have as evidence that we are the children of God, the clearly defined rules given by which we become the children of God. And this brings us to consider, secondly, how our spirit testifies that we are children of God.

The system of truth, of which God is the author, requires, on the part of those who embrace it, a moral as well as an intellectual change. Bad habits must be broken up, impure desires must be repressed, filthy conversation avoided, lying, stealing, anger, malice, blasphemy, evil speaking, hatred, all the accumulated evils of our sinful nature, must give place to good habits, pure thoughts, chaste conversation, truth, honesty, mildness, good will, praise to God, kindness and love. The constant cultivation of the above noble traits of character, will, on our part, be the strongest testimony that our spirit, or mind, or disposition, is in harmony with the rules dictated by the spirit of God. "For, if ye love me," says Jesus, "ye will keep my commandments;"—and by this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye love one another." Weary pilgrim down life's journey, how goes the battle? are you growing in grace? are you increasing in knowledge? is your mind richly set with the bright gems of purity and holiness? are you waiting for Jesus? May we overcome all and be saved. Amen.

J. F. WAGONER.

According to Madrid correspondence, the late elections in Spain have had one important political effect which had not been anticipated—that of leaving an open breach between the Ultramontanes and the government of King Alfonso. The former were warned by their archbishop not to vote for any person who supported the clause in the new constitution granting religious toleration. Roused by this sort of attack, some of the government journals are raising a cry against the priesthood as not merely standing in the way of all reform, but scandalizing the nation by their personal misconduct. In any case, the extent of the toleration proposed will prove, in practice, to be very limited.

Scripture Obituaries.

The obituaries of the Bible are always brief. God pronounces no long, high-sounding eulogies over the dust of the dead; sends no deified souls of mortal men to impossible heavens. All that is said, is in simple, terse, and truthful language. The antediluvians lived, begat sons and daughters, and died. All the days of Noah were nine hundred and fifty years, and he died. Haran died before his father, in Ur of the Chaldees. Terah died in Haran. And of the beautiful wife of Abraham it is said, "and Sarah died in Kirjath-arba, * * * and Abraham came to mourn for Sarah, and weep for her. And after this, Abraham buried Sarah, his wife, in the cave of the field of Machpelah. Abraham, most noted, most faithful of all the patriarchs, has these few words devoted to his death: "And these are the days of the years of Abraham's life which he lived, an hundred three score and fifteen years. Then Abraham gave up the ghost (breathed out his breath) and died in a good old age, an old man and full of years, and was gathered to his people. And his sons, Isaac and Ishmael buried him in the cave of Machpelah." Deborah died and was buried under the oak of weeping. Rachel died and was buried in the way to Ephrath. Isaac breathed out his breath and died, and was gathered unto his people, being old and full of days. And so died Jacob, the father of the patriarchs, and Joseph his son. Moses died on Pisgah and was gathered unto his people, as Aaron died on Mount Her, and was gathered unto his people. So died Joshua, the great leader of Israel. Samuel, the prophet, d'ed greatly lamented. David slept with his fathers, having died in a good old age, full of days, riches and honor. Solomon slept with his fathers, and so of all the after kings and prophets and people of Israel, of whom any death notice is given. Not one is said to have escaped the penalty pronounced in the garden. Save Enoch and Elijah, not one is said to have gone, either bodily or in shape of an immaterial soul to heaven. All that is said of these leaves us to infer that they were changed, and so translated, in their own proper persons, as the living will be when Jesus comes. Died, was buried, is the record, Reader, draw your conclusions.

S. ROXANA WINGE.

Sermon on the Mount.

BROTHER REED:—While to some Scriptures particular attention is paid, it seems to me high time that Christ's Sermon on the Mount, should receive its due share. Are the precepts of that plain discourse to be a rule to the end of this age? If so, no professing body of people, large or small, can be found who keep the commandments of Jesus. Can an individual be found who practices His teachings?

Brother J. B. C. may remember some converse on this matter on the Camp Ground, at Springfield, some years ago. He admitted the importance of a question the writer asked. In 1843-44 the Adventists were not afraid to dwell on the Lord's words recorded in Matthew and Luke. I have had them before congregations. In the movement of 1844, a prominent preacher read and remarked on the v. vi. and vii. chapters of Matthew, telling his audience that he gave them the best sermon ever preached. But times changed, and the same preacher afterwards spoke rather differently, in a publication, than he did to his audience some time before.

I have found editors, and others, seemingly afraid to take up the subject of the requirements of the great discourse. Is not the reason because all feel self-condemned? Does not each one say to himself, I cannot fully carry out the directions of that sermon, and live in the world? Now, let us quit ourselves like men, in this matter. If the precepts were only for the disciples present, when Jesus preached, or only for Ist century Christians, or only for the apostolic time, let us have sufficient proof. But if the commands were for all believers to the end, what is the just conclusion but this:—We are all condemned; none are on the rock. Ye brethren, who write on other subjects, don't dodge this. Let us have no round-about talk; speak out. We want straightforward, honest dealing, with Christ's words.

THE RESTITUTION

PLYMOUTH, IND.....Mar. 8, 1876.

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT

☞ Just as we are going to press we learn, from a private note from Bro. Wilson, that Bro. J. M. Stephenson has lost his only boy, Lossie. We deeply sympathize with the heart-broken family. Nothing, this side of the beautiful promise of life, will comfort their aching hearts. May the blessed hope of the Gospel be doubly sweet in this hour of deep affliction.

☞ We are sorry that the obituary notice, written so long ago by brother N. J. Morgan, of Virginia, was not published sooner. It was handed to another party, and got mislaid. We had no objections to its publication and only regret that it has been so long delayed. Brother Morgan will please excuse the lateness of its appearance.

☞ We are pained to learn that brother H. B. Peirce, of Geneva, has lost his little boy. Death takes from us the hopes of life and removes our dear ones from our embrace, but not from our hearts. Truly, death is an enemy, but Jesus abolished death and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel. May the gospel hope shine before us with renewed brightness and may we ever look with joyful hope to the approaching rest in Jesus our Lord.

☞ We received a line from a brother a few days ago to the effect that brother Thomas Wilson had embraced the time movement of one Patterson, of Listowell, C. W. Of course we had no confidence in such a statement but for fear it might be used as an influence to help along the fanaticism, we take this method of saying that this report is wholly false. Perhaps no one is farther from such heretical ideas than Brother W. But some men are very free to use other men's names to bolster up their own foolishness.

☞ It is a matter of great astonishment that so many officers in the American Republic should be guilty of taking bribes. Gen. Belknap, of Iowa, Secretary of War, is now found guilty of taking bribes, for the last three years. Gen. B. was one of the foremost men of this nation and deserves a better destiny, but he has fallen, and he alone must suffer the infamy of treachery to principle. The great year of American liberty seems to be full of treason and sin in high places. There is but one antidote for our world, and that is the coming kingdom of Jesus our Lord. Men do not seem able to rule themselves. They are misled by the demagogues who glory in self-abasement and official corruption.

The Greatest Life.

The scenes connected with the crucifixion are most imposing and sublime. Volumes have been written to give some idea of the greatness of the event. Poets have dwelt with rapture upon the moral heroism of Christ. Artists have vied with each other to paint on canvas the awful tragedy. Sculptors have tried to make the cold marble tell the story of His suffering. Orators have portrayed, in graphic colors, the wonderful imagery of the scenes of the Roman cross. But all these fall far short of the simple story as told by the humble fishermen of Galilee. They have given to the life and death of Christ an immortal place in the world's literature. He who comes nearest to the original sketches, is deemed the purest writer, and best biographer, as being in close it sympathy with that unparalleled tragedy. Indeed, no event this side of the world's creation, embodies so much. The world's hope is wrapt up in the life and character, the birth and resurrection of our Lord. The simple story of the Evangelists will ever be fresh and original, and will continue to be the marvel in the world of mind through all time.

Do Sabbatarians Agree?

It is the boast of the Seventh Day Adventists that they are united in their work and doctrinal views. They are very free to say that those who reject the Seventh Day theory are a divided people, and are not therefore of God. Now let us apply the rule which they apply to others. J. H. Waggoner, in his work on the law of God, says: "By the same method of comparison, we are led to the conclusion that one and the same law is spoken of to the Romans and Galatians; and also by the fact that the declarations in Galatians cannot be made to apply to the ceremonial law."—Law of God, Page 73.

Eld. H. A. St. John writes an article in the last number of the Advent Review (Feb. 10) upon the subject of the "Two Laws," and squarely takes the position that Galatians refers directly to the ceremonial law, and refers to chapters v. 1, iii. 15, in proof of his position. Waggoner says it is the moral law. St. John says it is the ceremonial law. Which is right?

If the opposing writers had taken breath, and examined the Bible a little more closely, they would have both found out one important truth, viz.: That the terms, moral law and ceremonial law, do not occur in the whole Bible. Here is where honest people are frequently misled, by this kind of sophistry. That the "law of God" and the "law of Moses" are one and the same, will appear plain to the reader by examining Neh. viii. 1, 5, 8, 14, 18; Luke ii. 22, 23, 24, 39.

The Black Hills.

Men are now on the move for the Black Hills. They all want gold. Poor men and rich men are getting ready when spring opens to go on their expedition. How much sacrifice men will make for a little gold; how much hardship, how much fatigue and yet just before us shines the eternal city whose streets are paved with gold, and whose parks are shaded by the tree of life. That world of eternal beauty, of crowns, of robes, of palms, of surpassing sublimity, is rejected, while every cry for gold from the hills or deserts of earth is received with joy and acclamation. We do not oppose the "gold movement," but men should not forget that there is a home for the weary spirit beyond the heat and the turmoil of life, and that the hills of God shine forever with gold and glittering stones, and everywhere in that bright world we have the blessed assurance of endless rest.

The Union Movement.

The American people are rapidly forming themselves into separate organic bodies. We see this illustrated in every direction. Professional men have organized under appropriate names, and are prosecuting their work with great energy. Working men are now organized, and claim the benefits of co-operation. Railroads are all controlled by a few leading minds, who act, for the most part, under articles of agreement. Manufacturers have established prices, and have a distinctive understanding. Politicians have organized their clans. At the capitals of the states are the head-centres of their crafty plans. Indeed, so popular has this idea of union become, that even foreigners have caught the spirit, and demand their rights upon organic grounds. The whole Republic is infected with the contagion. All classes are moving for separate organizations. We have Church unions, Women's Conventions, Temperance Leagues; and farmer's co-operative plans, by which they expect to maintain their rights in the ever-multiplying schemes of men. It seems that men dare not trust each other. Each man seeks union with those of his particular profession, or occupation. There is but one cry, and that is union. We can see this widespread disaffection—the spirit of distrust and dissolution. Men combine because they are in fear of approaching calamities. If all men were at ease, this union movement would not be so general. But it speaks a great lesson to the children of promise. They should be ONE, and labor for the saving of men for that bright age, where there shall be one kingdom, one language, one religion,—where all of God's little ones shall be gathered into one great family,—where there shall be one Lord, and His name one.

Revelations xix. 10.

"And I fell at his feet to worship him. And he said unto me, See thou do it not: I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren that have the testimony of Jesus: worship God: for the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy."

This text of Scripture is sometimes quoted to prove that the spirit of the man is conscious after the death of the body. But it should be borne in mind that there is not one word said about the soul or spirit in this sense. To say that the spirit of some one of the ancient prophets was the personage that communed with John on Patmos, is assuming the very point which ought to be proven. Men should be careful in quoting the word of the Lord, and seek to present the writer's idea instead of their own. If men would do this, much error would be avoided. If there had never been any person taken from the earth without seeing death, and if there had never been any resurrection of dead persons, the point might be urged with more plausibility, that the human spirit is conscious in death. But when we consider that Enoch and Elijah never tasted death, and also that many of the bodies of saints arose after Christ's resurrection, we find ample proof for a BODILY presence, without resorting to the immortal-spirit theory. Again: The language hardly justifies the idea that it alludes to one of the prophets, but to a fellow-servant of the prophets. Nearly all the translations of the original Greek make this the true idea nearly translated it: "I am thy fellow bondsman and (the fellow bondsman) of thy brethren who have the testimony of Jesus." The improved version has it: "I am a fellow-servant with thee, and with thy brethren who bear testimony to Jesus." Wesley has this note upon the text: "I am now employed as your fellow-servant, to testify of the Lord Jesus by the same spirit which inspired the prophets of old." Dr. Adam Clark understands the expression to refer to God's angel, the one who made the revelation to John. Indeed, there is no proof whatever that the distinguished personage here alluded to had any reference to one of the prophets. This position is the merest assumption, and is now abandoned by all good critics as affording any proof for the immortality of the soul.

Science and Religion.

Men have ever tried to bring science into conflict with religion; but as time rolls on the unfolding of nature only tends to confirm the word of God. The whole system of natural philosophy is constantly undergoing great and important changes. In each of its new developments it brings us nearer the great standard of all saving truth, the Word of God. Mr. Taylor, A. M., the former pastor of the Presbyterian church of Plymouth, but now of Manchester, Ohio, presents in a published address the following beautiful sentiment:

But notwithstanding the great discoveries of Science, man is still within a stone's throw of the shore. The great ocean of knowledge is still a sealed book. But a few links in the chain of providential government have yet been discovered. Standing therefore so near the shore, with an ocean of unexplored and hidden knowledge, and when we see matter in every conceivable shape of modification, from a clod of earth to a sunbeam, from dust to the brightness of the human eye, is it not folly inexcusable to unite with the great masters of infidelity in proclaiming that everything that cannot be weighed in the scales of human reason, and reduced to human comprehension, is false.

Human Creeds.

We have given place to a number of articles bearing upon the question of human creeds. We have done this not because we believe in creeds, or because we endorsed the articles. But as we profess to be governed by the word of God, and believing in the broadest liberty, we have always felt like giving every one a fair chance to express his or her views upon all questions growing out of a Bible faith. We have no confidence in any human creed; neither do we expect to lend our voice or pen to any movement having for its object the creed idea. We have always believed, and do still, that the Bible is all-sufficient, as a rule of faith and practice. Human opinions formulated into systems, are without Divine sanction, and tend only toward disruption. If the Bible is not all-sufficient, we may well despair of fallible man's improving upon the Divine plan. If God has not made the plan of salvation sufficiently plain without human intervention in the way of creeds, it is not man's fault. God alone would be responsible, and man would be free from all blame. Our whole idea can be expressed in a few words. We believe the Bible, and the Bible alone, is a sufficient guide in matters of faith and Christian character—a sufficient basis of Christian fellowship. No other formula can express more; no creed can improve upon it. We ask for no creed but the word of God. It is God's legacy of truth to His children. All else is vain. May its sacred truths shine in our hearts and actions, and lead us to the gates of rest.

God's Purpose, before the Beginning of the Ages, Concerning the Gentiles.

"Now to him that is of power to establish you according to my gospel, and the preaching of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery, which was kept secret since the world began, but now is made manifest, and by the scriptures of the prophets, according to the commandment of the everlasting God, is made known to all nations for the obedience of faith." Rom. xvi. 25–26.

1. This purpose is still a mystery with our interrogator, and some others, notwithstanding it is clearly revealed through the apostles. When an enigma is revealed it ceases to be enigmatical.

2. The revelation of this mystery teaches that according to the commandment of the everlasting God the gospel was made known to all nations for the obedience of faith. All nations must certainly include all the Gentiles, as well as the Jews. But the apostle is more explicit in his letter to the Ephesians. He says, "For this cause I, Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles, if ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to you-ward: How that by revelation he made known unto me the mystery; (as I wrote afore in few words whereby, when ye read, ye may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ;) which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, as it is now revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit." Eph. iii. 1–5.

The apostle then tells what the mystery was, which having been concealed for ages was revealed to the apostles, and through them to us. He adds, "That the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of his promises in Christ by the gospel unto me who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ; and to make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery, which from the beginning of the world has been hid in God, who created all things by Jesus Christ." Eph. iii. 6–9. In the foregoing we are taught:

1. That Paul was called to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ to the Gentiles. Of the same import is the language of the Lord to Ananias as a reason why he should have confidence in Saul of Tarsus. "But the Lord said unto him, go thy way: for he (Saul) is a chosen vessel unto me to bear my name before the Gentiles and kings, and the children of Israel." Acts ix. 15. What a striking contrast between the Gentiles and Israelites. But the Gentiles are mentioned first because Paul's chief mission was to preach the gospel to the Gentiles. Thus, he is called "the apostle of the Gentiles."

2. This was made known to Paul by a direct revelation from Christ.

3. The purpose of God to grant salvation to the Gentiles was not made known in other ages with the clearness and definiteness with which it was revealed to the holy apostles.

4. In this grand and philanthropic design, God was no respecter of persons. Thus, Christ revealed to his apostles how that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs with the Jews, of the same body, and equal partakers of the promises in Christ Jesus, through the gospel. The same unsearchable riches was preached to the Gentiles which was preached to the Jews. And those who do not understand the joint relation Jews and Gentiles sustain to one common salvation, fail to see the fellowship of that mystery, which for ages past had been hid in God, but which was revealed by Christ through his holy apostles. In the revelation of this mystery is made known the manifold wisdom of God, which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord. How any persons, with such evidence before them, can believe that the Jews have any peculiar or exclusive rights or privileges, in this dispensation, above the Gentile, I cannot conceive. They are all one body, and joint heirs of the same promises. But we will go one step further, and affirm that on account of the unbelief of the Jews the Gentiles will supersede them, and occupy the same position the Jews would occupy had they not rejected their Messiah. Thus, the Gentiles as a class are more favored than the Jews. According to the Great Teacher, this dispensation is emphatically the times of the Gentiles, during which the Jews as a people were to be trodden under foot. Luke xxi. 24; Rev. xi. 2.

The apostle compares the Israelites to a tame olive tree, and the Gentiles to a wild olive tree. Rom. ii. 17. Because of unbelief, some of the branches of the tame olive tree were broken off, and through faith, some of the branches of the wild olive tree were grafted into their place, and are partakers of the root and fatness of the tame olive tree.

It is claimed by this grafting process, contrary to nature, in which the branches bear the fruit of the root, that believing Gentiles become Jews. This would be true if they had been grafted into an Israelitish tree. Abraham (not Jacob) was the root. Abraham was the root of Christ. He was the father and Christ was his seed or son. Gal. iii. 16.

The whole Abrahamic family composed of Jew and Gentile, with Christ as the elder brother, are the seed of Abraham, or the branches of the tame olive tree, or the old Abrahamic root. Paul declares that Christ was the seed or branch of Abraham, to whom the promise was made. Gal. iii. 16. Then referring to the status of the great Abrahamic family, he declares that there is neither Jew nor Gentile; but that they are all one in Christ Jesus. Having thus affirmed the unity of all the branches, including Christ as the central branch, he deduces the following legitimate conclusion: "And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." Gal. iii. 16, 26, 29. And that Abraham might be the father of both Jew (including Christ) and Gentile, or the circumcision or uncircumcision, the promise was made to him and his seed before he was circumcised. And that the offers of salvation embrace all the Gentiles as well as all the Jews, is clearly evident from the apostles reasoning in reference to the natural branches and the wild olive branch.

1. He affirms that through the fall of the Jews salvation came to the Gentiles. ver. 2.

2. He affirms that the fall of the Jews was the means of reconciling the Gentile world. ver. 1.

3. That through their fall great riches were offered the Gentile. ver. 12.

4. Being called to preach to the Gentiles, he was the apostle of the Gentiles, and magnified his office by offering them the same terms of salvation, reconciliation, and riches which he had offered the Jews. vers. 12–13.

5. That the whole Gentile world were embraced in the grand mission of reconciliation committed to the great apostle of the Gentiles. ver. 14–15.

6. That the Gentiles must not boast over the misfortunes of the Jews, lest not appreciating the responsibilities of their exalted position, they, too, shall be severed from the tame olive tree, or the Abrahamic family. vers. 19–21.

7. That in severing the natural branches, and grafting in their place the wild olive branch, both the goodness and severity of God were manifested—goodness to the Gentiles and severity to the Jews—goodness in saving one, and severity in punishing the other. But he warns the Gentiles to beware, lest having neglected these exalted privileges they shall fall through unbelief. vers. 21, 22, 23.

8. That this dispensation is peculiarly the times of the Gentiles. ver. 25.

9. He closes with the following triumphant exclamation, "O the depths of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God; how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out. For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor? Or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again? For of him, and through him, and to him are all things: to whom be glory forever. Amen." J. M. S.

A New Argument for the Immortality of the Soul.

It is no uncommon thing to build up a theory and try to bend the Bible to it, and substantiate said theory by isolated passages, but here is something that is an improvement upon that plan, since it does not even attempt to make God's Word responsible for the delusion only in a round about way.

I was as much surprised, as I was amused at the ingenuity of a sermon I listened to recently. The Association of the Congregational churches of the Northwest, convened here last week, and it was published in the papers beforehand, that at a given hour "The Rev. J. D. Sands would deliver a discourse entitled the Bible Doctrine of the Immortality of the Soul." Of course the house was crowded, for although few are willing to listen to a "Thus saith the Lord" on the subject, they anxiously listen to anything that will help them to cling to the fundamental article of their faith, recorded in Gen. iii. 4.

He opened his remarks by saying, that when he was appointed to prepare a discourse upon that subject, he searched every author he had access to, but found nothing satisfactory, that he then turned to the Bible, and was for a time much surprised, that there were no arguments there to prove that the soul was immortal; but that he made this discovery, the Bible was written to, for, and about man; that there was no need that it should try to prove that he was immortal, for he could not be a man unless he was immortal. He said the Bible was written on this basis, and that was the reason why there was no attempt made to prove him immortal. He said, "Taking this for a basis, everything is easily comprehended, (Gen. ii. 7; iii. 20) which might otherwise seem unsurmountable obstacles, are thus easily understood. He was a man, therefore immortal; immortality cannot become extinct, can never cease to live, therefore God must have referred to the circumstances of life, and not to the duration of it." He then read a great deal of Greek, to tell about the "cut off immortality," "the doom of bad angels and wicked men," and said "cut off immortality must be one phase of life, since it was threatened to an immortal being."

There was a great deal of Greek mixed up with the discourse, that the majority of us could not comprehend; but this seemed the sum total of the English part of the argument: God made man—the word man is synonymous with immortal—he could not be a man unless he was immortal—because he was a man he was necessarily immortal—as he was immortal he could never cease to exist, therefore, the immortality of the soul is axiomatic and needs no Bible argument to prove it—that death means life is also an axiom.

Surely these are trying times to God's children, and there is no safety only in clinging close to God's Word, and accepting it as an expression of eternal truth given by a kind Father for our benefit.

The Prayer of Sinners.

Does God hear the prayer of sinners? If not, how can a sinner be justified in calling upon God in prayer? This, I think, is a pertinent question, one which is worthy of careful study and reflection, and more especially so when we hear D. D. calling upon the mass of mankind to come forward to the mourner's bench to pray, and to be prayed for.

Now in John ix. 31, we read: "Now we know that God heareth not sinners." Again in Psa. xvi. 18. "If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me." Again in Prov. xv. 29. "The Lord is far from the wicked but he heareth the prayer of the righteous."

Now from the foregoing it is clearly to be seen that God "does not" "will not" hear, but is far from the sinner or wicked. And yet we hear from the "pulpit and press" in answer to the question, "What shall I do to be saved." "Pray, brother, pray." Yes they will quote, "Ask and ye shall receive," etc. Now in all candor, we ask: Is there any "order or rule" laid down in the Word of God, to govern our actions in this case? If so, what is it? and let us be governed thereby. Now turn to Rom. x. 13–17. In the 17th verse we read, "So then faith cometh by hearing and hearing by the word of God." Again to Mark xvi. 15, 16. The commission. "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature he that believeth and is baptized (see the conjunction) shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned." Again, when Paul went to Rome, he says in Rom. i. 15, 16. "So much as in me is, I am ready to preach the gospel to you that are at Rome also, for I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation unto every one that believeth: to the Jew first, and also to the Greek" (Gentile) From the foregoing we learn, that first in order, is hearing, second, is believing the thing heard; third, being baptized into the obedience of faith. Again, "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ." Gal. iii. 27. "And if ye be Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise." 29th verse. Now, then in this attitude, the sinner has changed his relationship from sin, the world, and the adversary unto an "heir of the promises;" a member of "God's family;" and then he can "ask of the Father, his Father and receive," "if he asks not amiss."

Now if, as the apostle says in Eph. iv. 4–6, There is one body and one spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all and in you all." We ask, Is not this the order of calling, this the faith and baptism required of us all? And furthermore, if the foregoing is true, is it not doing in another way from God's way, "the way the mass of mankind are doing?" "Sanctify us through thy truth, O, God, for thy word is truth." Yours for Truth,

JOHN SISSONS.

Jesus Christ.

No man, my dear brethren—no matter whether he be a disbeliever or a skeptic concerning the divine nature of Jesus Christ—no man can deny that it is the first name in the history of the human race; that it is above all names. We should consider the revolution which Christianity effected upon this earth; we should remember that in the stable of Bethlehem was born, not only Jesus of Nazareth, but a new civilization—a civilization that has advanced art and literature in every department, and elevated the human race from the depths of moral degradation; we should remember that civilization was born there, and that it went from him, when poverty was thought a disgrace. He brought royalty and wealth to his feet, and the wise came to adore him. He elevated poverty until, instead of being a disgrace, it became a benediction. He elevated the human race. He effected the most marvelous changes which have taken place upon the face of the earth; and no man, either an unbeliever or a skeptic, can question this as a historical fact. By his power, and by his individual character; by the impress he left upon human institutions; by preaching his name to every land, this marvelous revolution was effected. Look at that character! It stands unique. There is nothing like it in the history of our race. Peerless and alone Jesus stands. He had no model in antiquity, and he has had no perfect imitator since his day. For nearly 2,000 years saints and sages have modeled their characters after that of Jesus Christ, and we have yet to see another Christ. Not-tought in Grecian or Roman philosophy, he soared above all philosophers. In the sermon on the mount of beatitudes, and in the marvelous sermon of deeds upon the mount of crucifixion. Who was he? What manner of man, this marvelous Being, with none like him, who lives to-day, after nearly 2,000 years? Who lives in thousands of human hearts who are prepared to pour out their life's blood for him?

Asleep in Jesus.

I have not the faculty to tell the weather. I could not have told yesterday that this would be a day of cloud and darkness. I can never tell by the setting of the sun whether there will be a drouth or not. I cannot tell by the blowing of the wind whether it will be fair weather or foul on the morrow. But I can prophesy, and I will prophesy, what weather it will be when you, the Christian, come to die. You may have it very rough now. It may be this week one annoyance, the next week another annoyance. It may be this year one bereavement, the next year another bereavement. Before this year has passed, you may have to beg for bread, or ask for a scuttle of coal, or a pair of shoes; but even if you have to spread your death-couch amid the leaves of the forest, or make it out of the straw of a pauper's hut, the wolf in the jungle, howling close by, or inexorable creditors jerking the pillow from under your dying head, and though there may be no hand to close your eyes, no breast on which to rest your dying head, and no candle to light the night, the odor of God's hanging gardens will regale your soul. No more rents to pay, no more agony, because provisions have risen in price, no more struggle with "the world, the flesh, and the devil;" but peace—long, deep, everlasting peace

"Asleep in Jesus, blessed sleep,
From which none ever wake to weep;
A calm and undisturbed repose,
Unbiased by the lust of foes.

Asleep in Jesus, far from thee
Thy kindred and their graves may be;
But there is still a blessed sleep,
From which none ever wake to weep."

The World to Come.

A varied scene is human life
Where pleasures flee away:
But there's a promised Land in view,
Where pleasures never decay.

There is a world that is to come,
In which we'll know no pain;
A holy, calm, and sweet abode,
Where Jesus Christ shall reign.

In that fair land of perfect bliss,
Our joys will be complete;—
With all the loved ones gathered there,
We'll worship at his feet.

There in a grand harmonious strain
Our Savior we'll adore;
And praise his name eternally
Upon the new earth's shore.

'Mid fadeless bowers of Paradise
Our joyful feet shall tread;
We'll walk the city's golden streets
With Christ our living head.

O land of rest, what rapturous thoughts
Inspire our hearts that fail!—
It is the hope of endless life
Anchored within the vail.

Correspondence.

DEAR BRETHREN IN CHRIST:—I will endeavor to state here that I am one of those who are still looking for the personal return of the Lord Jesus, anointed to raise the dead, change the living, and to set up his everlasting kingdom on earth, whose coming I think cannot be very far distant in the future. I am daily watching for some more of the signs that precede and mark his advent, among which is, the resettlement of the Jews in Jerusalem and Palestine, under some acknowledged head or Messiah of their own choice, who will claim their allegiance, and be their protector (self-styled); under whom they will practice the old rites and ceremonies. He will be the prince of the covenant of Dan. xi. 22.

I am one of those who believe that the true church, or waiting ones, will know it prior to his coming, as Noah was fore-warned.

There are many that think, because the Savior said, "Of that day and hour knoweth no man," (present tense) that no man would ever know, until like a lightning flash he came upon them. Thus he will not come to the waiting ones, but to the world. See 1 Thess. v; Dan. xii. 10.

It behooves us to labor the more fervently and watch the closer for Jesus, as we see the day approaching. The signs of the times indicate that glorious epoch near at hand. Look at Turkey and the false prophet; look at the prisoner in the Vatican, or the woman, whose name is "Mystery, Babylon the Great," etc., and her supporters. Also the self-assurance that the whole world has of peace: "When they shall say peace and safety, then cometh sudden destruction upon them."

Oh, let us be prepared; we feel in an isolated condition here, and lack that enjoyment which the called of God should enjoy, for want of the company of those that are called and true and faithful. We are very poor in the things of this world, and for that which we proclaim to be the truth we have the finger of scorn pointed at us; yet we would pray and beseech our Father in heaven that his grace may be sufficient for us in all our trials.

If any preaching brother could come this way he would be very welcome, and we could procure a hall for him to preach in.

Anxiously waiting for the Redeemer and his kingdom, I subscribe myself,

J. M. PIKE.

Dear brethren of the like precious faith.

I will give you a brief sketch of my meetings for the past three weeks. I left home the third day of the present month, for Bro. Messimore's; found the brethren all well; held meetings over two Sundays with good interest manifested all the time; and some almost persuaded to be Christians, and who, I think, will obey some time in the future. I held meeting in one new place; and although the roads were bad there was a good gathering all the time. I think there was some good done during the meeting, and the brethren encouraged to go on the way rejoicing. I visit them again some time in April, and preach the Word.

From there I went to Wabash county, at the request of Bro. Beele, and held meeting in Laketon. Gave eleven discourses. Bro. Beele came to my meeting at Bro. Messimore's, and wanted me to visit Laketon, and I promised to go. He had the promise of the United Brethren meeting house. I was to preach there one week, and he visited their meeting and had the meeting given out; and they concluded to hold the house the first night; but the lady that was holding meeting, gave me the house, and I preached on the subject of the parables of God. The house was well filled, and when I closed I asked for the house to continue over the next Sunday, and, after much delay, and consultation, one of the leading members arose and remarked that they had concluded that the brother could have the house for that length of time. So I gave out my appointments accordingly, but the next morning Bro. Beele got word that they had finally concluded not to let us have the house, but I could hold meeting that night as the appointment was out. So I preached a discourse on the covenants of promise. Then moved our meeting to the Christian meeting house, about one-half a mile from the town, and we had some of the best of the citizens out all the time; men and women that think for themselves. I visit them again the first Sunday in April; meeting to commence on Friday night before. I think there can be something done there by more preaching. Brother and sister Beele settled there in the fall. They came from Michigan; and the brother asks me to say through the RESTITUTION that he wants our traveling brethren, when passing through, to call and preach for them. The brother is awake to the truth. May God bless them and save them in the kingdom.

J. S. HATCH.

DEAR BROTHER:—A late response is doubtless better than none. I have been ill or should have written at once.

Your kindness is more than I could wish for. God bless you! However, since you will not let me do without the paper, I shall not permit you to pay for it, but will endeavor to send my remittance between now and May, if God spares my life. I am an invalid—have been ill nearly two years. Had it not been for this, you and I would doubtless have been better acquainted through the columns of our good paper. I often long to take my pen again, and cast in my mite, and let the brothers and sisters know that it is not from indifferent feelings that I am silent; but the cares which are necessarily mine, and the sufferings of my body, are too much to permit me to write but little; but I trust the time may come when I can.

No, brother, I am not poor. No one can be poor who is heir to such an inheritance as mine;—whose Father and Elder Brother are kings,—the dome of whose palace is hung with myriads of the rarest gems, and whose carpets are richer than the choicest productions of art, studded here and there with precious jewels, such as Solomon's in all his glory and rich apparel, could not compare, and how abundantly has the Father's hand bestowed them.

Such plains, such streams, such fountains, and wondrous grottos! Majestic mountains, hills and valleys, all covered with verdure and adorned as only His hand can adorn them. And through this palace I can roam at will; my eyes can feast on the sparkling gems above, and gaze on the beauties of all its spacious apartments; I can bathe my weary brow in the crystal streams, and quench my thirst from its sparkling fountains; my feet can press the mossy carpet and pluck the rarest jewels at will. And I can wear a crown more rich and rare than those the proudest monarchs wear. And, though this palace is so rich and beautiful now, it is not what it shall be. I dare not think of its royal splendor, when I shall come to my inheritance.

No, not poor, though often without means, and sometimes without bread. But yesterday I gave a loaf to Christ, for has He not said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto me." I wonder we do not think of this oftener. Surely many little helpless children would not go supperless to bed, and Christ would not have so many loaves; and if we buttered them sometimes, I do not think it would be amiss.

No, not poor! I have the bread of life ever at hand, a pearl beyond all price. I have a heart to feel for the wants and woes of others; a nature to appreciate all the bounteous gifts of the Great Creator. And though I can scarcely go beyond my gates, I need not withhold the loaf, or the cup of cold water, or words of cheer; and if you were to look into my yard in summer, and see the beautiful flowers, penciled by the hand of God, you would think I was indeed rich.

Please pardon for so long a letter, and accept my thanks for your kindness. Be sure I shall repay. Yours in earnest hope that the time will soon come when flowe s will never fade.

Gleanings.

PREPARED BY O. M. MYERS.

Bro. John Foore, of Galesburg, Neosho county, Kansas, writes that at his last visit to Lightning Creek, Crawford county, he immersed me more into the Christ. He reports that there has been from one to five added at each visit there for the past several months. At his last visit he attended to the funeral of Sister Smith, deceased wife of Bro. James Smith, near Girard. Her age was 50 years. Her faith in the resurrection and the coming Kingdom, with Jesus as King, was strong to the end. Her last exhortations to her husband and children were to live faithful and obedient to Christ and his commands.

Bro. F. M. Clifton, of Willow Springs, Taylor county, Nebraska, writes:

Since I last wrote to you, I have held several meetings on Cedar, which have resulted in sixteen embracing the truth. At my last meeting there, I met in discussion a Covenanter. Our discussion was relative to the continuance of the Mosaical law; he affirming that it is still in force, and I denying. At the close of the discussion, he acknowledged before the congregation that he had failed to sustain his proposition; and also, with uplifted hands, the congregation sustained the acknowledgment.

I have also visited Cloud, Clay, and Republic counties, in Kansas, where several embraced the truth. In Cloud county I met with Bro. Clover. In these visits I have passed over a large field where labor is needed; but the laborers are few. I find that the masses are ready to hear as long as they are fed with milk, but that as yet they are not prepared for strong food, and are somewhat dissatisfied with regular rations of that kind.

Here at Willow Springs, we have a congregation of twelve members, and a good prospect for many more. I shall do all I can to spread the truth in its purity wherever I go. You shall hear from me soon upon the coming of Christ and the Millennium, as I believe the time near at hand. Yours in the faith.

Bro. Wm. S. Knight, formerly of Indiana, now of Erie, Neosho county, Kansas, writes:

We have a very fair church at the Grady school house, four miles north of us, of twenty-five members. They are in good working order, and meet every two weeks to worship. Several of the neighbors are anxious to find out what the truth is, and will, I believe, shortly obey.

Under date of February 20th, 1876, brother J. S. Lawver, of Columbus, writes: "Bro. Myers, I wish you, or some one prepared to do so, would write an article, or two, on the subject of 'prayer,' as I am not clear on that point.

I expect to work with Bro. Sanford, at Anna, Ill., as soon as I get there, in April.

I have sold out here, (that is in my business), but my family will stay in Columbus.

I came near losing all the faith that I ever had, through the confusion of the sects and their uncharitableness to those who dared to investigate and try to harmonize God's truth. Now I am ready to give up all for the truth, and be despised all my days; and prefer it rather than be compelled to give up my privileges of seeking for truth, and talking it."

From Myers P. O., Howard Co., Mo., Bro. Paris Dougherty writes: "Bro. Myers, I have the pleasure of saying that I am the one who taught you your alphabet, some thirty-two or thirty-three years ago, when you was only four or five years of age. But now to my subject.

I happened, through a friend, to get a look into two or three RESTITUTIONS, and now, brother, you know the school in which I was taught. I have been a reader of the word of God for fifty years, and latterly have not seen where the soul returns to God when the breath leaves the body. Th's may seem curious doctrine for one schooled for twenty-five years in the Baptist Church, but let God's word be true and all men are liars. The more I read the RESTITUTION the better I like it. It is sought by many reflecting minds, and all admit its deep thoughts, and the power with which it masters its subjects. My belief, if I have any you will find in the creed by Hoyt.

Miss Smiley's Bible services in Cleveland have been attended by large numbers, and her influence has been felt in nearly all the churches. This lady, it appears, is a native of Vassalboro, Maine, and it also appears that some generous friend has built her a cottage at Saratoga, and enabled her to give her time and strength to her labor of love without let or hindrance.

Sympathy for the Erring.

Of how much of our indignation against even a deliberate wrong would we be disarmed, if we could know for ourselves a tithe of all the sorrow, and trouble, and disappointment the poor erring heart had passed through! What efforts are made in youth to stand up against the pressure of the world, and how, when failen, from miscalculation, or an over confiding nature, or want of tact, it bravely rose up and tried again: and when hard necessity came and drove it to the wall, how it looked around for help, and waited, still striving to stand upright, and fell while striving; and even when fallen, how it yearned for one more chance to rise and be a man: how loth at last to give up all for lost! could we but see a thousandth part of these struggles, as they rend our brother's bosom, and almost break his heart, how should it disarm us of our vindictiveness, and incline us even, to run to him, and raise him up, and stand by him, and with god-like forgiveness bid him, "Try, try again!"—Arthur's Magazine.

The Death and Burial of a Father in Israel.

In Frederick county, Va. our much esteemed old brother, Felix Good, fell asleep on the 27th, and was buried on the 29th of September, 1875, in the good old age of 81 years and 27 days.

The writer endeavored to make a Scriptural disposition of the occasion, which was a very serious and interesting one. In considering my acquaintance with the deceased, I could not but represent him to the large and respectful audience as a patriarch of the day. Such was the similarity of his character to that of the father of the faithful, that I read the account of Abraham buying the field from the sons of Heth, in which is the cave of Machpelah, in which he buried Sarah his wife, and in which Isaac and Ishmael buried him. Gen. xxiii. 15; xxv. 8.

I also cited the death o Isaac, who was buried by his sons, Esau and Jacob. I then brought in Job, too, as an witness to prove that that was all of it, for the present, and they, with the loved one being thus disposed of, would dwell in the grav , or in their graves,—the house appointed for all living,—until their change come, under a constitution of things to never die, and that we now live under a constitution of things to die.

I showed . . : Cor. xv. and the vision of the valley of dry bones, in Ezekiel xxxv. how the righteous dead, according to the order of God, will live again, without having an immortal soul to go above the skies at death and then come back and get in the body again in order to live forever; that instead of this Platonic conceit, they will live again precisely as they did in the first place, which was, and is, by breathing the breath of air; but with this difference—that we now live under the decree of God, the great Judge, to die; but in the resurrection state we shall never die.

To him that overcometh, on such the second death hath no power.

To prove the first proposition read Genesis ii. 7. When "God formed man of the dust of the ground, he breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul," he did not put his image in the man, but the whole man was made in the image of God, Gen. i. 27.

As proof of the second proposition, I read the vision in which we have the manner in which the dead will be raised, and made to live again; that bones will come together, bone to his bone; then sinews, then skin, and then what next? "Then said he unto me, Prophesy unto the wind, prophesy, son of man, and say to the wind, Thus saith the Lord God: Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live."

In the sun of the discourse, I dwelt on the time when the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and all upon the throne of his glory, and when before him will be gathered all nations, and in citing the passage, "I was a stranger, and ye took me not in," we were led to consider the circumstances under which I first became acquainted with the subject of the obituary, and also the adaptedness alluded to above.

About 10 years ago, having left all for the kingdom of God, I visited his community and preached the gospel as I then understood it. At the same time there arose no small stir about that way. Some cried one thing, and some another, for the assembly was confused. But some believed, he being one of the number, and he invited me home with him. From that time until the day of his death, he and his family have proved truly to be a pillar and ground of the truth; and being one of the noblest of the race, which he showed in all his manners, and manifested in his sentiments and feelings. He hated a little thing, as the Psalmist says, he hated every false way. Owing to the source persisted in by those who knew not what they did, he became disgusted, and fully determined to leave, in his own language, no lot or part with them, and provided a place in his field, which he had bought with a sum of money, where he might bury his dead out of his sight. There he buried his wife, Rachel, "Mother," as he called her, who, like Sarah, Abraham's wife, was faithful in all things, reverencing her husband in the fear of the Lord, and a firm believer in the truth as she understood it.

Then I proclaimed that the old soldier, like the holy one of old, was not only determined to be separate from the wicked in life, but also in death.

Then, passing over 1 Cor. xv., with its connection, by which I proved for the consolation of the bereaved family, who all have families and are worthy citizens, most of whom are believers, that the sleeping saints, as we sang on the occasion, were not lost, but only at rest,

"On Zion's hill we soon shall see
Our friends among the loved and blest.
Then let our song forever be,
They are not lost, but only rest."

Then at the grave, as the last farewell charge, in behalf of the dear old father to his children, I read 1 Thess. iv., calling their attention to the 11th and 12th verses, reminding all around who knew him that they were words which embraced the very joy of his life. They read as follows:

"And that ye study to be quiet, and to do your own business, and to work with your own hands, as we commanded you; that ye may walk honestly toward them that are without, and that ye may have lack of nothing."

Then the remainder of the chapter was read to show how the inspired apostles consoled the living saints with regard to those of their brethren who fell asleep in their day:

"But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them which are asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore, comfort one another with these words."

This concluded the service, with an appropriate hymn, and a short prayer in which all for whom we must pray were commended to God and the word of his grace, which is able to build us up and give us an inheritance among them which are sanctified.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

I have been requested to publish, through the RESTITUTION, a meeting of days, to commence on Friday be- re the first Sunday in April, at 2 o'clock, p. m., at the South school house. The request is made by Bro. and Sister Akes and acceptorarily dispersed neighbors. On account of bad times we have only been able to do very little in this direction for the past year. And we are not yet able to do for our brethren as we would like, and hesitate to request their labor; when we know that it is with a dearly that they get along. But we ask them to help at this time. We have the promise of some from above from these good neighbors; but how many may be able to give, I cannot say. A number have expressed a desire that Bro. J. C. Kinser, John Foore and J. W. Green should attend. We invite all to come who can. All coming by the A. T. & S. F. R. R. will stop at Valley Falls. Come on Friday, if possible. Those reaching later will inquire for my house at R. Beck's drug store. The meeting is designed to continue one week or more; and the design is to hold up the truth. Let those come who can and pray with do our best. Can say no help to Bro. T. E. Adams, so that he can be with us to assist in singing "Home, Sweet Home," etc?

We submit the matter to the brethren to care, hoping to be able to stand in the gap at day. Amen.

THE AMERICAN CYCLOPEDIA.

A Comprehensive Library in Itself.

A Great National Enterprise in which every American may Take Pride.

Published by D. APPLETON & CO., 549, 551, Broadway, N. Y.

The Cyclopedia, now in course of publication, is entirely rewritten, and appears with about 4,000 maps and illustrations. To be completed in sixteen volumes of 800 pages each. Fourteen volumes now ready.

In the experience of book making and selling, this work is without a parallel. With the multiplication of steam presses, the publishers are still unable to meet the demand.

The sale has already reached over 300,000 volumes, and this in the present times! The demand for the work is but fairly commenced; the orders are largely multiplying and the number during the last six months of the work for 1876 will greatly surpass those of the previous year.

Thus the most sanguine expectations of the publishers are more than realized.

The publishers desire to repeat to the public that no expense has been spared in the writing, editing, or publishing departments of the American Cyclopedia.

The cost will be more than $300,000 to prepare the sixteen volumes for the press.

Let It Pass.

Be not swift to take offense,
Let it pass;
Anger is a fire to sear,—
Let it pass;—
Brood not darkly o'er a wrong,
Which will disappear ere long:
Brother, sing this cheery song,
Let it pass,
Let it pass.

Strife extracts the sweetest mind,—
Let it pass;
As the unregarded wind
Let it pass:
Any vulgar souls that live
May condemn without reprieve;
'Tis the noble who forgive;—
Let it pass,
Let it pass.

Echo not an angry word,
Let it pass;
Think how often you have erred.
Let it pass:
Since our joys must pass away
Like the dew drops on the spray,
Where fore should our sorrow stay?
Let them pass,
Let them pass.

If for good you're taken ill
Let it pass;
O, be kind and gentle still,
Let it pass;
Time at last makes all things straight
Let us not resist but wait,
And our triumph shall be great;
Let it pass,
Let it pass.

Bid your anger to depart,
Let it pass,
Say the ve bonely words to heart,
Let it pass:
Father, not the giddy throng,
Better to be wronged than wrong:
Therefore sing this cheery song,
Let it pass,
Let it pass.

Form of Sound Words—2 Tim. i. 13.

Gospel truth in gospel words. Language is the medium of thought. We think by means of words. A German thinks in German, a Frenchman thinks in French, an Englishmen in English, a Grecian in Greek, a Jew in Hebrew. The Holy Spirit communicated his thought in Hebrew and Greek. If the medium and the eye be perfect, the thought will appear as it is. If either be faulty, the thought will be more or less distorted.

Defects in the optic nerve, or motes in the eye affect the image on the retina. The eyes may be faultless, yet the medium (as air, glass, water, or any transparent substance), may be defective. In all such cases the views are imperfect. Things do not appear as they really are.

If the Holy Spirit had used an English medium through which to convey his thoughts, we Englishmen that have perfect eyes could see his thoughts as they are so far as the medium would allow.

His ideas, however, are in Hebrew and Greek, and must be seen through those mediums. Persons, therefore, that are unable to see through those mediums must depend upon others to see for them.

If the eyes of those men that see for us (our translators of Scripture) had been perfect, and the mediums used by them faultless as the originals, we should suffer no inconvenience. But their ideas may be faulty in three particulars.

1st. Ideas not correctly translated by words used. 2nd. New words. 3rd. Words not translated, but transferred. An exact translation of Hebrew or Greek words where the original idea is perfectly seen, is as truly the thought of the Holy Spirit as is that thought though seen through a Hebrew or Greek medium.

The nature of an object remains the same, though the eye or medium through which it is seen may be very defective.

The meaning of Paul's instructions to Timothy seems to be the following: I have made you a very valuable deposit—the doctrines of the gospel. I have given them to you in sound words conveying the ideas taught me by the Holy Spirit. In dealing out those ideas (doctrines) to others—do not use the high sounding words of Greek philosophers; but, as far as possible use my words. When you proclaim the gospel use my words or their equivalents.

The Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost conveyed his instructions through 17 different mediums. This was an extraordinary communication, and no translation was required.

The general proposition is this.—Bible ideas, or doctrines must be expressed in Bible words or their equivalents.

Christ was mighty in word and in deed. His words were expressed in Greek, and his acts were described in Greek.

Those doctrines are seen by us through an English medium, and his acts also. If, therefore, the medium, and the eye be faulty the ideas and actions will be more or less distorted.

With these introductory ideas before us, we direct the reader's attention to one act, named in the New Testament Christ himself first submitted to the act, and commanded his apostles to require all believers in his name in all nations to submit to the same. The name of the act is baptizo. The action to which Christ submitted is called by the word baptisthe in Matt. iii. 16, ekbainein in Mark i. 9; and diatribesthai in Luke iii. 21. In John's conversation with Christ and his answer, no other word is applied to the act except one from the Greek verb baptizo. It is the word used by John in all places where he performs or refers to the act. He was called "baptizing Baptizarin" Matt. iii. 1. Neither John nor Christ seemed to think any other a sound word to express that act, or if they did, why not use some other word? Variety is better when the same idea is expressed I do not say what the act was, but have simply given the name which Christ and John used when the act was performed.

Peter performed the same act. In Acts ii. 38, it is called baptizetho and in verse 41 ebaptisthesan Uniformly the same word.

Philip performed the same act. In Acts viii. 12, it is called ebaptizonto verse 38 ebaptisen

Ananias is called upon to perform the same act. Acts ix. 18 ebaptisthe

Acts xxii. 16. baptison Christ, John, Peter and Ananias did not seem to know any other word expressive of the act.

Paul uses the same speech for the act though he was very particular to have Timothy use his words—a strong proof that Paul thought that the words suited express the act ebaptisthemen. Rom. vi. 3. ebaptisthemen. 1 Cor. i. 13, 14. ebaptisa Verse 15. ebaptisa. Verse 16. ebaptisen. Verse 17. baptizein. 1 Cor. x. 2. ebaptisanto. Gal. iii. 27. ebaptisthete. The act is named in seventy-five places in the New Testament; and in every verse, the verb baptizo, in some of its voices, moods and tenses, is used; and no other word is used to express the act—whatever the act might be.

The act is called baptisma in twenty-two places, and in Col. ii. 12 it is connected with the verb thapto, used in eleven places, and always translated "buried."

In the commission, Matt. xxviii. 19, the act is commanded, and the word expressing the act is the same. The apostles, during the establishment of the church, used this word, and only this to describe the act.

Two other New Testament and Old Testament acts are named in the Greek New Testament.

Each act has its appropriate Greek word.

The first act is named in Heb. ix. 13, 19, 21; x. 22. Greek words—parrainon. rhantizon, twice. rhantizousa—from the verb rantizo—always translated sprinkle. The act is called, in 1 Peter i. 2, parrasmou, and in Heb. xii. 24, rantismon—noun, act of sprinkling

The second act is named in Matt. ix. 17. Mark xxii. 2. The Greek word expressive of the pouring out of the wine is ekchuno, from the Greek verb kucho.

John ii. 15. Poured out money.

Acts ii. 17, 18, 33, refers to the pouring out of the spirit.

Acts xxii. 20, refers to the pouring out of Stephen's blood.

Rom. iii. 15. Shedding of blood, or pouring out of the same.

Titus iii. 6. Pouring out of the spirit.

Rev. xvi. 1-3, 8, 10, 12, 17. Pouring out of the vials.

We have now examined three acts expressed by three Greek words.

The apostles never performed but one of those acts, and used only one of the words to express that act. This fact being clearly established in God's Word, let us examine the practices of modern apostolic successors, relative to the first of the three acts, that we may learn whether they use the "form of sound words."

They profess to carry with them the valuable deposit of the Gospel, and are therefore commanded to use the form of sound words.

We may divide the ministers (professed ministers) of the commission into four classes:

1. Those who initiate persons into their church without the use of water.

2. Three classes use water in three ways: (1) Those who take a bowl of water into the church, and dipping the thumb and three fingers, pick up some water and putting it to the penitent's forehead, say I baptize (ebaptizo) thee in the name of the Father, &c. (2) Those who lead the penitents to a brook or stream, and either kneeling or standing, dip up some water in the bowl and pour its contents on the heads of the persons, using the same words as above. Do the words they use express the acts they perform? Each of those acts has a word suited to its nature. (3) The third class lead the penitent to some stream or body of water; and going into the water until sufficiently deep to bury, they bury the persons or cover them wholly by the water, using about the same form of words as above. Which of these classes suits the words to the act?

Of the three classes using water the first class baptize their thumb and three fingers and sanctize the penitent; the second class baptize the bowl and sprinkle the penitent; the third baptize the penitent. In a word, the first baptize their thumb and fingers, the second the bowl, and the third the penitent. Sprinkle and pour are translated. but baptize is not translated—a Greek word with the last letter committed.

The word sprinkle is the English of the Greek word rantizo, and pour out the equivalent of the word ekcheo. The English equivalent of baptizo is not baptize but immerse.

If the first two classes should use the translation or equivalent instead of the Greek word to represent their acts, every one would say—Suit your words to your actions. Some other words may be examined in future articles.

J. P. WEETHEE.

The Second Death and How to Escape It.

He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches. He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death.—Rev. ii. 11.

In the 8th verse he gives the address to the angel of the church in Smyrna. "These things saith the first and the last, which was dead and is alive, I know thy works and tribulation, etc." "Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life." The message concerning the second death, is very important, because all who have an ear to hear, are called upon to hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches. Because, also, the escape from the second death is presented as a motive to those whom the devil wanted cast into prison, to be tried, to induce them to overcome in the terrible fight with the devil and their wicked human persecutors; and this motive is presented by them "who was dead and is alive," after His ascension to heaven.

The second death motive was given in addition to the promised crown of life, and all other motives embodied in what "the Spirit said to the churches." I need not say that the churches now, and all others, need this same motive power, as well as then, to enable them to overcome a wicked world. The second death will not operate on the minds of men, as a warning, unless they know what it means. If they are told it means endless misery in hell, they cannot reconcile it with the declared love of God. If, on the other hand, they are made to believe that it is a figurative death, its motive influence to persuade them to overcome the world is entirely lost. In this view of the case, the question, is the second death literal or figurative, is of considerable importance. We must not assume that it is figurative, because the book of Revelation has many figures and symbols, else all literal statements would be excluded. It is not proved that the wages of sin is moral death, because death is sometimes, in the Bible, used exceptionally in a figurative sense. We all believe that the promised eternal life is a literal endless life in the glorious future. Life and death are used literally in this connection. Jesus says, I am He that was dead. His was a literal death. "Be faithful unto death," He said, "and I will give thee a crown of life." He most assuredly means a literal death and life, in this passage. Then immediately follows the announcement, "He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death." If the second death be literal, and is the future portion of the apostle, the fearful, the unbelieving, and all liars, etc, it must be preceded by a literal resurrection of these men—their judgment and condemnation.

The Savior informs us (John v. 28) that those "who have done good" shall hear his voice, and come forth from their graves to a "resurrection of life," and those "who have done evil, to a resurrection of condemnation." If the first party comes forth literally, from their graves, when called by the voice of the Son of God, to an endless life, will not the second party as literally come forth to condemnation and the second death? We must ignore the first resurrection of Rev. xx. of the "blessed and holy," or the rest of the dead will live again, when the 1000 years are finished. If the one is literal the other must be also. If we spiritualize the first resurrection, to get rid of the second death, or for any other reason, we must keep on and spiritualize the 1000 years reign with Christ of the resurrected saints, and thus be landed away back into the sky kingdom theology of the dark ages.

Why are those who have part in the first resurrection declared blessed and holy? Because, on such the second death hath no power, and because they shall reign with Christ a thousand years. If that resurrection is literal, and the millennial reign with Christ be literal, the power of the second death must be understood in a literal sense, also. In Rev. xxi. is revealed the means of the second death, and it is contrasted with the new earth inheritances of the saints. John had a bright vision of the new heavens and new earth, and new Jerusalem—of the city that had foundations whose builder and maker is God. There is to be no crying or sorrow,—no more curse or death there. The glory of God and the Lamb shines there, eclipsing the light of sun and moon. The Alpha and Omega says, "I will give unto him that is athirst of the water of life freely. He that overcometh shall inherit all things (margin these things). —all things, what made new."

We are a people who have literalized the new heavens and new earth and Jerusalem, that John saw coming down from God out of Heaven. With Peter "we look for new heavens and earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." That the immortal saints will drink the water of life in paradise restored, and live forever on the new earth. The fate of the unjust is, in the next verse, contrasted with the destiny of the redeemed. They "have their part in the lake of fire and brimstone; which is the second death." The fiery lake—the second death are as literal as the new earth and new Jerusalem. It seems to me we cannot conclude otherwise without violating the plainest laws of language. Our mission then, is not to comfort the wicked monsters of earth, who starve and torture to death their fellow creatures, because they have the power and disposition: by telling them there is no resurrection and judgment for them hereafter, and ignominious death. But the word we preach to them should be of a Judgment to come, that, like Felix of old, they may tremble in view of their doom. We should avoid the too great delusions of christendom, universalism, and endless misery, and plant our feet on the word of God. While love and hope should be presented as the great motives of the Gospel, men should be warned night and day, with tears, as Paul warned them, of a future and terrible recompense, and fiery indignation that shall devour the adversaries. "He that hath an ear to hear, let him hear what the Spirit saith to the churches." "He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death." "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power, and they shall reign with Christ a thousand years."

The Religion of Excitement and the Excitement of Religion.

In the present day we seem to have more of the religion of excitement than we have of the excitement of religion. The ancient and apostolic plan, of first enlightening the understanding, by declaring and illustrating the testimony of God, seems to be both too rational and slow for the ardent demands of the proselyting spirit of the age. Our Savior and his apostles spoke plain, good sense to the understandings of men, knowing it to be God's chartered way to the heart. Paul, teaching that "faith came by hearing," and that "hearing came by the word of God," and that as he preached so the people believed, was only anxious to declare the whole counsel of God, with its innate and cognate evidences of the divine authenticity. His preaching being first understood and then believed, he knew could not possibly fail to seize the heart with omnipotent power, and turn it to God, and Christ. Therefore, he never made an effort to excite the feelings of any audience until he had "declared to them the whole counsel of God." He threw no artificial exciting circumstances around them; he never thought of an anxious seat, nor of a mourning bench, and never called up convicted and trembling sinners to pray for them. These are all of the greenhouse or hot-bed appliances of the present day. Our mushroom Christians sometimes grow to perfection in a night, and wither in a day. They have no root in themselves. They are born in the midst of excitement, they live in the midst of excitement, and soon as it wanes, they generally sicken and die. They have no taste for religion that demands both reading and meditation as the food of its devotion, and greatly prefer those feelings which a warm exhorter can produce, to all the moral feelings, and refined and purifying sentiments and sympathies, which, the truth read and believed, and pondered in the heart, can awaken within us. They are deluded by the idea that religion is the effect, and not the cause of feeling. Religion, with them, is the fruit of excitement rather than the root and reason of it. Hence such converts display little or nothing of that constant and powerful excitement to love and to good works, which so visibly and constantly attended the profession of the faith in the New Testament age. The faith of Christ and the consequent hope and joy which simultaneously arise in the heart of a true convert, like the mainspring of a watch, or the primum mobile of any complicated machinery, set our whole frame in motion, and excite to every praiseworthy deed toward God and man. The Christian religion is, indeed, a religion of the purest, noblest, and most refined feelings and excitements of which our fallen nature is susceptible. It exerts a constant power upon all the affections and moral sensibilities of hearts; but it is itself the offspring, not of fancy, but of faith: not of excitement, but our own as being inheriters of the promises, may stand in the way not of reason: not of visions, dreams, or extraordinary impulses, but of seeing how a fulfillment of the parof the testimony of God, developed and able is possible. We have to take confirmed by the Holy Spirit. It is, in dictions as they are, and let the Lord, one word, the effect of the Christian If he will, show the fulfillment. truth believed, and not the cause of faith, for it is faith and not feeling Between 30 and 40 years ago, many that works by love, that purifies the good and true people as ever existed in heart, and that overcomes the world. the churches, took their Bibles, as SAMUEL FRANKENBERGER. lamps to their feet, and lights to their path, thinking that they had therein discovered when Jesus would come and set up his kingdom; they went forth from their places to meet him But, as the sequel proved, they were sadly disappointed. Consequently there was a giving up, and going to sleep on the time of his coming. Some have slumbered, while others have slept soundly on the subject of the Lord's coming ever since that last movement. The full particulars need not be told. but of such an earnest expectation of his coming as was manifest at that time, we have no account of before or since.

A Parable; and What There is in It.

Within the last few years much has been said concerning the parable of the ten virgins. Matt. xxv. But there is still quite a diversity of opinions concerning it. Hence arises an increasing desire to know what is truth in regard to it. An investigation that will bring out the truth seems to be needful. And while investigation is going on, persons who desire to know the truth, will listen attentively to the various views till fully satisfied what is the truth of the matter.

In the 24th chapter of Matthew, we learn that Jesus had been telling the disciples that the temple at Jerusalem would be destroyed, and what would be the sign his coming, and end of the world or age. He had been leading them along in the great outline of the then future history, step by step, down to the thickening signs—evidences of his near coming. And then, without changing the subject, he goes on at the beginning of the 25th chapter to say: Then (that is when the signs have been or are being fulfilled, that are spoken of in the 24th chapter as indications of his near coming)—"Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps and went forth to meet the bridegroom, and five of them were wise and five of them were foolish. They that were foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them. But the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps. While the bridegroom tarried they all slumbered and slept."

This parable proves conclusively that before the Lord comes, something in existence would be called the kingdom of heaven. I do not understand that the kingdom of heaven will nearly be developed before he comes; but a germ will exist which will burst forth into the greatness of the kingdom when he appears.

We did not think it out of place to use the terms Centennial exhibition, while the preparations were going on, and before the Centennial year had come, or the articles were brought together and placed on exhibition. We said Centennial exhibition because that was what it was designed to be when fully perfected.

This parable was taken from a custom then common about Palestine, for a part, or the whole of the female portion of the guests to go to meet the bridegroom while on his way to the wedding. We are not told whether ten, twenty, or one hundred, intended to be at the wedding, but that ten went forth to meet the bridegroom. Five of them were wise and five were foolish. So those who were to represent the kingdom of heaven, a little before Jesus returns, would a part of them be wise, and a part foolish, and that both wise and foolish would go forth to meet Jesus, just as the wise and foolish virgins did to meet the bridegroom.

In the ancient oriental custom, in reference to a wedding as related by the Savior, the first act of the virgins was to take their lamps and go forth to meet the bridegroom. They start out to meet the bridegroom, evidently, because they expect him at that very time. But if they had not believed in some definite time for the bridegroom to come, would they go forth expecting to meet him? certainly not. This parable sets forth expectation and disappointment.

The kingdom of heaven was to be like the virgins going to meet the bridegroom. As the virgins expect the bridegroom at a certain time, so those anticipating the fullness of the kingdom were to expect Jesus at a certain time. But in the arrangement of the parable the bridegroom did not meet the virgins at the time expected by them; so it clearly sets forth that Jesus was not to meet the germ of the future kingdom at the time it expects and goes to meet him. But what did the virgins do seeing that the bridegroom did not meet them? They all slumbered and slept while the bridegroom tarried.

We will now see if we can find in past doings a likeness to the virgins. If we cannot find in the past a likeness, or similarity, then there must be a similarity yet to come, and Jesus will not come till some notable time for his coming is passed. Does he say, then shall the kingdom of heaven be like the virgins going forth to meet the bridegroom? If he does we must conclude that he means it. And again, any prejudice that may exist in our minds, excluding all other people or

This is the view I take of the first six verses of the parable, without the aid of the visions, or new revelations. Having, as I believe, neither added to, or taken from the meaning and intent of the parable, I present it for the consideration of truth seekers.

A Question in History.

Mr. Conway in his third lecture at Allyn Hall spoke of certain great revulsions which have occurred in history from religious ideas, making, as an example, substantially this statement:—That the leading idea in the ancient Egyptian mind was, evidently, the immortality of the soul. The children of Israel in escaping from their terrible bondage experienced such a "revulsion" from all Egyptian ideas that there is not to be found in all the Hebrew scriptures a single intimation that man's soul is immortal. Will not some of our ministerial friends inform us whether in all the direct, almost personal instruction given the Hebrews, or in the wonderful spiritual writings of the Old Testament there is not contradiction of this assertion?

The belief in such immorality has been, we see, so universal, and is so intimately connected with not only our religious thought, but with all our earthly progress, that we can hardly conceive of any long sustained effort of the race without it.

Yet here was a (the) religious nation of the world lasting for centuries, full of health and vigor, producing numbers of men, models, through all time, of piety and wisdom, giving us a literature unequaled in the world, save possibly by the Greeks in the highest moment, and unapproachable in its knowledge of God, and being all this with its motive all within this life.

Possibly the learned rabbi of this city will oblige us by informing us respecting this. INQUIRER.

THE RESTITUTION,

Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means of this the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christian King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Communications.—The Editor must not be understood as endorsing all the sentiments expressed by correspondents whose articles are inserted under this head. Each writer is alone responsible for the article bearing his own signature. If the teaching of any writer is not endorsed, an article setting forth the views of the party differing may be forwarded. Free discussion of Bible doctrines on all sides will be allowed, but the Editor reserves the privilege of refusing those communications which antagonize a belief and obedience of the Gospel as a means of salvation, or which undermine its principles.

The Many Mansions.

The questions are frequently asked, what and where are the many mansions. What is the house, where is the place, and what constitutes the preparation, referred to by our Lord, in John xiv. 11. Is it a place? Rather is it not a state, or condition? Well, Jesus said, a place. The question, therefore, might be more pertinent, thus: Is that place one of distinction, or honor, as solicited for the sons of Zebedee? Place, of necessity, involves locality, and ever since—if not before—that popular hymn, "When I can read my title clear, to mansions in the skies," was written and sung,—"with spirit," too, if not with understanding, in every clime, probably, under the sun—it has been very generally believed that those mansions were, or are to be, located somewhere, indefinitely, above, and if not in the firmaments, then "beyond the bounds of time and space," in some heavenly place, "the saints secure abode," aptly and forcibly, if not elegantly, illustrated by the epitaph: "This happy soul has taken its flight, beyond the realms of bliss and light." More recently, however, the notion prevails, that they are in the heaven, whither our Lord has gone, and into which He has entered to appear in the presence of Deity for us. Acts i. 2; Heb. ix. 24; 1 Pet'r iii. 22. The latter opinion is more reasonable and consistent than the former, but unfortunately for those who hold the latter view of the subject. Jesus, in His last general and special talk to and for the instruction of His beloved disciples, just before His death, told his "little children (John xiii. 33) as He had previously told the unbelieving, unrepentant, wicked Jews." In John vii. 30, and viii. 21, that "whither He was going, thither they could not come," and in John xiv. 12, He said, "I go unto my Father." Therefore, if heaven be the place, it is not yet prepared for their reception, for Jesus had not yet "come again, to receive them unto Himself, as promised in xiv. 3. The declaration of Jesus to Peter, in ver. 36, was in reply to Peter's assertion that he would "lay down his life for Jesus' sake," and can no more be connected with the affirmation of ver. 33, than can the subsequent words of the Savior, that "the cock shall not crow, till thou hast denied me thrice." To the disciples, and unbelieving Jews, there was no specification of or limitation by time, but to Peter, place and event are qualified negatively by time present, not now; but thou shalt follow me afterwards." And truly, Peter did follow his Lord afterwards, in crucifixion; see John xxi. 18-19. To set aside the barrier of ver. 33, interposed by Jesus to the disciples, by the words to Peter, in ver. 36, is to open the heavenly gates also to those unbelieving Jews, at some indefinite future, as the words constituting "a lure," are precisely alike in both cases, and subject to the same rule of exegesis. If verses 33 and 36 could be connected, the "afterwards" of ver. 36 would not then apply to the time of dying, but to the subsequent time of His "coming again," as promised in John xiv. 3. When disciples are "to be made alive," or "changed." 1 Cor. xv. 23 and 51; John ii. 25-26; 1 Thess. iv. 16-17. It appears that His declaration, in John xiii. 33, was what troubled them, and gave rise to their sorrow.

To reassure them, and comfort their hearts, He announced to them the object, purpose, and necessity of His going away, viz.: "to prepare a place for them. But before doing this, He corrects an erroneous conception of theirs, by informing them that there were "many mansions in His Father's house," or more correctly, house-hold. They evidently thought there were but few, supposing that themselves, the twelve only, were to constitute the sum of that household, His chosen ones, exclusive. But no; there were "many to be called," though few, comparatively, were to be chosen. "If it were not so," He said, "I would have told you so." Aside from Revelation, all is conjecture, wild poetic fancy bold imagination, and of no force or account, whatever. "The secret things belong to God, but the things that are revealed belong to us, and to our children, forever." This is a Scriptural affirmation, which we not only may, but ought, are in duty bound, owe it to our God, and to ourselves, to accept, believe, and fearlessly be governed by. Every positive declaration must be.

THE HOUSE.

The first thing necessary to a correct understanding, and clear elucidation of this subject is to note the fact that "the mansions" are in, and form a constituent part of the "Father's house." The house is one. The mansions in that house are many. Undoubtedly, the "place" is for the house, or household; and more than possible will prove to be the very same place which Abraham was called into, and "was afterwards to receive for an inheritance;" when he came out of the land of the Chaldeans, looking for a city that hath everlasting foundations, leaving Mesopotamia, in quest of "a kingdom that cannot be moved." "David desired to find a tabernacle for the God of Jacob, but Solomon built him an house" * * * and Jesus, the Son of God, (John ii. 16), recognized that temple, as God's typical house; when, with a scourge of cords, he drove the buyers, sellers, and brokers, out of the temple, saying to them, "Take these things hence; make not my Father's house, an house of merchandise." That temple was a representative building, and prefigured the true house of God, mentioned in John xiv. 2. Our Father has given us no revelation concerning any other house of His, than that one represented by the tabernacle in the wilderness, and by the temple in the city of the promised land, and Paul in 1 Tim. iii. 15, positively affirms that "the house of God, is the church of the living God." * * * Hence, we read in 1 Cor. iii. 9, "Ye are God's husbandry, ye are God's building."

Writing to the church at Ephesus, He says, (John ii. 19-22) "Now therefore, ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints and are of the household of God, and are built upon the foundation of the apostles, and prophets, Jesus Christ, himself, being the chief corner stone, in whom all the building fitly framed together, groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord; in whom ye also are builded together for an habitation of God, through the spirit." Again, in 1 Cor. iii. 16, "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you, * * the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are. vi. 19, What? know ye not that your body is the temple of the holy Spirit, which is in you, which ye have received of God." So in Heb. iii. 5-6, Moses was faithful in all his house, as a servant, * * * but Christ as a son over his own house; whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence and rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end. Once more by the same witness, in 2 Cor. vi. 16, "For ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them, and I will be their God, and they shall be my people, * * * and I will receive you, (Jesus said, in John iii. 2, "unto myself, when I come again,") and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty."

"One witness more: 1 Peter ii. 5, "Ye also as living stones, are built up a spiritual house, * * * accepted to God by Jesus Christ." Now Webster defines mansion thus: "Mansion, manio, from maneo, to dwell. Primarily, any place of residence. 2. A house, a habitation. The Scriptures afford us ample proof that the church collectively, in one body, constitutes "the house of God," who is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. We, therefore, legitimately conclude that "my Father's house," of John xiv. 2, is none other than the church of God, and that "the mansions in that house" are the individual members of the church, and constitute a residence, dwelling-place, or habitation for the Spirit of God. Consequently, the mansions are not for the occupancy of believers, but they will, nevertheless, be occupied, and will all be filled with the fullness of God," immortality. But there is to be place for that house, which those mansions constitute, for God has so promised, and Jesus said the design, purpose, or object of His going away, was to prepare that place; not to prepare the mansions, but to prepare a place for you.

From Peter and Paul we learn that the pronoun "you," applied by our Lord to the disciples, in John xiv. 2, stands for "the house of God" when his disciples are collectively considered, and for the mansions in that house, when they are spoken to or of individually. Paul's language in 2 Cor. v. 1, may seem to be opposed to such construction, but the apostle refers to two houses only, and contrasts them, the "one not made with hands" is put in opposition to the other, which most assuredly was, by implication, made with hands, or there is no force, or meaning in language. True it is here but negatively implied, but in Heb. ix. 2 and 11, it is affirmatively, and positively expressed. The first,—"house of this tabernacle," refering to the church, the house of God, in its mortal, groaning, suffering, waring (tenting) state, the church of this world, and typified by the tabernacle in the wilderness, made with hands. The second, the true house of God, refering to the church in its resurrected state, completed, immortal, glorified; "the building of God not made with hands, eternal in the heavens," i. e., the house of God, the church in its fixed, final, and everlasting state, occupying "the place prepared" for it, of God through Jesus Christ, on the "new earth" (earth renewed) in "the new heavens," eternal, and abiding, which God has promised to make, the "third heavens," to which Paul, in vision, "was carried forward;" (McKnight and Scott's trans.) to which Peter refers, and of which John, in Patmos, had a glorious view. The prefix "earthly" house, is only descriptive of its "temporary" nature—"the things seen," the "heavens and the earth which are now," in their present arrangements, are "to be dissolved." The "new remain." 2 Cor. v. 1; 2 Peter iii. 7-13.

The Blessings of the Bible.

What an illustrious book is the Bible! It rises like a stream in the desert land—its source is the skies, and its fountain in the valleys of the earth. It has rolled on, century after century, enriching every land with verdure and beauty, reflecting all the glowing sky above it, diffusing "whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are of good report," around it. It shines into the casement of the window, like the light of the morning sun, and makes her heart to sing with joy, and enables her orphans to lift their eyes to the wide shore of the eternal sea, and to say: Immensity is our home; eternity is our lifetime; the mighty God that built the universe is our Father, our portion, our friend. It plants in man's heart the hope of joy, the halo of glory and immortality. It erects in man's conscience the rule of right and wrong. It is, emphatically, the standard of Christianity. Wherever that standrd is unrolled, there freedom has its noblest footing.

Singing.

It is generally, if not universally, conceded that singing is an important part of the worship of God. All religious bodies, so far as I know, practice, to some extent, singing. There are individual exceptions, it is true, while some have no faculty for singing, and can't sing, others who have, and ought to use it, seem to lack in disposition. The first class are excusable, while the latter certainly are blame-worthy. Some act in this, as in other duties, just as though it was a heavy burden, and grievous to be borne; hence we seldom hear them try to sing, pray, or anything else in this line. Brethren, this ought not so to be. Remember that these are "perilous times," and dangers gather thick and fast. "Wherefore, awake thou that sleepest," and behold the light that Christ gives. But what about singing is it a Bible requirement, and thus a Christian duty? We will see. David, the sweet singer, says, "Serve the Lord with gladness; come before His presence with singing." While Solomon, the wise man, says, "In transgression of an evil man there is a snare; but the righteous doth sing and rejoice." While Paul, our New Testament writer, enjoins the same, "Speaking to yourselves in Psalms and hymns, and spiritual songs, and making melody in your heart to the Lord; giving thanks always for all things, unto God and the Father in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ."—Eph. iv. 19-20. Hear the same teacher again: "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom; teaching and admonishing one another in Psalms and hymns, and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord."—Col. iii. 16. Paul and Silas with their feet fast in the stocks, at the hour of midnight were heard praying and singing praise unto God. And Jesus says, "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven."

Now inasmuch as singing, with other things is enjoined, by the apostles as a part of our Father's will a part of the law of the spirit of life, and a part of our duty as Christians, how can we sit down, close our mouths, and claim the promise? But then, how, and what shall we sing? Sing with the spirit, and the understanding also; or, in other words, so enlighten the understanding by reading and meditating upon God's word, that your hymns accord in sentiment with the Spirit's dictates and teachings through Christ, the apostles, and prophets. But do not all religious folks sing thus? Let us see. Many of them sing like this:

When this poor lisping, stammering tongue
Lies silent in the grave,
Then, in a nobler, sweeter song,
I'll sing Thy power to save.

How this can be I fail to see, unless living man is possessed of two or more tongues. We will see. David says, "I will sing unto the Lord as long as I live; I will sing praise to my God while I have my being."—Ps. civ. 33; cxlvi. 2. But a query for preachers and others, Is David living yet? If you say, yes, then you speak not as Peter or Paul; and if you preach thus, you do not speak as God's oracle, but as the hateful serpent spake. For a far more honorable and reliable preacher said, while under the influence of God's Holy Spirit, that David is both dead and buried. Now, inasmuch as Peter speaks the truth, David sings not without a tongue, neither can he praise while dead, for he, while living, solemnly declared that the dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence."—P. cxv. 17. See also vi. 5. Ecl. ix. 10. Now if we say the dead, here spoken of, means those who have lost life, the unconscious dead, we say the truth. But if we say the dead means the separated soul and body, then we maintain a mountain of man-made theology.

Then again, Paul in his masterly argument in behalf of the "resurrection of the dead (not the living)" locates this sweet singing subsequent to this great and glorious event. And lastly, on this point, the Beloved Revelator, like Paul, locates the singing not in death. No; but just on the other side where the saints are in fact redeemed, and taken out from among all nations, kindred and tongues. See Rev. v. 9-10.

One more example will suffice in this contrast. Does the following accord with the Spirit's teaching:

Why do we mourn departed friends,
Or shake at death's alarm?
'Tis but the voice that Jesus sends
To call us to His arms.

This is the faith, and teaching, and singing of the present religious world. While Paul, speaking by the Holy Spirit says, that death is an enemy, and not only so, but that "He (Christ) must reign (rule) till he hath put all enemies (even death the last one) under His feet, or destroy it. Can't you see the contrast, fellow-mortal, between this popular song, and Paul's unpopular teachings—the dictates of God's Holy Spirit.

Again, who was it brought death into the world, and how was it done? It could not have been Jesus nor His voice, as He is our very best friend—even dying that we might be released from this world-wide dreaded monster, death. No, no; but it was the other party, that murderous, lying serpent, the devil, who was a liar from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, and who said "ye shall not surely die," thus ensnaring the happy pair and their offspring, the result of which was death—an enemy—the production of him who Paul says, "had the power of death (or to introduce it) that is the devil." Jesus, instead of sending His sweet, loving, friendly voice on the black wings of death, causing misery and destruction, weeping and wailing all over the land, is destined, ere long, to destroy the devil and his works, death included. Heb. ii. 14; John v. 8; 1 Cor. xv. 26. So I wish to be excused from such singing; but will gladly join in singing while here, those harmonious anthems of Bible frith, and over yonder redemption's thrilling music that will reverbate over the fair plains of this earth redeemed.

Body, Soul and Spirit.

A correspondent wishes us to give an exposition of 1 Thess. v. 23; and adds that the disciples in his vicinity claim it as proof of the immortality of the soul. The passage reads thus: "And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body, be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."

A man must be hard pushed to claim this as teaching the immortality of the soul. There is no such an idea in it. The word immortal is not there. The spirit, soul and body are mentioned, but their quality or duration is not even hinted at. Let us examine the words, "spirit, soul and body," and see if their use in the Bible will warrant immortality being attached to them in this life.

1. SPIRIT.

The word spirit has four significations:

1. Primarily, the air we breathe.
2. A being, such as an angel.
3. An influence from a being.
4. A state of feeling.

The word rendered spirit in the text is "pneuma," and is defined thus by Liddell and Scott: "wind, air, the air we breathe, the breath of life, the spirit, a living being, spirit, i. e. feeling." Pneuma, is used to represent "a state of feeling." 62 times. Here are some examples: Matt. v. 3—"Poor in spirit." Acts xvii. 16—"Paul's spirit was stirred within him," etc. Rom. xii. 11—"Fervent in spirit." 2 Cor. ii. 13—"No rest in my spirit." Eph. iv. 23—"Be renewed in the spirit of your mind." Phil. i. 27—"Stand fast in one spirit with one mind," etc. 1 Pet. iii. 3—"Meek and quiet spirit." 1 Cor. iv. 21—"The spirit of meekness." 2 Tim. i. 7—"Spirit of fear."

In these and many other instances, pneuma is used to indicate a state of feeling or disposition. So also is it in the text under consideration. Paul says, "I pray God that your whole spirit (or disposition) * * may be preserved blameless unto the coming of Jesus," etc. In others words, that you may ever exhibit the Christian spirit, and in it be preserved "blameless unto the coming of Jesus."

Pneuma, is never rendered soul; therefore those who use the words soul and spirit interchangeably, take an unwarrantable liberty.

2. SOUL.

The word here rendered soul is psuche in the Greek. This word occurs 106 times in the N. T. That immortality cannot be predicated on the use of this word, will readily be seen by the following passages:

Acts ii. 41.—"Then they that gladly received his word were baptized, and the same day there were added unto them about 3000 (psuche) souls." Again verse 43.—"And fear came upon every (psuche) soul."

Acts iii. 23.—"And it shall come to pass that every (psuche) soul that will not hear that prophet shall be destroyed from among the people."

Acts vii. 14.—"Then Joseph sent and called his father Jacob to him and all his kindred, three scores and fifteen (psuche) souls."

Acts xxvii. 37.—"We were in all the ship, two hundred, three-score and sixteen (psuche) souls"

These were not disembodied, immaterial, immortal souls or ghosts! They were MEN, in the flesh! MORTAL MEN!

This word, psuche, is often rendered life. For such use and to ascertain the precise meaning of it, the reader will compare the use of the words soul and life in Matt. xvi. 25, 26. It will be perceived that they are used as synonymous terms. In verse 25, psuche is rendered life, and in verse 26, it is rendered soul. Then it would be as strictly proper and right to render the word psuche, life in 1 Thess. v. 23, as in Matt. xvi. 25. No one will doubt this; and in doing so we produce harmony in the apostle's teaching.

3. BODY.

The word soma is here rendered body; it is defined, "The Body; the animal body," etc. But as no one predicates immortality on the word body applied to the present state, it will not be necessary to discuss its use, etc.

The whole passage then correctly rendered would read thus:

"I pray God, your whole disposition, life and being, be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." And it is then in strict harmony with all the plain teaching of the Bible, on the subject of man's mortality, etc.—Harbinger.

Explanation Suggested.

"And no man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the son of man which is in heaven."—John iii. 13.

The above passage is one that very few pretend to understand, and if Jesus spoke these words, I must admit that it is beyond my comprehension, to understand how he could be on the earth and in heaven at the same time. But there is one way of making it plain and easily understood. Is it not possible that the writer of the gospel of John wrote the words as a comment instead of them being spoken by Jesus? If we take this view of it, it makes it all plain. If the book of John was wrote some years after Jesus ascended to heaven, the writer could truly say "No man hath ascended to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the son of man which (was then) is in heaven."

If it is true that there is frequent interpretations in the original manuscripts, it may be quite possible this has happened in that way; and it might have been done without any intention of harm by the writer of the gospel. It will be noticed that the context reads quite harmoniously without this verse.

If you have any better way of removing the difficulty, would you please give your view of it in THE RESTITUTION.

Selfishness.

In no period of this world's history has selfishness been so general as at the present time. Among the great sins that swell the catalogue of abounding iniquity, none are more blighting than this. It dries up all that makes man noble among his fellow-men; and with him who is under the control of this cruel power, Bible consecration is out of the question. When the plain, straight testimony of God's word is brought to bear upon the minds and hearts of the multitudes that surround us, God's faithful ministers often witness with sorrow, after weeks of labor in presenting the last solemn message of mercy, how few there are willing to obey. The reason is obvious. It may be all traced directly and indirectly to a selfish heart. The sacrifice is too great. Hundreds acknowledge the truth, but the devil is ready to snatch away the good seed, and they submit to be led captive at his will, and pass on to their doom.

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT

Professor Swing's Creed.

People have been anxious, for some time, to know where Prof. Swing would land, seeing that he had thrown off the Presbyterian yoke. It is a matter of congratulation that many able men are beginning to see the foolishness of the creed system, as set forth in the old formulas of faith. That a general declaration can be adopted setting forth the great objects for which a society meets to worship God is, perhaps, admissible, but nothing in the way of a creed, having for its object the setting up of human ipse dixit, should ever be tolerated. The following is what Prof. Swing has embodied in his declaration:

"We, whose names are signed to this paper, earnestly desiring to promote our own spiritual welfare, and to take some part in the great work of helping others to lead the Christian life, living in a large city, where the moral work to be done is so great, do form ourselves into a Christian society, to be known as the Central church of Chicago. We would found our church upon the great doctrines of the New Testament. We believe in the divine character and mission of Christ; that he is the Savior which man is his sinfulness and darkness needs; that all those believing and following this Christ are entitled to the name of Christians. Furthermore, as at the Holy Communion many leading evangelical churches cordially invite to the supper all who love the Lord in sincerity and truth, so we, feeling that no service of the sanctuary is holier than its communion, would invite into full membership all who make this Savior their way, truth, and life."

Lent.

Some people have an idea that Lent, which is quite strictly observed by the Catholics and Episcopalians, is a Bible institution. There is nothing for it or about it. It is from beginning to end a human institution, and rests alone upon human authority. Paul says to the Galatian brethren, "Ye observe days and months and years; I am afraid of you, etc." And he openly disapproves of their foolishness. Mr. Cheney, the present Bishop of the Reform Episcopal Church, comes out in the last number of THE APPEAL after the following fashion:

A custom may outlive its usefulness. It may even grow to be so old that living men have forgotten any reason for its institution.

Napoleon, it is said, once found a deserted and ruined house guarded by a military patrol. The sentinel himself had no idea why he was posted there, and only after diligent search in the government archives was it found that two hundred years before, the building had been a temporary depository of military stores.

The season of Lent, on which we enter with the first day of the present month, should have a better ground for its observance than mere custom enforced by long compliance.

An intelligent and reasonable keeping of Lent, is the only keeping of it that ought to satisfy any Christian. It does not meet the case to say that antiquity affords its sanction. Antiquity can be alleged in favor of abuses as hoary as they are pernicious. Wide prevalence among Christians, and growing favor with protestants who formerly opposed it, are not conclusive grounds for such an observance. Lent must submit to the test of utility. It is a human ordinance, extra-scriptural, and resting on no shadow even of a Divine command. Hence, every Christian has a right to ask whether it has a value for his spiritual life.

The Gospel to the Poor.

The Bible claims to contain a perfect revelation of our Father's will to his children. It is also among the brightest sayings of Christ's that the "poor have the Gospel preached unto them." The whole mission and work of Christ were in harmony with this great truth. The preachers of to day do not come near enough to the people; they preach around above and beyond the people—but little is said to the people. The masses to-day are starving for the bread of life, which is shut in closed churches, rented pews, paid choirs and many other foolish extravagances. The masses do not go to church for the simple reason they cannot afford to dress up like the "dear lambs of the fold." A new spirit must come over the church. The Gospel must be brought out of the tombs and made to be a living power for the saving of men. An English rector says, when speaking of the condition of the poor of England:

"Look the case, I say, fairly in the face, as thoughtful men should. Here we are the most wealthy Church in the world. Our revenues are enormous; so is our prestige. We call ourselves emphatically 'the Church of the poor.' We pride ourselves on that title; but what is our claim to it? The poor man, certainly the very poorest man, is never seen within its walls. Rags and tatters have no room here. Velvet and fur, silk and satin, these have their abiding places in our chambers. Poverty, unless well clad, is never seen in the Church of England. Ask the poor man to church, any of you. Press the duty on him; and what is his answer? 'Master, I have no clothes!' He believes it is not for the like of him that the Church exists; but for the rich and respectable, the well-dressed and well-to-do. He has no other notion of the Church than this."

Roughing It.

"Yes, that's it. I believe in roughing it. There are those of our brethren who believe in preaching nothing but the plain word of the Lord. They tell men what their duty is, but I believe we've got to give the orthodox particular fits. We must cry aloud and spare not. So when I preach I go in for a general war on the creeds and also upon the churches. Christ called the Pharisees hypocrites, and I don't claim to be better than he was. I have heard some brethren preach wholesermons without abusing the churches, and I asked myself the question, wonder if he won't join the orthodox pretty soon?

You see it will not do for us to teach the love of God alone! We must let men know that we have no sympathy for any of their views."

But hold a minute my brother. Have you not gone too far? Have you any moral right to abuse people? Were you commissioned to go unto all the world and tell people they will be damned? Is that your work? Abuse is not gospel, slang is not preaching, rough words do no good. You must not throw stones in the water to catch fish.

Christ had a right to condemn sin. He knew men better than we know them. Would it not be well for us to stop and think, and let the kind side of our nature rule. Speak the truth in love. Be patient, gentle, compassionate, forgiving,—instructing those who oppose themselves. "Oh, I see," says the irate brother; "you believe in a smooth gospel." Yes, that's it. I believe in a smooth gospel—a gospel that will smooth men into the sweet spirit of Christ—that will smooth the path that is covered with thorns—that will smooth the angry brow, and make men objects of love and mercy. The gospel is good news to those in the valley of sin and death, and I am willing it should smooth the care-worn of earth, and prepare them for the better life, which will soon be given to all who love and obey the Master. Be careful that you do not rough it too much. Be kind. Let the kindly words of our absent King be yours and bury the tiger out of sight. Your labors will be blessed and heaven honored.

Peter or Paul, Which?

It is the boast of many, that they have authority direct from Peter. They claim that they are invested with certain rights which come down directly from the apostles' hands. The argument for this is based upon the remarkable words of our Lord to Peter, "I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven," etc. The Roman Catholic and many Protestant clergymen, claim to have an interest in this bestowment of authority. Some claim that Peter was in Rome, that he established the church, and that there is an unbroken chain of authority back to the apostle Peter. Hence, much is said about the great commission as though our entire hope of salvation rested upon Peter's keys. We here take the liberty to say that God gave a greater and more powerful witness to the Gentiles, than Peter, and we will say further that the salvation of the Gentiles does not rest on the modern interpretation of Peter's keys. Many an honest expositor has been misled in his whole exposition of the Word by extending to one apostle what properly belongs to all,—but more especially the apostle Paul. It would be as consistent to suppose that one of the twelve oxen who held up the brazen sea was all that was required, as to argue that Peter was the central and only important bearer of the water of life. See 1 Kings vii. 23-26.

The apostle Paul says that other foundation can no man lay, than that which is laid WHICH IS CHRIST JESUS. Again, in Ephesians, he tells us that we are to be built upon the FOUNDATION of the apostles and prophets. This one foundation on which they built was Christ. See Eph. ii.

But aside from these plain facts, we have still a more cogent argument. The apostle Paul did not receive his commission from the apostle Peter; neither did he derive his authority or power to organize churches from the apostle Peter. If this proposition can be sustained, it will disprove, forever, that our salvation depends upon Peter or upon those claiming to be his especial legatees. This point is made plain by Paul, in Galatians: "But I certify you, brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me, is not after man. For I neither received of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ."—Gal. i. 10-12.

This testimony proves the following points.

1. Paul received a commission to preach direct from the Lord. And be it remembered that this commission was given to Paul after the celebrated commission to the Eleven, and a still longer time after the supposed keys were promised to Peter.

2. The apostle Paul was commissioned to preach the Gospel, which is declared to be the POWER OF GOD unto salvation. And, by way of eminence the Gospel to the uncircumcision in contrast with the Gospel of circumcision committed to Peter.

3. The authority to preach, and the message to be preached, were not from man, or from man's authority. This should forever settle the question. But lest some one might be yet skeptical on this point, the apostle goes even further, and says: "To reveal His Son in me that I might preach Him among the heathen; (Gentiles) immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood; neither went up to Jerusalem to them which were apostles before me; but I went into Arabia, and returned again to Damascus."—Gal. i. 16-17.

This testimony settles the point, and proves as clearly as testimony can, that the apostle Paul did not depend upon any of the apostles for the preaching of the Gospel of Christ among the Gentiles. This argument should set the question at rest, and remove the last idea of the supposed APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION. Paul was the great apostle to the Gentiles, and preached and performed all things necessary to their salvation. He was not dependent upon Peter's keys for his commission, or his authority, or his Gospel. The whole plan was given to him without Peter's assistance. Furthermore, we find him condemning Peter for his duplicity in matters pertaining to the law and ordinances of Moses. See Gal. i. and ii.

The true and only succession which will prove acceptable in the sight of Heaven is that which comports with the faith and works of the Gospel, independent of Peter's keys, or of man's authority. Let us ever realize that it is by their FRUITS that believers are to be known, and not by some system of laying of hands or some would-be apostolic authority. Paul was dependent upon the especial system of the Eleven. Neither is there any authority for the modern pretenses in that direction.

Desolations.

History is, to a great extent, the record of destruction. Its leading topics are the memorials of demolished cities, fallen empires, and dead nations. In the tones that speak of the past, decline, revolution, and ruin, darken every page. Cities that were founded in the morn of antiquity, and became the seats of those renowned empires that ruled the world, have become wastes where desolation sits enthroned in wild and frightful solitude. Babylon was once the wonder of the world. Her magnificence and wealth have never been paralleled. When her sovereigns frowned, the nations trembled. Lands fertile as Eden, smiling under the plenitude of waving harvests, and joyous in all the blessings of peace, were changed into barrenness in the wake of her marching hosts. When her conquering kings went out to war, it was to bring back the treasures of vanquished nations, and the spoils of plundered temples. Her robber chieftains spared not the massed-up wealth of Salem's Sacred Fane. At length, as a defying challenge to the God of Israel, her heaven-daring tyrant desecrated the gold and silver vessels of Jehovah's sanctuary to impious and profane uses in an idolatrous revel, and retribution came. He was weighed in the balances of unbribable justice and found wanting. By the doom-writing fingers "Tekel" was penned on his palace wainscots, the foeman's sword sealed the hand-script with the plain monarch's blood, and the sceptre that dropped from his dying grasp, was seized by the victor leader. Finally, in the lapse of time, Babylon's broad walls were broken down and her high gates burned in the fire. God has destroyed the "destroying mountain;" the debris of her grandeur became the tomb for her burial, and doleful creatures now burrow in the dust of that dead nobility and royalty before which cringing multitudes once prostrated themselves in servile terror. The epitaph that inspiration has placed above her entombed glories is—Everlasting Desolations. — שממות עולם

Far up the rich valley of the Nile once flourished the renowned Thebes. Before Rome was born, and while Greece was yet in its cradle, it was a mighty city. Homer speaks of it as the "hundred-gated," and able to send forth 20,000 chariots to war. Her situation was among the rivers, and her rampart was the sea. The riches of Africa flowed into her marts. Egypt and Ethiopia were her strength, and the prophet says it was infinite. Other rich and productive provinces were her supporters and defenders. But the dark and cloudy day gathered in frowning tempests over the whole land of Ham. Judah's seers foresaw the unsheathing of that sword that was to beat down the crests and plumes of Africa's princely leaders and cut off the armies of her strength. Populous No went under in the waves of revolution, and her stranded wreck on the desolate beach of time remains an astonishment to the beholder. Collonades, courts, palaces, obelisks, towers, gateways, and pillars in ruins, attest the former grandeur of Luxor and Karnak. It was a city of temples. It is said that a moonlight view through the forests of columns is one of the most wierd and impressive. Diospolis is today the sepulchre of an empire that flourished in the dawning twilight of history. The beautifully wrought obelisks and pillars of her palmy days stand now her monumental tombstones. The Arab pitches his tent on the sands that drift against her crumbling columns, and the mummied dead of her early generations await the expected return of a long-suspended life in the excavated necropolis of the skirting Lybian hills.

In the early settlement of the earth after the flood, the people were dispersed to countries quite remote from each other. When circumstances favored, great nations originated from these severed communities. Babylon, Egypt, and Syria are examples. Commerce was the bond of union between these remote lands. There were certain other intervening localities that became very renowned that owed their distinction and prosperity to their connection with the commercial intercourse of the grander kingdoms.

In the great highway of trade and travel between the East and the West was a fertile Oasis about 120 miles north-east of Damascus. Its rich soil, salubrious climate, and living springs, led to its early occupation. Tadmor was founded here in remote times, and by Solomon enlarged, beautified, and raised to a city of capital prominence. Pliny speaks of it under the name Palmyra as "A city happily situated in a fertile land, with sweet, limpid fountains, and productive fields, surrounded on every side with desert sands." Like an inter-ocean city of our own country, it became a great transfer locality. It was a city of merchants. In the emporium of this city of palms the richly freighted caravans from Central and Southern Asia met other caravans with their precious and costly merchandise from Africa, Arabia, and the shores of the Great Sea. It retained its importance and splendor through all its political changes till the times of the renowned Zenobia, when the iron power of Rome hurled it down from its exalted position. Since that time it has become a part of the great empire of desolation. The ground is now strewed with the wrecks and ruins of its former magnificence. Its long line of Corinthian columns is an imposing spectacle. The traveler who crosses the desert, and stops to look upon the crumbling sculptures of different generations, can here contemplate the wasting memorials of the most renowned king of Israel, and the most celebrated Queen of Mesopotamia. As he muses over the evanished glories of the by-gone ages, he can mournfully realize that "the fashion of this world passeth away."

North-westerly from Damascus, about 36 miles distant, are the ruins of Baalbek. It was situated on the direct route of trade between Tyre and the East, and, being located in a fertile plain well watered by mountain streams, it rose to a city of importance. It was embellished with beautiful temples, one of which, from its magnificence, became a wonder of the world. But war, earthquake, and neglect, have left it only wonderful for its remains, that bear witness to the ravages of time that levels to the dust the proudest monuments of human greatness, and sinks neath the waves of oblivion both the builder and his boasted achievements. What was once the most splendid city of Syria is today rubbish and ruins.

Fifty miles south of the Dead Sea was Petra, or Sela, the capital of ancient Idumea. It, too, was one of the great inland emporiums of trade, and a chief station for caravans from Southern Arabia, and the great market, —particularly after the downfall of Tyre,—of the produce of India. Before the Christian Era it became one of the greatest stations in the transit of Eastern commerce to Rome. Its renowned structures differed from those of other cities from the fact that they were sculptured in the solid cliffs that lined the valley in which it was situated. The ancient Edomites hewed out not only their temples, theaters, and tombs, but their home-residences also, in the lasting rocks. These rock-dwellings are found in great numbers in the ravines and their mountain cliffs. This was the city of that Aretas who had subjected Damascus to his rule at the time of Paul's conversion. But though Edom dwelt in the clefts of the rock, it fell under the Divine denunciations for its hatred to Israel. Like Babylon it was threatened with perpetual desolations. Its rock-hewn temples remain; but the worship and priesthood of Al are wanting. The excavated amphitheater, capable of seating thousands, still exists, but the shows and the witnessing spectators have vanished. The Oriental traveler brings away his portfolio's of splendid drawings, but the edifices these pictures portray are without inhabitants in the solitudes of voiceless deserts.

Are the Dead Conscious?

In the RESTITUTION for December 15th, is an article headed "Expository Notes," which I would ask the editor's permission to make a few remarks upon, in reference particularly to the question forming the heading of this communication.

I would explain that I am with the readers of the RESTITUTION who believe that man is mortal, and will ultimately perish unless he seeks for that everlasting life which is the gift of God; but I am unable to see that there is nothing left of man in death, and that he utterly perishes for the time being.

The Scriptures appear to me unfavorable to that view, and I will call attention to a few of the passages which, in my judgment, teach a conscious existence between death and the resurrection.

I am ready to grant that what our Lord says of the rich man and Lazarus is spoken in the language of parable; but I would point out the inconsistency in any teacher framing such a parable, who believed that the dead were utterly unconscious, and that to believe otherwise was to hold a dangerous heresy.

I would put it to any one in our times, among the brethren whom this journal represents, would they deliberately in any public address give expression to a similar parable? I take leave to strongly doubt it; and my conviction is that our Lord was perfectly consistent in his use of it. He just spoke in agreement with the truth he had in view, and in keeping with the popular belief of the times. I would strongly urge attention to that fact. It was the popular belief then, that after the death of the body, the spirit continued to exist in a state of consciousness. And I ask, if this be acknowledged, how are we to account for the total lack of condemnation of the error, if it be an error, at the hands of the apostles and early disciples? No doubt the Jews, no less than the Gentiles, taught many things which were only the commandments of men; but is consciousness in the intermediate state one of them? I argue that our Lord's parable gives an answer of the negative kind.

It is weakly contended that as Jesus on one occasion bade the disciples beware of the doctrine of the Pharisees. It is a conclusive proof that he did not endorse this doctrine of consciousness in the parable; but the question first requiring to be settled, is, did he then refer to this particular doctrine; for the Pharisees had many doctrines, and, therefore, I think it is plain he simply guarded his disciples against whatever was bad and unworthy in the teaching and example of that self-righteous sect.

It is reasoned that since Jesus declared of a spirit, that it "hath not flesh and bones," therefore, the conscious existence of the dead is a fable, because in the parable the departed are spoken of as having eyes, fingers, a tongue, etc., but why should not spirits be spoken of as having these members? When a spirit is visible, it has all the proportions of a human being. It has not flesh and bones truly, and the parable, even though it be a parable, does not say anything about the quality of the eyes, etc., which are mentioned.

That a spirit looks like a man is clear, from the mistake of the disciples, who thought they saw one in that shape, and also of what Jesus said in answer. He did not say a spirit had neither shape nor form, but that it had not flesh and bones as himself, i. e. was not material like him.

Of course I do not endorse all that the advocates of the immortality of the soul conjecture regarding the intermediate state. The one point that I wish to refer to at present, is that of consciousness after death, and not only looking at it as a teaching of Scripture, but a consolation in view of the grave, I think it compares favorably with that cold and dreary expectation which seeks to find nothing but a vacuum, black and empty, after we have done with "this mortal coil." To sustain this view, passages are frequently quoted from the Psalms, Job, Ecclesiastes, etc., which speak of silence and darkness in the grave, as if these texts really proved all that they are used for; but it will commonly be found that, read with their contexts, a different aspect is given them. Take for example one of the more frequently quoted ones, Eccl. ix. 5, "The dead know not anything." How unsatisfactory a proof text mutilated bit of Scripture is, when read in the light of its context. It evidently simply means that the dead viewed in relation to human life are silent and unknowing. The question of the intermediate state is left untouched. There is such a thing as a passage proving too much if forced out of its context, and the above will be found one of that class, though it is constantly advanced as if it were a scripture clearly and conclusively bearing upon the point, but if it is insisted upon as a literal teaching, then the next verse proves there is neither hope nor resurrection for the dead. How then, it is objected, can you speak of the dead as dead, if they still are living?

We reply, that exactly in the same way as the Scriptures speak, so should we speak in this matter. The dead are dead; man dies and gives up the ghost; but that that survives him is is made evident in many places, as "fear not him who is able to kill the body, but is not able to kill the soul." Here something which refuses to die with the body is alluded to, and if there be any absurdity in the idea, as is often stated—of a man being at once spoken of as dead and alive—here is a scriptural example of it.

I could furnish many others if called upon to do so, but I have already occupied so much space that I must apologize for it. If agreeable to the editor, I may return to the subject.

Discussion.

DEAR RESTITUTION:—As some of the brethren perhaps would like to hear from the discussion here, I will attempt a short report. The discussion was held at Forbes' Station, a little town on the Kansas City, St. Joe & Council Bluffs railroad. We got the use of a hall large enough to hold three or four hundred persons. The discussion commenced Jan. 10th, as advertised in the RESTITUTION. The propositions were, the time of the setting up of the kingdom, and nature of man. Bro. W. J. Orem had the affirmative in both propositions. Mr. T. L. Cartwright, the negative. They selected Dan. ii. 4 as a starting point. Bro. Orem affirming the kingdom spoken of by Daniel as being yet future, and would be set up at the second coming of Christ. They agreed to make haste slowly, so the people could hear the evidence on both sides. With this understanding, they entered into the discussion Monday evening, Jan. 10th, held three hours session that night, and met next day at 10 o'clock to continue. Before commencing, Mr. Cartwright wanted Bro. Orem to close the first proposition with that session. He told him he could not, as he was not half through with his argument. Mr. Cartwright said some of his friends could not stay, and they wanted to hear part of the second proposition before they left; and, if Bro. Orem would stop with that session, and take up the second proposition, then after they got through with it, he would be willing to take up the first again and finish it. Bro. Orem agreed to this to accommodate them. So the third session they entered on the second proposition, and held three sessions of two hours each; and Mr. Cartwright run out of time, and could not stay any longer. His time and arguments run out about the same time; so he could not be blamed for wanting to stop. He claimed that the kingdom was set up on the day of Pentecost, and that the church was the kingdom. Bro. Orem showed clearly that the church and kingdom was not the same; but that the church is being called out in order to receive the kingdom when the Master comes. Bro. Orem showed clearly on the second proposition that man is mortal; that immortality is only through Christ, and that by a resurrection from the dead. As I failed to take notes, I will make my report short. Bro. Orem did not get half through with his arguments; but much good has been done. Mr. Cartwright's twisting to get out, after agreeing to make haste slowly, has had its bearing with thinking people. Bro. Orem is an able defender of the truth, and may he live long to proclaim the good news to perishing mortals. Now, dear brethren, if you think the above is worthy a place in our paper, the RESTITUTION, you can publish it. The debate passed off quietly and the hall was filled to overflowing each night; but in the day not so many. Yours in hope of eternal life.

Hold Up the Hands.

J. F. WAGONER.

Exodus xvii. 9-12.

Behold the chief of Israel stands
Upon the mountain's brow;
The potent rod upborne by hands
So full of vigor now.

He looks upon the scene below
With calm and placid mien.
His magic wand beats back the foe.—
Retreating they are seen.

But see! his hands, now be—y grown.
No longer bear aloft the rod
That had such mighty power shown:
The foe arrives back the hosts of God.

As nerveless, now, the chieftain stands,
His wasted powers give way.
With joy he greets the aid of hands
That come his arms to stay.

Now rolls the tide of battle back:
The yielding foe lives way.
Strong arms give aid to hands so slack,
And Israel gains the day.

So, in the cause of truth, to-day,
The valiant heroes cried:
Oh, do not let their strength give way,
But help to-day the feeble hand.

And while the foes of truth they face,
The word of God demands,
That though you cannot take their place,
You should hold up their hands.

WAGONER'S STATION, Ind.

Correspondence.

DEAR BRETHREN:—By your permission, I wish to say a few things to the loved ones of earth, who are pilgrims upon the king's highway of holiness, which has been marked out by a Son of a Father's love to walk in, in order that they may obtain future life, by a "resurrection out from among the dead ones," or a change from mortality to immortality, and on to the glory cap'd hills of the saint's Eden home, where they can walk beside life's cooling, crystal stream, as it glides gently among the verdant hills of the Paradise of God! Fifty years ago the 11th of December, 1825, I was immersed the first time, by a burial in water in order that I might be saved, and united with the Baptist church in Southbridge, Mass. And from that time to the present I have been trying to walk the highway of holiness.

Many have been the changing scenes which I have been called upon to pass through. I was but a child when I first united with the church, and thank God I am but a child to-day! Some who started in the service of the Lord at that time, have been conquered by death. Some are sectarian bigots! Others have got their eye upon the saint's Eden home. Two are public proclaimers of the coming of Jesus our life-giver, H. and D. L. Pratt. At the age of 22 years, I commenced holding meetings, by the request of the young converts, and others, in the neighborhood where I lived. Thirty-six years ago last June, the 17th, I was ordained as pastor of the Baptist church, in Hampton, Conn. With them I labored,—and in the surrounding county,—for more than three years and a half. Had the pastoral care of the First Baptist church, in Ashford, Conn., for three years. And God in a wonderful manner blessed my labors, whilst I had the care of these churches, among them and in the surrounding country. And it gives me joy, that is unspeakable, to have the opportunity of declaring to-day, that with these churches the most friendly and Christian feeling has always existed between us. And with the latter, if I wished to, I could settle to-day.

In 1830, I embraced the doctrine of the coming of Jesus, to reign on the earth; and thirty years have rolled away since I resigned the pastoral care of the Baptist church in —— and started out to preach the doctrine of the soon coming of Jesus, and its kindred truths. Since that time, I have traveled in fifteen of the states, and Canada, in order to preach the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus, the Christ! and its accounts are sealed up to the day of final decision.

I have traveled and preached some of the time at my own expense, hired preachers and paid them out of my own pocket, also places to preach in. Like Paul, I can say, "These hands have ministered to my necessities." And in no instance have I called upon anyone to help me. Some have helped me nobly in my mission of love, for which I thank them, and the Lord. Others have feasted upon the truth at the expense of others, and my own. The Lord reward them is my prayer.

Sometimes I have been applauded; sometimes belied, even by those who claimed to be in love with Israel's king. And this latter class have generally been professed preachers! Sometimes I have been stoned, clubbed, and properly destroyed, whilst preaching the good news. At one time, in less than one hour, property that would be worth, to-day $400, was destroyed by a mob.

But all has been overruled by my Master for my salvation! Many a time has my person been threatened; pots of tar and feathers have been provided for me! A number of times has some of the serpent's seed laid their plans to cast me into the water, where there were nineteen chances out of twenty for me to be drowned. Once I was under bonds "for the hope of Israel!" But none of these things have moved me from the investigation of all doctrine, that is claimed to have Bible for its support. Thanks be to God, that all these things have been overruled for my good, and the advancement of the truth, by enlarging my field of labor, and bring thousands to a knowledge of the truth, and it is in Jesus our life-giver.

My course has been, and still is, never to go among brethren, only as I am invited. Glory be to God, that to-day finds me with my face set Zionward! Eye fixed upon the time, when there shall be five kingdoms in the Eastern, and no more symbolized by the toes of the image! Then the time will be due, for Jesus, our life-giver and king, to come as the restorer of all things, foretold by Israel's holy seers. The family of God saved! The last child of the serpent's seed destroyed, and the effects of the fall wiped out of the universe of God! His glory now fills the earth! The sky is clear, and the soil is free, the victor's song floats over the plains of Eden, and the anthems of seraphs blend with its strain; the sun rolls down its brilliant flood, and shines on a world that is fair and good.

And more ardently than ever, do I desire to do what appears to be duty, to get the truth before my fellowmen, in order that a people may be taken out from among the Gentiles for his name.

Cheer up ye loved ones of earth, for soon we shall reach the harbor of eternal repose! Hallelujah! for its beautiful city is full in my view; its glory beams upon my pathway; its odors are wafted to me; its sound salutes my ear; its spirit I inhale; and my longing heart is there! For—

"We have heard of the psalms, the robes, the crowns,
And the silvery band in white;
Of the city fair, with pearly gates,
All radiant with light.
We have heard of the angels there and saints,
With their harps of gold, how they sing;
Of the mount, with the fruitful tree of life:
Of the leaves that healing bring."

All this makes me almost impatient to be there.

RALPH VINTON LYON.

SUSPENSION BRIDGE, N. Y.

Being informed that there was a desire in certain minds at Middleville, Barry county, Mich., to hear on the subject of immortality, Bro. J. C. Simonds and myself arranged to visit them, and to give them such light on the subject as we have received from the word. We went there on Friday, Feb. 18th, and staid over Sunday, giving four discourses: first, man in his creation; second, the Bible use of the word soul, and man in death; third, the punishment of the wicked, and fourth, eternal life to the righteous through the resurrection. The two first evenings our congregation were larger than we had expected. Sunday, both morning and evening, they were small, owing perhaps to the effort being made in the revival line. A few heard with so much attention and apparent candor as to inspire the hope that they will pursue the subject and become established in the truth. Our friend, Mr. Cobb, an intelligent attorney, from whom our invitation came, and who gave us a home, provided a hall for the meetings, and published notices of the same, said as we left, it was the first true preaching that he had ever heard. The Lord give increase from the seed sown.

On our arrival at Middleville, we were informed that the people of Woodland, in the north-east part of the same county, wished to come there. To save expense of travel, we decided to go right on there on Monday, and spend the few days that business at home would allow us to prolong our absence therefrom. We went on Monday and had four meetings. The storm of Monday afternoon and evening prevented a full attendance, but these present gave us a good hearing, and better weather brought us full houses. We endeavored to give them an outline of the Bible scheme from creation to the restitution, and thought that we were so successful that the attentive hearers got hold of it so as to be able to read and study the word in reference to it. We left some of them manifesting a good interest to know what the truth is.

We found two sisters there. One, Sister Bolce, the mother of a family, and a resident of the neighborhood where our meetings were held. The other, my daughter, transiently there as a teacher. Each is intelligent in the faith and in the love of it. These had talked their faith and circulated reading matter, which had resulted in the expression of a wish to hear which led us there. These sisters have the work now in charge, and must have help again from abroad by and by. We hope some fruit will be gathered in the harvest from the seed sown there.

E. MILLER.

Dear Brethren:

Since my last letter to you, I have visited Clinton county, Ind. Had meeting some ten days, with good effect. There was one that obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine delivered, and was immersed into the Christ. Others were almost persuaded to be Christians.

The Lord be thanked! I visit them again in April.

Will There Be a Resurrection of the Dead?

BRO. REED:—In the editorial column of THE RESTITUTION of December 8th, 1875, we find the following: "Some of our brethren have now had a free and fair opportunity to express their views upon certain questions, bearing upon the destruction of the ancients. Here the matter ends."

As the resurrection of the dead is involved in these questions, I supposed that the investigation of that subject was to be dropped, or discontinued entirely, from the columns of our paper. But from a subsequent explanation from the editor, in THE RESTITUTION of January 5th, 1876, in speaking of the "hobby riders," (the writers on the above questions,) he assures his reviewer that the columns of the paper are not closed against the future discussion of the "fair chance question." And from the sequel I was forced to the conclusion that I had, also, misunderstood the editor's meaning of the words, "here the matter ends."

The columns of the paper have, truly, been used as a medium of a free, and lively discussion of one side of the question, and that in bitter opposition to the view of any future chance to any of Adam's race, who may have fallen into death's embrace, without a knowledge of God's plan of redemption. So, for some reason, for the past eleven weeks, we have heard quite often from only one fraction of the "hobby-riders," (as our brother pleases to term them), with the exception of Bro. P. Allings' article.

Now, Bro. Editor, I do not speak of these things, because of any desire to take control of your paper, or as a fault-finding grumbler; for I am well aware an editor's position is anything but a pleasant place to occupy. But I wish to make a suggestion, that is if we are to have a sectarian sheet—a paper that will admit of articles favoring but one side of any Scriptural subject, especially on the subject of resurrection and non-resurrection of the dead. Then why not unite our little strength in the support of a paper of that class, which has long been in the field, and thereby increase the size and interest of that sheet which would insure an easy time instead of tugging along against so many adverse circumstances—to keep alive our little paper. Perhaps you will object on the ground that doubtless our eyes would often meet articles in that paper that would entirely ignore the "first principles of the Gospel." Well, that should only teach us to be patient with the erring. And if we lend the paper to our neighbors, to read, we should give all diligence to set them right on these questions.

But if you do not think favorably of my suggestion, and conclude to continue THE RESTITUTION as you doubtless will, you may continue to send me a copy. I have taken the paper for nearly five years, and as I have read it with interest and profit, I feel loth to part with it now, and herewith enclose two dollars to renew my subscription.

And now, Bro. Reed, I will give you a little sketch of my experience. I have been an invalid for more than thirty-four years. Am very feeble in body, (and with very limited means of support), suffering much pain every day. Seven years ago, about this time, I was struck down under deep conviction of sin. I had for nearly half a century been trying to build up a righteousness of my own, by living a moral life. But while confined to my room, on a sick bed, by an unseen power, I was made to feel my lost and undone condition—without hope, and without God, in the world. Such a struggle as I passed through at that time, I hope never to encounter again. I then and there, with none but God to witness, laid down the weapons of my rebellion, and gave myself up wholly into the hands of the Potter, to mould and fashion me into the image of His own Son. From that time, until the present, I have enjoyed sweet communion with the Father and His Son Jesus Christ, and joy in the Holy Spirit, which the world could never give nor take away. I can truly say that I have been led in a way that I knew not.

The study of the Bible has been my daily meat, and drink. Ten times I have read it by course, besides spending much time studying subjects. I have not the physical strength, nor the tongue of the learned, to enable me to preach, but I lend my papers until they are nearly worn out, and then I cut out the best articles and paste them in old almanacs, and continue to lend them; until this winter I am so poorly that I could not get out but little, and unable to do any pasting. What will result from my feeble efforts at missionary work, can only be known in the future day of reckoning.

Well, from all that I can learn in the blessed Book, concerning the future of our race, not only "the ancients," but the present inhabitants of our sin-cursed earth, I am fully persuaded that the love of God embraces not only those few sinners, who, through God's divine influence, and grace, have been made partakers of Christ's divine nature, and that small remnant of Adam's race that will be left, after the pouring out of God's wrath upon those nations, which will be in open rebellion against Him. But it (His love) will be made manifest in the future dispensation, in giving life, peace, and a perfect knowledge of the truth to all of the race, so that none will be consigned to a hopeless death without a perfect knowledge of the only true God, and Jesus Christ." And so with all the families of the earth, covenanted to Abraham, will be dispensed—through the promised seed—after he shall be made perfect, by a resurrection, (ek-nekron) "that out of dead ones"—Diaglott of all the members of his "body" the church—not before. I will not weary you by quoting the passages relied on to prove this view, as an abundance have been presented already, by more able pens than mine.

Will you publish this to please a feeble and weary pilgrim? Yours in anxious search for the truth,

J. D. SHERIDAN,

OSBEK, IOWA.

It is reported that the Pope is to have a newspaper organ. It is to be started in Rome this year under his sanction. It's to be a great affair, and will be the Catholic organ of the whole world. Cardinals will be among the editors, high officials among the reporters, and nuncios at foreign courts among the correspondents. If it succeeds, the fact may probably be regarded as a proof of Papal infallibility.

THE AMERICAN CYCLOPEDIA.

A Comprehensive Library in Itself.

A Great National Enterprise in which every American may Take Pride.

Published by D. APPLETON & CO., 549, 551, Broadway, N. Y.

The Cyclopedia, now in course of publication, is entirely rewritten, and appears with about 4,000 maps and illustrations. To be completed in sixteen volumes of 800 pages each. Fourteen volumes now ready.

In the experience of book making and selling the work is without a parallel. With the multiplication of steam presses, the publishers are still unable to meet the demand.

The sale has already reached over 300,000 volumes, and this in paths trod. The demand for the work is but fairly commenced; the orders are largely multiplying and the indications are that the sales of the work for 1876 will greatly surpass those of the previous year.

Thus the most sanguine expectations of the publishers are more than realized.

The publishers again repeat to the public that no expense has been spared in the writing, editing, or publishing departments of the American Cyclopedia.

The cost will be more than $300,000 to prepare the sixteen volumes for the press.

BOOKS AND PERIODICALS.

Modern Spiritualism, by Marion, is out of print. We are out of some books ordered,—such as Whiteness of Immortality, Facts on the Soul,—but expect to obtain some soon. We will then fill orders and supply others.

The Trials and Triumphs of Faith. By Dr. Boyd. Published by M. A. Packer & Co., 163 and 165 Clark St., Chicago. Price, $2.50.

This is a neatly executed work of 718 pages, printed on good paper, well illustrated, and bound in green and gold.

Part I. treats of the trials and triumphs of faith as illustrated by the lives of the patriarchs and prophets.

"These all died in faith, not having received the promise, but saw them afar off and were persuaded of them, and embraced them."

Part II. consists of biographical sketches of the lives of Moody and Sankey.

Part III. is descriptive of their career in Great Britain.

Part IV. is a history of their work in America.

Like all other human productions, it contains allusions and paragraphs that might be criticised, but on the whole, the book is well written and calculated to quicken the spirit of devotion, and strengthen the arms of faith. One paragraph in Mr. Moody's closing address is well worthy of attention. He says: "Let 'Word and Work' be our watchwords. If you neglect either the one or the other you won't be successful. But he who holds the Word in one hand, and works with the other, must advance nearer and nearer to the throne."

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Lord willing, I will be at Laketon Wabash county, Ind., on Thursday before the first Sunday in April. The second Sunday, in the next Brother's part of the country—meeting to commence on Friday night before. The fourth Sunday, in Clinton county, at Burget's Corners, and on Friday night before.

J. S. HATCH.

CRAWFORDSVILLE, Ind. Mar. 7.

I have been requested to publish, through the RESTITUTION, a meeting of days, to commence on Friday before the first Sunday in April, at 7 p. m., at the Scott school house. This request is made by Bro. and Sister Akers and some family adjoining neighbors. On account of hard times, we have only been able to do a very little in this direction for the past year. And we have not yet able to do for our brethren as we would like, and hesitate to request their labor, when we know that it is with a charity that they can't allow. But we ask them to help at this time. We have the promise of some assistance (from three good neighbors; but how much they may be able to give, I cannot say. A number have expressed a desire that Bro. J. C. Kinser, John Foote and J. W. Irwin should attend. We invite all to come who can. All coming by the A. T. & S. F. R. R., will stop at Valley Falls.

Free to those coming later will inquire for my house at E. Bell's drug store. The meeting is designed to continue one week or more, and the object is to hold up the truth. Let those come who can and we will do our best. Can any one help Bro. T. J. Adams, so that he can be with us to assist in singing "Home, Sweet Home," etc.?

We say unto the saints of the brethren in love, Laplog to be able to stand in the great day. Amen.

The Unknown Glory.

MRS. M. F. A. CROMEEN.

"Eye hath not seen nor ear heard," etc.
brave one standing a picket guard,
For the army of the Lord,
Through the chill of night, in the face of the foe,
Have ye ever heard the word,

How that eye hath never seen the like
Of the country over there,
Nor beheld on earthly king such crown
As the conquering saint shall wear?

O sorrowing ones who have trusted so,
Through the dark of your earthly way,
The hand unseen that is leading you
Leads surely unto day.

Ye can never think what waiteth you,—
What sweetness of surprise—
When the veil that shadows your mortal life,
Shall be lifted from your eyes.

O worn ones walking the pilgrim way,
Ye never can know how fair
Is the land your feet are tending toward,
Over the river there.

O loving ones who lay down your lives
By the little, day by day,
For the sake of him who gave his own
With the throes of Calvary—

Who gathered the skirts of his glory up,
And went to the Father's throne—
Your hearts have never conceived the things
He will bring when he comes for his own.

O loyal ones who have waited so
For the Holy King's return—
Who have left your eyes all full with tears,
And your heart within you burn,

For the promise of the white-robed ones,
And the angels' Bethlehem hymn,
The love that hath filled your hearts so full,
And made your eyes so dim,

Is only an earnest of heavenly joy;—
Who hath given so much hath still
A store of his own love's sweetness left,
Your chalice of life to fill.

O dying one, smile for the future life—
It will all be what is best;
For a God who hath made a world like this,
Can be trusted for all the rest.

The Regeneration.

BY WILLIAM SHEPHERD.

"And Jesus said unto them, verily I say unto you that ye which have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall sit upon the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel."—Matt. xix. 28.

The text contains a promise or prediction of vast import, rather than a mere ordinary statement. The word regeneration occurs but twice in Scripture, here and in Titus iii. 5, and by most theologians it is applied to the moral change which takes place at the time of conversion. In Titus it has that meaning, of which the immediate connection makes it obvious. The text evidently has not that meaning. The word regeneration here, does not refer to the present time, although, according to the punctuation in our common version it would seem so to teach, but we must remember that the punctuation of the Holy Scriptures as well as its extravagant divisions into chapters and its sub divisions into verses is not the work, neither was it done under any special superintendence of Divine inspiration; but it was the doings of men under the influence of their preconceived notions, making it conformable to their prejudices and what they supposed to be correct, consequently, there is a huge per centage of error embodied in their work in this direction. The erroneous punctuation of a passage gives it sometimes a very different meaning to what it really is designed to teach, and often destroys its true import and proper sense entirely. We cite a few examples that you may see the force of these observations. Heb. x. 12. "But this man after he had offered one sacrifice for sins, forever sat down on the right hand of God." You observe the point should be after the word "forever," which many of our English Bibles now contain. According to King James' punctuation of the text, it would leave the Savior to ever remain fixed at the right hand of God, and hence precludes the idea of his ever coming again. The thief on the cross is another instance. Luke xxiii. 43. The point should be inserted after "to-day," this would make it harmonize with the thief's request. "To-day," is equivalent to now, and merely a modifier of the time when the promise is made, not the time of its fulfillment. We find in the case of the text in the common version, the comma is placed after the word regeneration, instead of at the pronoun "me," as it should have been, and this order of punctuation is being adopted by many theologians, such as Campbell, Murdock, Clark, etc. Yet most professed Christians are not willing to suffer truth to overcome their prejudices and give to the text its appropriate place and application, but will compress, force and strain its fulfillment into the moral renovation of man, and indeed, the whole sublime passage by this unwarranted treatment, is horribly mangled, distorted, twisted, torn, disjointed, worsted, and spiritualized by many in order to make it conform to their limited and preconceived notions, and old established theories. They say that regeneration means conversion of sinners through the preaching of the Gospel; that the twelve apostles being enthroned, signifies nothing more nor less than a state of great pre-eminence and dignity to which they were raised, and their judging the twelve tribes of Israel, denotes that high authority to which they would be promoted, or called to exercise in the church, dispensing the gospel and its precepts to God's people. But we shall see the impropriety of such a rapid exposition of this glorious promise to Christ's faithful ones by carefully noticing the context and observing the point, or place of its proper punctuation; for inserting the comma where it should be, "the regeneration," as a consequence, is referred to a future time, viz: When Jesus shall sit upon the throne of his glory, which cannot occur until his second advent in glory. This throne of his glory being none other than the throne of his father David, spoken of, and promised him by the angel Gabriel to Mary his mother. Luke i. 32. This same throne is mentioned again, in Matthew xxv. 31, upon which he is to sit when he comes to gather the nations before him and rule them, therefore, the regeneration has no reference to the time of following him, but points to the period of his exaltation and that of his followers, and finds no fitting place to the cross period of humiliation. This, we find Adam Clark admits in his notes on this text as well as adopting the improved punctuation which he declares is followed by the most eminent critics; and yet the doctor overlooks the millennial kingdom, and carries the regeneration into the paradisical state. Another proof that "great men are not always wise, neither do the aged understand judgment."

The doctor failed to see, with many others, that the word regeneration implies a state of imperfection, a condition susceptible of improvement, which an unchanged state will not admit of, as we have always supposed to be the case with the New Jerusalem economy. The doctor, however, concedes here the idea of judging, and follows Kypke, a distinguished theologian, who has shown that we are to understand that the original Greek word, here rendered judging, means to govern, to preside over, to hold the first or most prominent position or place, citing as authority Gen. xlix. 10. "Dan shall judge his people," shall preside in or rule over them, shall occupy a chief place among the tribes.

Again, we may admit for the sake of argument, that regeneration here may affect man morally, as in Titus; i. e., it may embrace his moral nature as well as his physical. It certainly covers the whole ground taking in the spiritual as well as the physical, but we shall learn more of its true import and signification as we pass along in the brief examination of a few parallel passages.

In Eph. i. 10: We read of a dispensation of the fulness of times when there is to be a general gathering of all things in Christ. By dispensation, we understand economy, or plan desired for a certain specific purpose, called the fulness, or consummation of all preceding economies, in order to gather together all things which may have borne any relation to those previous dispensations, to reduce, as it were, to add up, and to bring different sums to one point, or concentrate them and bring them all with their varied fractions under one grand head, in a word, and in the words of Him in whom and under whom they all are to be reduced —"To gather up the fragments of all anterior ages that nothing be lost." And in that gathering, and work of reconstruction, to abolish death, and finally obliterate and destroy the works of the devil, and ultimately bring to an end sin and suffering, this being the final act and purpose of the manifestation of the Son of God. 1 John iii. 8. A work of this character is clearly pointed out in 1 Cor. xv. 24-26.

Here then will be a wiping out, as with one wide sweep of Almighty power, every trace of the fall, showing where sin hath abounded, grace did much more abound, and that where sin reigned unto death, there would righteousness flow down as a river, eradicating the evil of sin, and removing it forever more that righteousness might reign unto eternal life, through our Lord Jesus Christ. Rom. v. 20, 21. Bringing back this disjointed world to its more than primitive state of beauty and supernal excellency. When Eden shall bloom over natures tomb, and death shall be swallowed up in victory, and God's works shall shine out in illuminating splendors no longer dimmed by sin's polluting power; when all the works of the Lord shall praise him and all his saints shall bless him, and the whole universe finally be quickened by the mighty impulse of God's eternal love, Amen.

The fulness of times which is called in Tim. vi. 15, "His times" when there is to be a gorgeous display or exhibition of Christ's divine power, and a manifestation of his person as has never yet been developed to men or angels; "when he will show who is the only potentate and King of kings, and Lord of lords," which grand display of his personal power and glory will put to shame all the monarchs of earth, and their fame and grandeur will sink down into utter insignificance; when they shall seek to hide themselves "in the dust for fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his majesty." And they shall go into the holes and the rocks, and into the caves of the earth * * when he ariseth to shake terrible the earth." Isa. l.; Rev. vi. 15, 16.

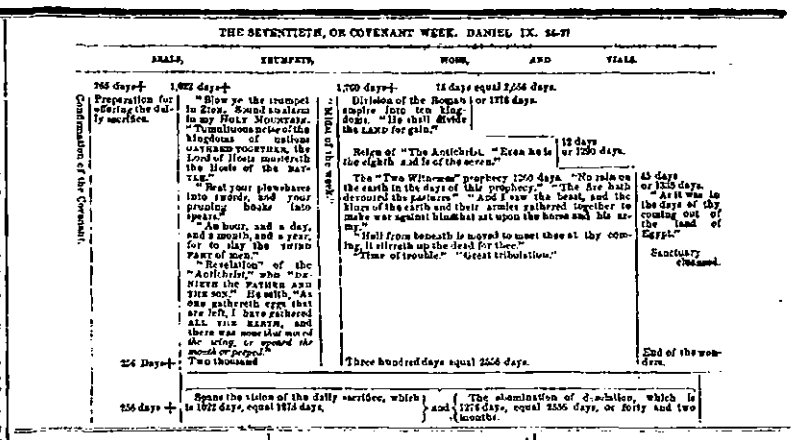
Men have had their times, their day; now Christ is to have his times, his day. They have given us a display of their works and their glory; their governments and kingdoms which have all proved a failure; now, the Son of God is to make a display of his. They have shown their royalty and power, as though they were the lords and monarchs of the earth, now Christ will "show who is the only potentate, and when their kingdoms are all to be transferred to him with what glory may surround them, or at least they are to become tributary to his kingdom or throne at Jerusalem and he takes to himself his great power and reigns. "His times" or "fulness of times" occupy the same place in future history or prophecy, as the "times of restitution" spoken of in Acts 3d chapter. The same as "the regeneration" when all that are "in Christ" from the beginning of the ages will be gathered, both Jews and Gentiles, into "one body," one blessed unity, one holy compact, one consecrated host, one harmonious octave—the end returning to the beginning. This passage gives us a still further insight into the Divine purpose in this distinguished period—which is to renovate, to gather, to bring back into one lump so to speak, all the shattered fragments of all preceding ages, and reconstruct out of these materials a glorious edifice—a temple or building not made with hands eternal and heavenly, in its character. Amen.

To still further elucidate the text, allowing Scripture to explain itself, we shall examine for a moment the passage in Acts iii. 21: "The times of restitution." Restitution is but another word for restoring what is lost or taken away; the act of recovering a former state or position; to retrieve, to bring back from degredation, or declension, or ruin to its former condition. And here we see no reason why regeneration in our text may not mean the same or a work resulting in the same end. This is the sense in which we should understand regeneration, renew, reproduce, restore, reinstate; to bring back that which was lost. For example "I will restore thy (Zion's) judges as at the first and thy counselors as at the beginning," and the result of this restatement of Zion's judges and her counselors is this: "Afterward thou shalt be called the city of righteousness, the faithful city." Isa. i. 26. There is to be a restitution at this time, of all things. Now the question asked by the disciples of our Lord just prior to his ascension is to the point and affords us a still further clue as to the Scriptural meaning of restitution, viz: "Lord wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?" The nature and extent of this restitution we may only learn by a careful examination of the prophetic writings. And it is here where we may form some clean and definite idea of the grandeur and glory surrounding that epoch of the times of refreshing, or reign of the Son of Man, when the tide of both the civil and ecclesiastical affairs will be turned for good to Israel and the "left of the nations;" when the evil of ages which has spread so fearfully over the world will be swept back, as with the purging and cleansing power of the glorious Jehovah. Glad end. We begin to see thy bright dawnings in the oriental skies, and long to behold the millennial sun—light of thy splendor in brightest effulgence until the noon-day of thine ineffable glory shall cover the earth with one beautiful robe of celestial light as the waters cover the sea.

"But when shall see that glorious day,
When throned on Zion's brow,
The Lord shall rend the veil away
That hides the nations now.
When earth no more beneath the fear,
Of His rebuke shall lie;
When pain shall cease, and every tear
Be wiped from every eye.
When Judah, she no more shall mourn,
Beneath the heathen's chain,
The days of splendor shall return,
And all be new again.
The point of life shall then be quaffed
In peace by all who come,
And every wind that blows shall waft
Some long lost exile home."

The Mussulmans have permitted the Christians to put up bells in the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem. As the Mohammedans are opposed to bells the sound of one has not been heard in the building since the Sultan entered the city in the twelfth century.

THE SEVENTIETH, OR COVENANT WEEK. DANIEL IX. 24-27



Landmarks and Keys to Prophetic Interpretation.

BY O. T. HOBBS.

1. Salvation is of the Jews.

2. The great theme and burthen of prophecy is concerning the Jews, Jerusalem and the restitution.

3. The events of fulfilled prophecy are recorded in the historic archives of the nations, in language harmonious with prophetic annunciation.

4. All "interpretations" which do not harmonize with dispensational events are void.

5. Jewish history is divided into three distinct periods, each marked by great national events.

6. When the Jews crucified their King, they lost their national existence, and are yet "without a king, prince, sacrifice, image, ephod or teraphim," "for many days."

7. After the "many days," ("times of the Gentiles,") they build up Zion with blood, and Jerusalem with iniquity," and sacrifice flesh for the sacrifice of mine offering.', "For Israel hath forgotten his Maker, and buildeth temples."

8. When the Jews lost their nationality at the end of the seven and sixty and two weeks, the "times of the Gentiles" supervene, and when the "times of the Gentiles" end, the seventieth week begins, and constitutes the "great and terrible day of the Lord."

9. The "seventy weeks," (Dan. ix. 24,) cover all Jewish history, from the decree of Cyrus to the coming of Christ and the resurrection of the dead.

10. All the events of prophecy connected with or synchronous with the reign of the "Beast," alias "vile person," "prince of the covenant," "Little Horn," "Man of Sin," "Idol Shepherd," "Apollyon," are fulfilled within the limits of the seventieth week. (Dan. ix. 24.)

11. The taking away of the daily sacrifice, and placing the abomination of desolation "in the Holy place" is performed by "Apollyon," the "Beast that was, is not, and yet is," "in the midst of the week;" and the "2,300 days" are covered by that identical week in the which the daily sacrifice is taken away and the abomination of desolation is set up.

12. "And there are seven kings." This God-given lineage of kings fills out the "time" from B. C. 31 to the burning day of God, and the "eighth, who is of the seven," occupies the throne, and wields the destiny of kindreds, tongues and nations, during the latter half of the covenant week, "sitting in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God."

"Whoso heareth, let him understand."

The foregoing is written for the consideration of the reader, preparatory to an exposition of that standing question, the 2,300 days, which was written for our instruction, upon whom the ends of the world are come, and not difficult to understand.

THE COVENANT WEEK, THE BEAST, AND THE 2,300 DAYS.

"Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people, (Jews), and upon thy holy city, (Jerusalem)."

Those seventy weeks are divided into three distinct periods, each distinguished by great national events, all of which are applicable to the Jews only, and to their holy city as they nationally exist.

The logic of events furnishes us with an undisputed exposition of the "seven" and the "sixty and two" weeks, at the end of which Messiah was "cut off."

With the cutting off of Messiah, the "one week" was also cut off, and cannot, therefore, have its fulfillment until the Jews become a nation under the covenant, confirmed with many (nations) for "one week"; and without which covenant the week cannot begin.

This covenant of prophetic notoriety must have a corresponding historic record, enrolled in the archives of nations, "known and read of all men," especially the wise; for without such record of events, involving great national issues, to claim its fulfillment is to ignore prophecy and falsify history.

A few days before the cutting off of Messiah he said to the Jews, "Behold, your house is left unto you desolate," from which time the Jews could offer no legal sacrifice; for from thence they should be "many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim," as it is to-day; but after the "many days" it is said of them, "Israel hath forgotten his maker, and buildeth temples," a future event and a fulfillment, in part, of the prediction, "If another come in his own name, him will ye receive;" and this one who shall come is "The Antichrist," whose career is the principal object of the vision of the seers, and who is recognized by various names, titles and investitures, by means of which I design to identify him with the "covenant week," and with the 2,300 days.

The covenant week contains 2,556 days, which include but one leap year. The "forty and two months" reign of "The Antichrist," from the "midst of the week," is 1,278 days.

The vision of 1,300 days covers the daily sacrifice, which is 1,022 days, and the abomination that maketh desolate, which is 1278 days, and reaches to within 12 days of the "end of the wonders." Therefore, the daily sacrifice being taken away, "in the midst of the week," and the reign of "the Antichrist" occupying the latter half of the week from the date of the covenant as a season of preparation for offering the daily sacrifice at the beginning of the 2,300 days.

PREPARED BY O. M. MYERS.

THE SPIRIT IN MAN.

See how man's life came to him at first. God first formed the figure of man's body in common earth. Then to this figure God added life by breathing into it from Himself, whereby this inanimate body became a living one. But in this composition, the spirit is so perfectly mixed with and diffused through the whole body, that we can not now say which is spirit nor which is earth; but the whole is one entire living creature. As in leavened dough, we cannot say which is the leaven nor which is the dough.

But God, who first infused this life, can extract it out again, and leave the body as it was before this life was thus put into it. And this form of death God chose for man: "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return."

God unmakes man just as He made him. He takes him to pieces like a jointed tool; He draws in his breath to Himself, and leaves the lump to the elements of which it was at first composed, which by degrees loses its very form, and takes its place again in common with other matter.

And thus the spirit returns to God who gave it; for the remainder of the spirit is with Him. But in this return, the spirit of man maintains no self-existence, having surrendered itself into the ocean of life from whence it first flowed. When rivers return into the sea, they are no more rivers, but lose their name and property, being merged in the ocean of their original fountains.

And yet God doth retain in His memory the particular characters of ideas of every instance of life which life doth so extract, from whence (in the day of the restitution of all things) every body shall have its own spirit, and every spirit its own body.—J. Argill, A. D. 1700.

The above extract sounds very much like the author had studied well the following Scriptures: "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life: and man became a living soul." Gen. ii. 7.

The same principle that was breathed into man as above described we find was breathed likewise into the animal world: "And they went in unto Noah into the ark, two and two of all flesh, wherein is the breath of life." "And all flesh died that moved upon the earth, both of fowl, and of cattle, and of beast, and of every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth and every man; all in whose nostrils was the breath of life, of all that was in the dry land, died." Gen. vii. 15, 21-23.

"If he (God) set his heart upon man, if he gather unto himself his spirit and his breath; all flesh shall perish together, and man shall turn again unto dust." Job xxxiv. 14, 15. "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it." Ecc. xii. 7.

Gesenius upon this last text, in his Hebrew Lexicon, in defining Ruach, on p. 967, says: That the word Ruach here rendered spirit is to be understood as having reference to the same principle possessed in common by man and beasts; and cites in connection with this text, Ecc. iii. 19, 21—"For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them; as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath (spirit); so that a man hath no pre-eminence above a beast: for all is vanity." "Who knoweth if the spirit of man goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast goeth downward to the earth."—Douay.

Also he cites, viii. 8. "There is no man that hath power over the spirit to retain the spirit; neither hath he power in the day of death; and there is no discharge in that war."

Next he cites, as refering to the same principle. Job xii. 10. "In whose hand is the soul of every living thing and the breath (spirit) of all mankind."

And lastly, Gesenius cites, as refering to the same principle given to man in his creation, which he possesses in common with the animal world. Ezek. xxxvii. 1-10—"The hand of the Lord was upon me, and carried me out in the spirit of the Lord, and set me down in the midst of the valley which was full of bones, and caused them to pass by them round about: and, behold, there were very many in the open valley; and, lo, they were very dry. And he said unto me, Son of man, can these bones live? And I answered, O Lord God, thou knowest. Again he said unto me, Prophesy upon these bones, and say unto them, O ye dry bones, hear the word of the Lord. Thus saith the Lord God unto these bones; Behold, I will cause breath to enter into you, and ye shall live: And I will lay sinews upon you, and will bring up flesh upon you, and cover you with skin, and put breath in you, and ye shall live; and ye shall know that I am the Lord. So I prophesied as I was commanded: and as I prophesid, there was a noise, and behold a shaking, and the bones came together, bone to his bone. And when I beheld, lo, the sinews and the flesh came upon them, and the skin covered them above; but there was no breath in them. Then said he unto me, Prophesy unto the wind, prophesy, son of man, and say to the wind, Thus saith the Lord God; Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live. So I prophesied as he commanded me, and the breath came into them, and they lived, and stood up upon their feet, an exceeding great army."

From these texts of Scripture then we discover: 1. That life is produced by the inspiration of this life giving current from God. 2. That when this is thrown back into the great field, or reservoir of spirit death follows. 3. That this same element power called back, not from heaven, not from Paradise, not from any place of departed disembodied spirits, but from the same locality from which it was first received, and into which it is given at death, produces life from the dead in the resurrection morning.

There are thirty-five millions of Roman Catholics in France. The remainder of the population is divided as follows: Protestants 600,000, Jews 49,000; 3,071 Mohammedans, Buddhists, &c., and 82,000 Frenchmen who declare that they recognize no religion whatever.

HOW TO ADDRESS LETTERS.

All business letters, or communications must be addressed as follows:—

THE RESTITUTION,
Plymouth, Indiana.

Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christian King at its head, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for salvation.

CONTRIBUTIONS.—The Editor must not be understood as endorsing all the sentiments expressed by correspondents whose articles are inserted under this head. Each writer is alone responsible for the article bearing his own signature. If the teaching of any writer is not endorsed, an article setting forth the views of the party differing may be forwarded. Free discussion of Bible doctrines on all sides will be allowed, but the Editor reserves the privilege of rejecting those communications which antagonize a belief and obedience of the Gospel as a means of salvation, or which undermine its principles.

Debasing Literature.

MRS. H. V. REED.

We find it everywhere—in parlor, library, and kitchen—in steamboats, cars, and hotels—on the street-corners, and in the market-places. We are eminently a reading people, and are very willing to be so considered, but what we read is quite another thing. It is a sad truth that the public mind is constantly fed upon fiction, and fiction too of the most inspired character. A book that would command a multitude of readers must ignore to a great extent both principles and ideas.

The weakest and sickliest lovestory is gorgeously bound in green and gold, and sent into the world to meet with just as warm a reception as if the same programme was not repeated every day in the year. Occasionally, it is true, we meet with a novel that teaches a great moral lesson, but these seldom appear, and the intervals between them are crowded with the veriest trash that ever filled a vacant head. Weekly newspapers and monthly magazines have amassed fortunes simply by the publication of long "continued stories"—stories that are spun out through a series of weeks and months, evidently for the sole purpose of filling space and purse. They have no mission to humanity—they bring no balm to the suffering—no cure for wounded hearts—no word of hope or love that can reach and satisfy the better nature. Still they are bought by thousands, and read, loaned, and re-read, and that too by those who "have no time to read"—anything that is worth reading.

The "man of the period" will sometimes wake up to the actual state of things far enough to remark learnedly, that "a woman's head is always full of fashions and novels," without stopping to consider that his own cranium has no better furniture. So far as the novels are concerned he has no advantage, and probably the lady would appear on the street as willingly in a last year's dress, as her liege lord would in an old-fashioned coat.

But the reading of fiction has become a disease. It attacks the youthful mind and weakens it long before maturity. The mental appetite soon becomes so morbid that it craves artificial excitement, to the exclusion of everything else, and like opium-eating, the longer the habit is persisted in, the harder it becomes to break it.

The standard works of our public libraries lie almost untouched upon their shelves, while every novel in the collection is well worn with use, and it frequently happens that the very poorest of them all has been handled and read the most.

The human mind, like the body, is composed of what it feeds upon. What, then, must be the character of the young minds of the present generation? No child can develop a pure thought or correct principle from a stream of sickly sentiment. And if he reads volume after volume that is not worth remembering, and which he makes no effort to retain, the power of memory becomes constantly weakened, until it is almost shattered.

The habitual novel reader lies neither the inclination or ability to grasp a thought or reason out a result. His brain is paralyzed by intellectual opiates, and it knows nothing of a healthful growth nor development. This brain-wasting literature is received into American homes and marked out in the lives of children. We see the results all around us. There is one down the street; he is about eighteen or twenty, carries a cane and advertises the clothing stores. He wears a gold watch and chain, is petting an incipient moustache, and perfumes all the atmosphere around him with hair-oil and cigar smoke—probably he chews too, plays cards, and drinks occasionally—he might as well; he isn't the smallest fraction of a man, and never will be—he is simply an empty result.

There are young ladies too, whose minds are formed in the same way. They read half the night, and, of course, must sleep still nearly noon the next day; probably it would be more agreeable to their friends if they slept all day.

Sometimes, however, their parents boast of their being "such great readers," and the girls will tell how many volumes they can read in a week. But they are narrow-chested and hollow-eyed; they are bilious and cross, and hateful generally, unless in company where they feel under obligations to behave themselves—then they are laced and powdered—curled and oiled—perfumed and jeweled—gracious and smiling. This is the class of girls that the "result" visits; and when he goes to see one of them he carries her the last new novel and tells her "it is splendid." She reads it and pronounces it "perfectly lovely."

She has no correct ideas of life, and no conception of duty. Her ideal of womanhood is the heroine of a novel, and her highest ambition is to be pretty, and sit in a parlor and be waited upon. If she can't accomplish this glorious end, she imagines herself persecuted and unappreciated.

Her "lofty spirit" disdains "drudgery;" and if her mother cruelly insists that she shall take care of her own room, she fancies herself the descendant of a royal line who has been kidnapped in infancy by some ignoble family. Her mind is dwarfed and weakened, her nerves shattered, and her physical forces ruined, by a course of reading that she will never relinquish unless compelled to. So much of romance is thrown around life in all its phases, that men and women are shorn of their strength in meeting the practical truth. But nowhere is this so plainly apparent as in the marriage relation. Matrimony is the ultima thule of the novelist. He will lead his characters through seas of blood and oceans of tears, and if they only get married at last they are supposed to be abundantly compensated for all their sufferings.

God forbid that we should detract from the honor and dignity of true marriage. It is ordained of heaven and should be a sacrament to man; but it never can be unless both parties carry it, and to the grave beyond, a love which is holier, deeper, and truer, than the world of fiction has any conception of. The sentiment of lovers may be well enough in its place, but woe to the married pair who build for each other no stronger affection than this, and woe to the hearthstone that is not illumed by reason as well as sanctified by honest affection!

There is a halo around a bridal veil, and a fascination in the orange flowers and wedding ring, that the novelist cannot resist. Hence the people enter the married state with wrong conceptions of themselves and each other; but the husband soon learns that his wife is not an angelic heroine, but actually has her faults, and sometimes lots of them; and she finds that her husband isn't a bit like the model husbands she has read of. No wonder that both parties become dissatisfied, and matters often grow worse instead of better, until the disease becomes chronic. Hence our newspapers are flooded with "matrimonial infelicities" and the proceedings of divorce courts.

Of course the writers and publishers of indiscriminate fiction are not to blame for all of this, but perhaps it would be fair to lay one half of it at their doors.

Give us then a pure literature, one that will not pander to vice nor propagate folly—a literature that shrinks alike the emanations of corrupt fancies and the diseased offspring of imprincipled minds. Fill our land with the purest streams from the fount of learning and the fairest flowers from the wreath of Minerva. Let us wander in the Elysian groves of a literature where no serpents lurk beneath the tempting fruit—where no poisonous plant grows among the flowers or twines round the laurel. Give us the rich fruits of mental culture, unmixed with the "apples of Sodom," and our people will be stronger and purer, our children will be braver and better, and our homes will be happier and nobler.

Take the Restitution.

"Why? Isn't one paper enough? I take the county paper already, and it gives me all the news."

But, see here, friend, does your county paper propose to teach you the way to be saved? Does it make you stop amid the rush of business and the strife for gain and lands to think of God? You love life. You would see length of days. You say, there was no such thing as death in the world. And if there was such a thing as the "elixir of life," you would have it at any cost. Well, our little paper designs to point out to you a way whereby you can enter upon a deathless state—a life that has no end—and one, too, that is exempt from all the evils and sufferings of mortality.

"You do not ministers were paid to tell you such things?"

Have they done it? Are you sure, though you belong to some one of the orthodox churches, that you have the truth? Do you "walk in the light," "do the truth," "keep the word," "keep the commandments?"

Or are you following "many" devised nobles," obeying the traditions of men, and "making God's Law" of no effect? If so, see what will be the end?

Remember, we are to be "obedient to the faith, 'stablished in the faith, striving together for the faith of the gospel."

"But cannot I learn these things from the Bible? It surely teaches the way of salvation."

"You can, if you will throw off the spectacles with which error has blinded your eyes, and study with the humility of a child that is willing to be taught, from its blessed pages.

Yet this objection to taking our paper would apply equally to attending upon any of the means of grace. "You can learn everything from the Book; you need no teachers, no sermons, no helps," when, in fact, you need them all, in a world where so many things are conspiring to lead you away from God?

Examine yourselves, whether or not you have the truth. It is the truth that sanctifies and saves. Try our paper—three months, six months, or a year—and see if we have not the truth. If we have, you ought to know it, accept it, and be saved; if not, it is your duty to find out wherein we err, and by so doing, save us.

S. R. WINCE.

At Home.

Religion at home is more precious than at church, or in the world. Every day each family should worship as regularly as they eat. Have they time to eat? Let the soul have food. Open the Bible and have God talk to the family; pray and praise in song, and on bended knees ask mercies. A family without worship is a domestic orphanage, and a school of unbelief, sensuality, and sin. Without spiritual life at home, it will be wholly lacking or exceedingly thin abroad. Children will grow up Christless; physical objects, and carnal life will absorb attention and engross affection. With pure, sincere, tender religion at home, children will begin to be Christians so soon as they learn of the Savior's love, and never know rebellion. Why should the offspring of saints be for one moment exposed to condemnation? Why should they not know the Savior so soon as they know sin? Generally they will if Christ is honored at the family altar. But he is not honored. Thousands upon thousands of church members live like infidels at home. The Bible is unread, prayer never heard. Can they not read? Why not let God speak to them out of his word? Can they not pray? The Lord's prayer can at least be repeated in concert. Is there no time? It will save time to take counsel of God. It is waste of time and waste of life to ignore God. We can have no real home without him. It requires a Heavenly Father as well as earthly parents to make a sweet, healthful, absolute home.—Baptist Union.

The Destiny of Man.

Nothing is more certain than that man knows nothing of his destiny, but as he derives it from the Scriptures of living truth.

Let us see. Take the Bible away and what would he know of his destiny? He would know a thing, but he as a creature acting out the drama of life, and nothing more. But we find that after God had created the earth, and all that dwell thereon, he said, "Let us make man," the crowning glory of all, "in our image." "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul."

But before we pass further, let us consider the announcement, "The Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground."

Man, at this stage, stands forth entire in all his physical arrangements, though still inanimate, yet a fit subject for animation.

"And God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life," and man becomes what? "a living soul." What becomes a living soul? The man, perfectly formed before, though at the time inanimate, through the influence of inspiration, becomes a living soul. Does a living soul mean an immortal soul? If so, who can affirm that a living horse is not an immortal animal?

If, then, a living soul does not mean an immortal soul, who can say that God created man an immortal soul? Why did not God announce that, he had created man an immortal soul, instead of a living soul? Because he did not make man immortal. Let us see.

"And the Lord said, Of every tree of the Garden thou mayest freely eat, but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil thou shalt not eat of it, for in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." Gen. ii. 16-17. We see from this text that Adam could obey God and live forever, or disobey him and die eternally, never to be resurrected from the ground from whence he was taken. Why? There was no antidote for him, and his death must have been eternal had not Christ come into the world and given himself a ransom, that whosoever believeth on him might have life. Not the present life by any means; for both good and bad have this life, even though they do not believe on the Messiah. But they that believe on him shall have resurrected life; and all who have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, and those who have come up through great tribulation, shall be gathered around the great white throne of God.

But God, through all the prophets, apostles, and Christ, declares that the wicked shall be destroyed,

"The rich man shall lie down, and shall not be gathered; he shall open his eyes, and he is not." Job xxvii. 19.

This is a very remarkable passage. "The rich man shall lie down,"—evidently in the grave, or in death—"and shall not be gathered,"—evidently into the kingdom, in the resurrection; "but he shall open his eyes,"—to see his condemnation,—"and he is not:" that is, he becomes extinct. Could any expression be more clear than that the wicked will be destroyed, burned up: "for God is a consuming fire; for behold the day cometh, that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, all that do wickedly, shall be stubble, and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch." Mal. iv. 1.

The advocates of the immortality of the wicked evade this Scripture by referring it to the destruction of Jerusalem, to which it surely does not refer, for where are all they that do wickedly, both past and present? I cannot see that it refers to Jerusalem, for it agrees with all the rest of the Scriptures, and is to take place at the last day, when all that are in their graves shall come forth, some to life eternal, and some to everlasting destruction.

"The soul that sinneth, it shall die:" what can be plainer? Does it not teach that man is not immortal? For anything that is subject to decay cannot be immortal; therefore man is not immortal.

"But the wicked shall perish, and the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs; into smoke shall they consume away." Ps. xxxvii. 20. What language could more clearly teach the destruction of the wicked? If this passage does not teach the destruction of the wicked, I must confess I do not understand the force of language. But it means just what it says, according with the rest of the Bible, for in Matt. xiii. 30, our Saviour alludes to the destiny of man: "Let both grow together until the harvest; and in the time of the harvest I will say to the reapers, Gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them; but gather the wheat into my barn." If there could be anything obscure in this Scripture, it is perfectly set aside by the Saviour in verses 36 to 48 of the same chapter.

Which will man believe, Jesus or the adversary? There are few that believe the former, and a great many the latter. But we read that Christ was manifested that he might destroy the work. 1 Jno. iii. 8; 1 Cor. xv. 17, 18; St. Paul says: "And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins." "Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." This shows that Christ is the only hope through which we are to have a resurrection. If Christ is not raised from the dead, he is still dead and we cannot hope for resurrection if he is not resurrected. Then those who have died in the faith that Jesus was raised, and through his resurrection hope to be resurrected, they, having fallen asleep, are perished, and only will perish who will not accept of the benefit of the atonement.

It is evident that man is not immortal, from the fact that he was created a living being, instead of an immortal being. Let us see:

"Behold the man has become as one of us, to know good and evil. And now, lest he put forth his hand and take of the tree of life, and eat and live forever, therefore the Lord sent him forth out of the garden to till the ground from whence he was taken,"—as much as to say, "he shall not take of the tree of life and live for ever in his sins; or, man a sinner shall not be immortal." Adam, and all his descendants would have perished had not the Messiah come into the world and died for poor fallen man. And all who will not lay hold on eternal life must perish.

Your brother in Christ,
J. M. HARLAN.

The Wrong Signal.

"What has happened?" said Mr. Hamilton to his son, who entered the room in haste, and with the air of one who has some interesting news to communicate.

"A freight-train has run off the track, and killed a man," said Joseph.

"How did that happen?" said Mr. H. The watchman gave the wrong signal. The engineer said that if he had given the right signal the accident would not have occurred."

Many a man has lost his life from the effects of a wrong signal. This is true of that eternal life which is to come, as well as the present mortal one. The Priests, who pretend to declare "the way of salvation"—but fail to show that one and only true way laid down in the Scriptures, are giving the wrong signal! He who teaches another Gospel, which the Apostle says "is not another" in reality—only a FABLE—is giving the wrong signal, and is in a measure responsible for the eternal death of his followers! In consequence of these wicked switch-tenders, men take the wrong track, and go on to destruction!?

Ho! ye who are travelling the way of life! Look ahead! See that the switch is right! Be careful to look at the switch-tender with a piercing eye—and see that it is not "a wolf in sheeps clothing," who may at any moment, that you may not be aware of it, switch you off the track, and land you in eternal death. Beware of the wrong signal!—Selected.

Berean Casket.

PREPARED BY G. M. MYERS.

A brother writes: "Will you please, through the RESTITUTION, give an explanation of the above Scripture?"

The above Scripture—the reported conversation between Samuel and Saul—is generally believed to teach disembodied consciousness upon the part of Samuel. But that it does not so teach, we offer the following reasons:

1. There is nothing said in the entire case of the return of Samuel's soul or spirit.

2. If anything at all returned and talked to Saul, whatever it was, it came not from heaven, paradise, or any other locality than up out of the earth. See verses 11-14.

3. The character reported to have returned wore Samuel's mantle, which the spirit did not possess.

That God did not bring Samuel's spirit, nor body either, back to converse with Saul, we believe, from the fact that he had refused to communicate to Saul through Dreams, Urim and Prophets—legal and honorable means; and, therefore, we do not believe that God would resort to illegal and dishonorable means.

That this woman, or any other person, ever possessed the power to raise the dead, only as they received that power from God, Christ not excepted, the Bible plainly teaches.

The power this woman possessed was not of God, for his law condemned her to death. See Ex. xxii. 18, Lev. xix. 31, xx. 27; Deut. xviii. 10-11, I Sam. xxviii. 3, 9-10.

That her power to accomplish any work whatever came from demons or fallen angels we deny; for these were cast down to hell, as 2 Pet. ii. 4, says. And, as the word hell here comes from Tartarus, the locality of the wicked in Hades, therefore, these fallen angels and all others who get into Hades must, as long as they remain there, be silent and inactive. See Psa. cxv. 17; Ecc. ix. 10.

The idea that power came from any source whatever without, the language of the text does not justify. The term "familiar spirits" in the text does not come from the words rendered spirit, neither in the Hebrew nor Greek. In the Hebrew the characters are ateeb, signifying belly-breaths, and in the Greek the word is engastrimuthos, having the same significance as the Hebrew. Therefore, the woman was simply a ventriloquist, and deceived Saul. Saul did not see Samuel, but talked to him, as he supposed; whereas, it was the woman deceiving him through the power of ventriloquism.

That the woman lied to Saul is evident, from the fact that what she said relative to Saul's death the next day did not transpire. See 1 Sam. xx-x. xxx., xxxi., and 2 Sam. i. 1-10.

The Name of God.

The following list, comprising the name of God in forty-eight languages, was compiled by the well-known French philologist, Louis Berger, in the following manner:

One day, as he was walking along the streets of Paris, he heard a voice beseeching him to buy some nuts. Upon looking back he discovered that it was the voice of his old barber, who was gaining a scanty living by selling nuts on the street. To aid him, he hastily made out and gave to the barber the following list:

Hebrew—Elohim, Jhoah	Gaelic tongue—Dea
Chaldee—Elhah	German & Swiss—Gott
Assyrian—Ehah	Flemish—Good

John Randolph, of Roanoke, said to Mr. Clopton, a neighboring Baptist minister, "When I was a young man, infidelity, through the influence of Mr. Jefferson and the French Revolution, was common among young men of culture and rank. I sympathized with it; but I scorned to be an infidel without careful and thorough investigation. I thought it fair that I should first read the Bible; but I had not read it through before I became convinced that uninspired men could no more have written it than a mule could have composed the 'Principia' of Newton."

THE RESTITUTION

PLYMOUTH, IND.....Mar. 29, 1876

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.

We hope our friends will address all letters, orders and communications direct to THE RESTITUTION. Everything intended for publication is at once passed over to us, so that it is necessary to address only THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Ind. If our correspondents will attend to this strictly, it will save us much trouble.

Our meetings in Plymouth on Sunday last were well attended, considering the bad roads. Four were added to the congregation. Bro. Myers is busy at Maxenkuckee and has been for two weeks. He is meeting with good success. A congregation is soon to be organized of between thirty and forty members. The outlook there, for a large society is very encouraging. Indications are that we shall have a number of new additions in Plymouth soon. The Gospel is yet proving the power of God unto salvation to all who will believe it.

☞ Bro. Culveyhouse, of Ligonier, has renounced Sabbatarianism. He was led to embrace the dogma of keeping the seventh day through the labors of one Lane, who has spent much time in Ligonier in presenting the views of Mrs. White, etc. Bro. C. attended our lectures at Ligonier, last fall, and saw the sophisms of Lane & Co. exposed. A goodly number of friends in Ligonier were set adrift by those desiring to be teachers of the law; but they are now convinced that Jesus and not Moses is the true foundation on which to build.

☞ Down in Terre Haute, this state, there are a number of individuals who yet believe in the materialization of spirits. It is claimed that a young man appeared, with hat and boots, at the door of the medium's cabinet. An old man present recognized him as his son. Who ever knew a case of materialization but what some poor deluded soul would claim the "spirit" as his or her own dear child? We hope the time is not far distant when honest people will get sick of hunting for spooks, and attend to the realities of this life. Spiritualism is undergoing constant changes as exposures follow each other in rapid succession.

☞ Hymns printed on leaflets and circulated through the congregation is a good, practical way to teach the truth, and at the same time give every one an opportunity to sing or hear with the understanding. We have commenced printing such leaflets for our congregation in Plymouth, and find that the plan works admirably. Those of the brethren who have good hymns which do not appear in the hymn books will please send them to us, and we will print them and return if desired. Preaching brethren will find the leaflets very desirable in new places. Excellent textual mottos are printed on each leaflet. Those who may desire them can order them for thirty cents per hundred. Four hymns on each leaflet.

The True Life.

Some people have an idea that if they only belong to a church, endorse the catechism and pay pew rent, they are sure of gaining eternal life. This is, however, a wild mistake. Christianity has many a duty to be performed, as well as a belief of its doctrines. It is not a creed, a prayer book or a catechism that will save men. Neither will a long face or long prayers save men. They must have pure hearts and clean hands if they ever expect to pass the golden gate and gather the ripe fruits of immortality. There are thousands of people who belong to churches who do not know what real Christianity is. They are formal in their faith, and as cold as an iceberg in their worship. Men need the love of the Father and the spirit of his Son in order to commune with the soul of true faith in Christ.

Prof. Proctor's Theory.

Prof. Proctor of England, has been lecturing to the people of Chicago, upon the Life and Death of Worlds. Prof. Proctor takes the position that all worlds are finite, and that great changes are coming etc. We will here append what that gentleman says about our globe. Of course the learned professor knows nothing tangible upon the subject, but our readers will be interested in seeing what the "earthly wise" say about things which God calls "foolishness" See 1. Cor.

Our planet is entering already upon the stage of decay. There was a gradual decadence of man physically, and disappearance of atmosphere and water. Our sun might die out as did one in the constellation of the Great Bear, some years since, and in that case vegetation and the higher forms of life would perish. Of all the planetary bodies, not one but was finite, and had its fixed period of existence. Take Sirus, for instance, which exceeded the sun several thousand times in bulk; when that perished, all others would have been destroyed, and the universe would be at an end. From this conclusion there was only one escape. It might be that man had one mistake in all calculations. It was possible that beyond our universe there existed yet other universes, series after series, in comparison with which the whole of our millions of planets and suns form but an atom.

The Union Movement.

There seems to be a strong feeling on the part of many for all who claim to be looking for the coming and kingdom of Christ to unite. If we understand the Word of God, all who are in harmony with the life and Gospel of Christ are one already. They may be isolated, or buried up under some peculiar name or ism, yet all who believe and obey Christ are one. It often happens that the disciples of Jesus are in supposed conflict when they are only under some human classification or system. Sectarianism is just as destructive now as it was in apostolic times. In the early days of the Church, some were for Paul, some for Apollos, and some for Peter. Here was the beginning of three churches, and if allowed to run, it would have resulted in a general split of the church at Corinth. And yet the members of each church would have believed and obeyed the same great truths of the Gospel. We see, therefore, that it is not always faith but names, which creates the real difference in churches.

When Jesus prayed for his disciples to be one, he did not say that they should all be followers of Paul, or of Peter. Neither did he say that they should be one in all things, but one in spirit, and one in the great work of teaching and obeying the Gospel of the Blessed Lord. No two persons have ever yet been so perfectly united in faith as to have it said that they believed the same things to the same extent. Indeed, the New Testament states that a husband and his wife are one. But there may be certain differences which do not invalidate the marriage contract, or render the lives of the two in one miserable. Men are to be married to Christ, they are to come into covenant relation to him, but that they all will have the exact amount of faith, and believe to the same extent, we do not so understand the Divine Word. There seems to be certain great truths set forth in the Holy Oracles, which constitute an essential faith in the Gospel of Christ. But there is no statement in a certain number of articles to which the child of God must subscribe. We do not think that any human tribunal has any right to say that God's people shall believe one or thirty-nine articles. Whenever the Divine Word acts upon any man sufficiently to move him to forsake sin and take up his cross and follow Christ, we believe he is then a disciple of our Lord and Master. Any set phrases, therefore, or any given number of articles will not alter the facts. It would be just as consistent for a man and his wife, on entering the marriage state, to draw up articles of agreement, as for those who are to be united to Christ to be forced to endorse a given number of articles of faith. We believe in the broadest liberty consonant with the spirit and teachings of Christ, and are willing to co-operate with any or all who accept God's word as their only rule of faith and practice, and who make Christian character a basis of fellowship. Upon these terms we unite with all who thus act and believe. We have no religious axes to grind, no party to subserve, and no ambition to gratify. Let all who claim to stand upon the word of the ever-living Father act as children of one family, and let all issues of a speculative character alone. The time has come when petty notions, untaught questions, speculations about the past or future, should give place to the all-important work of building men up in Christ, and preparing them for that KINDLESS LIFE soon to be given. We do not claim to express the views of any one but ourselves, and in these we are willing to stand until the Judge of the quick and the dead shall call us hence.

The Eastern Question.

The following item, we clip from the editorial columns of the World's Crisis. The writer, Miles Grant, evidently is watching the rising question of the East, but he seems to think that Christ will come before the Jews get back their land, etc. All this may be true, but he must remember that the "times of restitution" are just as much a period as the "times of Gentiles." Bro. Grant believes the 1,000 years of Revelation xx. are yet future, and that Christ is to reign on earth during that period. This is a step in the right direction. Any Bible student it seems to us, must see that there is to be an age after Christ comes. That age is one wherein Satan is bound that he should deceive the nations no more till the thousand years should be fulfilled. —Rev. xx. 3. But here is the extract:

"There is evidence that the Jews think their land is not to 'be trodden down of the Gentiles' not a short time longer. But it must be 'trodden down' till 'the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled.' When they are fulfilled, we may expect the return of Jesus to set up 'the kingdom of heaven.' Some of the Jews now hold very prominent positions in the old world. Mr. Disraeli, of Jewish origin, is the Prime Minister of the British government. The Messrs. Rothschild (Jews) hold the purse strings of Europe. Their influence is immense. It is said the Jews are waiting for the opportunity to purchase Palestine, or a portion of it, when the Turks are ready to sell. We think the rightful Heir to David's throne will return before the Jews can purchase the land. The Lord says, 'The land is mine,' and 'shall not be sold for ever.' Lev. xxv. 23.

The Advance says:—

"Without being too sanguine, we think that striking events are immediately before us. The finger of God is certainly moving forward the hand on the dial toward noon. If, as interpreters of prophecy almost universally believe, we are on the eve of the day of millenial glory, we cannot but conclude that the events now transpiring in the East are, partly at least, struggles between the darkness and the light as the morning breaks."

Yes, we believe 'the day of millenial glory' is at hand. 'Striking events' are about to open that will astonish the world, shake the very foundations of society, and cause men's hearts to fail them with fear. The converging lines of prophecy are continually approaching their terminal point. The end must be soon." M. G.

On the Union of the Two Conferences.

BROTHER REED: I have for some time been looking for and hoping to see something in THE RESTITUTION with regard to the two conferences of this State coming together. I see in the A. C. Times that Bro. Field has introduced the subject. I heartily concur with Bro. Field in saying, "We do not demand the surrender of any right" [or the relinquishment of conscientious religious principle] "in order to union. But we do insist that nothing but faith in Christ and obedience to his commandments shall be made a condition of union or test of fellowship. I am for freedom of opinion, for an untrammeled conscience, but at the same time subject to the laws of liberty. While all are free to think" [and speak] "for themselves, they are, nevertheless, forbidden to make schisms and divisions on account of differences of opinion." And I can heartily agree with Bro Crozier, in his reply to Bro. Field, when he says: "Amen; let it be done, not in word only, but in deed and in truth." And I understand Bro. Crozier to say that he desires "a cordial co-operation—a little more than that, hearty Christian fellowship—with freedom of opinion and speech, subject to the laws of Christ." So then, as Bro. Field says, let all have "the right to say what we think will be done after the Lord comes." And I would ask, Why let differences of opinion about "what will be done after the Lord comes" divide, or even mar the union and fellowship of brethren? If I can not see, as some do, that when Christ comes, then immediately the judicial judgment and condemnation—i. e., the sentence of destruction is passed upon the wicked; Satan and all his works, together with all that adhere to him, will be destroyed; sin, wickedness and mortality done away with; the curse removed from the earth by a purification, or renewing by fire—then Christ's kingdom is set up on the new earth, and that Christ will reign over immortalized beings forever. (This, for convenience sake, we call Theory No. 1.)

While myself, and perhaps many others (with all due deference I would say it), do just as honestly believe: That Christ's kingdom will be set up here on earth immediately after his coming, and that He will reign, for an appointed time, over the house of Jacob—i. e., the natural descendants of Jacob—and the nations of earth, in a mortal state, and subdue the nations unto himself. And that this time is termed by Peter, "times of refreshing, times of restitution." And that during this time Satan is to be bound, so as not to deceive the nations; and, also, that during this reign Christ is to "put down all rule, and all authority and power," yes "put all enemies under his feet." The kingdom spoken of in Dan. ii. 44 will "break in pieces and consume all these" [earthly] "kingdoms." And, further, that the saints are to be associated with Christ in this reign. (This we call Theory No. 2.)

Now, by leaving out the word "immediately," the second word in the first theory, we believe that the main points in each theory will be accomplished in their proper time. Christ will come and reign, sitting on David's throne, reigning over the house of Jacob; that he will judicially judge and condemn the wicked, destroy the devil and all his works; that the earth will be renewed. But, if Theory No. 1 is correct, how is Christ to sit on David's throne, which was a rule, reign and government over mortal beings? and the house of Jacob, which is the natural descendants of Jacob? How will Christ, as Paul says, (1 Cor., xv. 24-28) reign till he hath "put down all rule, and all authority and power—all enemies under his feet" if all that was done before his kingdom was set up? And how can Christ's promise to his disciples (Luke xxii. 29-30) be fulfilled if the judgment and condemnation and the destruction of the wicked was before Christ's kingdom was set up? The promise is: "I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me, that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel."

Again: How is the devil to be bound during the millenial reign of Christ, if he was destroyed before this reign began? And, even if he was not destroyed, why bind him? There were no nations or beings, except immortal beings, for him to deceive. And, again: How is the kingdom of God (Dan. ii. 44) to break in pieces and consume all other kingdoms, if the judgment and the destruction of the wicked was before the kingdom was set up? Surely, there was no kingdoms to destroy; done long ago.

But, then, suppose that either of those theories be true and correct. Suppose that Judah and Israel are, or are not to be gathered to their fatherland after the coming of Christ. What particular difference does it make with us as it regards our own personal future salvation? Does not our salvation depend upon our believing that "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life?" and on embracing Jesus as our Saviour? and repenting of and forsaking our sins, and obeying his commands and being baptized? "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned." Why, brethren, our salvation is not based in the Scriptures on the belief of the literal gathering together of the Jews and the conversion and salvation of a remnant of them, and that God will turn away ungodliness from Jacob, however strong the testimony of that fact may be. And we think that that testimony is as full and strong, as that God has power to rule day and night. (See Jer. xxxi. 31-40, and Jer. xxxiii. 14-26.) Then, why let such things separate the Advent ranks? By being so divided we weaken our power. Then let us come up in one solid phalanx against the power of darkness, and labor for the salvation of souls.

Serious Thoughts and Plain Questions.

BY C. COLEGROVE.

I have returned in safety from eight weeks of arduous labor, in a part of the mining region of the great state of Pennsylvania. An account of the journey, the work, and the results, may be reserved to another writing. If it please God, some fruit will appear in a coming day. Meanwhile, I take the occasion to suggest some thoughts and conclusions which have developed in the course of this period of meditation and study upon the word of God. And first of all, I have a disposition, and a necessity to acknowledge, constantly, both present imperfection and past short-coming. Everything human is necessarily imperfect; but the word of God is perfect. In the retrospect, I have continually to realize some degree of failure and deficiency, both in knowledge and in action. The idea or claim of perfection, for me, would be folly or madness, or both. But with the same explicitness and heartiness with which the confession of conscious demerit and deficiency is made, with the same and even greater plainness, is the declaration of faith in the teaching of God's book. And it is this which induces the suggestion of certain serious inquiries, which are for the consideration of sober and truly thoughtful minds.

What is the doctrinal position and condition of Protestant christendom at this date? Upon the most careful reflection, we are compelled to answer, alienated, unscriptural, and corrupt, in a great and alarming degree. This is the grand conclusion, and if it were not so, we would never so declare and maintain. But there is no alternative. There is such a startling array of unholy and ungodly tenets and teachings, that we are constrained to recoil from them, deprecating any contact of the mind with them (except in the way of condemnation,) as unjust and injurious. We speak alike with emphasis and deliberation. And right here, in advance, and before attempting an enumeration, or synopsis of the false representations of orthodoxy, we are constrained to ask, how, or whereby, or wherein, is any fellowship with this corrupt and plague-struck system, possible or lawful? This is a righteous and frequent question. We are compelled to propound it, with a full view of its propriety, and yet without the power to measure the magnitude of the meaning involved in it. For so powerful is the spell, or so pestilent the bondage of old opinions, that it is difficult to be so disencumbered and disencumbered as to apprehend clearly all the evil which they contain or entail, on the one hand, or the happiness and advantage of a full deliverance, on the other. Nor, indeed, is full liberty, and perfect deliverance, reached so easy as some might imagine. As an evil odor may linger in a drawer, ever so well cleaned and aired, so some sinister shadow of an old notion may remain to plague the mind in which the falsehood was once entrenched. But, oh, blessed liberty, (though not absolute perfection) still ever even increasingly blessed.

Practically, now, how is it possible to hold a membership in this grand extension, even though in the way of an off-shoot or appendix, of the old corrupt and abominable Babylon? We ask conscientiously, and earnestly how? How is it possible to sympathize or fraternize, or co-operate with the mother or any of the progeny? We do not wish to look at numbers, antiquity, reminiscences, wealth, morality, influence, association, or even a kind of venerable, or seemingly precious sacredness. What of all these things? Who can affiliate with an infected ecclesiasticism which enshrines in its citadel, the ancient and deadly satanism of natural immortality? Here is the old poison, the first great deadly seed of the serpent, which has so spoiled our world, and the very seed itself is set fast in the Protestant wing of Babylon; and not only that, but guarded—jealously guarded, defended and fought for, and every assault upon, or motion against it, resisted, and more or less resented, and satan himself so far guarded and retained in the very church itself! And can I, as honest, faithful, loyal, truth-loving, even dare to live, and not object and protest, both against the error of the doctrine, and the error of teaching it, revering it, allowing it, or having any connection or fellowship with it, whatever, under the sun? One's cheek tingles, and blood warms, and heart throbs in the meditation.

Let the confession be made—I have formerly joined in so-called revival effort with an "orthodox" minister. I mourn over it, and repent of it. What fellowship hath light with darkness? Will I confide in his, or any man's profession of holiness, who has his theological system and pulpit ministrations crammed with ungodly and unscriptural ideas? Is this the holiness after which I aspire, or want to aspire? Will I ever again associate with such a teacher of falsehoods, in any work of attempted reformation of men? And so far as I can judge, I can say I would rather walk and work alone, if need be. I bid adieu forever to the whole category of corruptions, and to all the fellowships, sympathies, affiliations and co-operations thereof, and turn my back on them, and will have no part or lot in them. All this comes after painful and varied experience: and after doubts, and delays, and some tossing to and fro on the sea of inquiry, and after agonizing prayer, and much erring, even, with tears to God. It will never do, to be connected with this mess of corruption. We may even call Christian character the only test of fellowship, but the sharp inquiry rises. What is Christian character? Is it mere morality, or is it obedience to God's word? The great test of love to Christ, be it remembered, is keeping His commandments. False teaching is practical disloyalty. How easy it is to illustrate this! He who teaches some other way to reach immortal life than by the second coming of Christ,—who teaches that man is not truly dead in death, thus denying that God's word to Adam was made good, who teaches that the kingdom comes before Christ comes, who teaches that the penalty of sin is everlasting torment, and not death, who teaches that Christ did not truly die, and so make a true atonement, who teaches that Christ is not truly the son of God, but one and the same in person with the Father, who teaches that sprinkling is baptism, or "that a man may be born of water by the touch of some man's wet finger to his forehead, who teaches the conversion of the world before the coming of Christ, who teaches in any way that it is right or safe to live otherwise than as a pilgrim or stranger, who teaches that glory lies beyond the sky, and that the kingdom is not under the whole heaven, and many other such fables and follies,—can I dishonor God by consenting unto man's corruption, by coalescing with him in attempting to convert men? Convert men to what? If we are assured that it is a great and good work to convert men to God—so indeed it is; but are they converted to God by a dreadfully corrupted Gospel? Or what must God think of the monstrous misrepresentations of His character, and His word, through which, or along with which, men are sought or said to be converted to Him? Or, what must He think of mingling and mixing with men and means that are so far from His pure word, as we well know and clearly understand, having measured the porch and temple of that Babylon that is reserved unto fire, and from which, and out of which, every man who will have security in the day of the crucible, or in the day of conflagration, will do the best thing to make all haste to escape? We write warmly, for we have something to write.

I acknowledge I had a kind of reverence for Moody and Sankey, and their work, but the reverence is much tarnished. What is a Gospel, adulterated (though not quite so much as that of the post millenial orthodox,) in comparison with a Gospel that shakes itself of its man-added inventions, and rejoices and struggles ever to perfect its purity, and redemption from the plague of blasphemous or corrupt appendages? To teach the truth is honor enough, and faithful witness-bearing is real loyalty, and loyalty is righteousness.

But I have written nearly enough for one sitting. I have not much faith in a sanctification that has a root running down deep into the sour muck of false teachings, and it is better to suffer and die for the right, than to live dabbling with wrong-doers; for wrong teaching is wrong doing. Let us have a mind of stern mould for God in His word, though the heavens fall.

Here is a little schedule of popular errors, and it is not complete either: Conversion of the world before the advent; immortality of the soul, or spirit, or both; consciousness of the dead; endless misery; the kingdom now set up on earth; heaven above the sky; conversion, the birth of the spirit; the present, the reign of the spirit; sprinkling or pouring for baptism; the trinity of God; corollaries of these things are, the soul going to heaven or hell, at death; Christ coming at death; getting the victory through death; death meaning torment, and life happiness; souls revisiting the earth; the non-Sonship of Christ; the personality of the Spirit; praying to the Spirit; praising the Spirit, (as in the doxology); church-creedism, church-time-serving and pleasure loving; church cathedralism, or palace-building; the machinery of protracted meetings, and many works of the devil.

Praying in the Spirit, and for the Spirit, is right; but is it right to pray to the Spirit.

Love Not the World.—1 John ii. 15.

O love not the world, ye who hope for a crown
When your Lord shall descend from above;
Seek not for its honors, its fame or renown,
They are trifles unworthy your love.

O love not the world nor its glittering toys,
Which dazzle to lead you astray;
From its uncertain riches and perishable joys
Turn your hearts and affections away.

O love not the world, for its end is at hand,
And its glory must soon pass away;
Your treasure should be in that heavenly land,
Which knows neither blight nor decay.

O love not the world, for your home is not here,
You are pilgrims and strangers at best;
But look to the future and be of good cheer,
The weary will soon be at rest.

Then love not this world, but the one yet to come—
The land of the good and the pure,
Where the pilgrims shall rest in their beautiful home,
And its glory shall ever endure.

The Last Call of Mercy.

'Tis the last call of mercy that lingers for thee,
O sinner, receive it, to Jesus now flee;
His offered salvation and love are abused;—
He often has called thee, but thou hast refused

If thou slightest the warning now offered at last,
Thine will be the sad mourning,—the harvest is past;
Salvation I've slighted, the summer is o'er,
And now there is pardon—sweet pardon no more!

'Tis the last call of mercy, O turn not away;
For now swiftly hasteth, the dread vengeance day.
The Savior invites you,—and pleads with you come;
O come to life's waters,—nor thirstingly roam.

'Tis the last call of mercy that lingers for thee;
Break away from thy bondage,—O sinner be free,
Be not a sad mourner—"the harvest is past
The summer is ended,"—and perish at last!

A Remnant of Israel to be Saved.

"True is the word, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom first am I."—Tim. i. 15,—English.

The apostle, though a great sinner, obtained mercy because he sinned ignorantly, through unbelief. He seems to have been so set, and mad against the despised Nazarene, that nothing less than the revelation of that just one, whom he persecuted, could break down his stubborn unbelief. Mark the reason given why he was the first thus called, to-wit: "That on me first, (before the rest of blind Israel,) Jesus Christ might show forth all long suffering, for a pattern to them, which should hereafter, (by seeing as Paul did), believe on him to life everlasting.' This conversion of Paul's was a little extraordinary, and he was, "as one born before the time" set for the conversion of his blind brethren. 1 Cor. xv. 8. Then, according to the pattern, or example, may we not expect that Christ will yet, in the future, show the same long suffering and disposition to save "the lost sheep of the house of Israel."—by the same means, —the personal manifestation of himself, to again graft them into their own good olive trees. Rom. xi. 24, 26.

The apostle offers his conversion as proof that God had not cast away his people. Rom. xi. 1. But the strength of the proof, is in the assurance given, that the same extraordinary means will be used, when their Deliverer comes to Zion to turn away ungodliness from Jacob.

Being grieved at the blindness and hardness of his kinsmen after the flesh, he says he could wish himself accursed from Christ for them. He saw the awful judgments threatened against them for not hearing that prophet raised up like unto Moses. Acts iii. 22, 23. The threatened punishments of a broken covenant (Lev. xxvi., that they should be), as a hiss and a by-word throughout all lands, while the Gospel is being preached to the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for his name.

A few believed and will become the sons of God at the coming of Christ, and were saved from the curse brought upon the unwilling who were blinded, "according as it is written. See Rom. xi. 32. "For God hath concluded them all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all." In this, their present condition, they are spoken of as the lost sheep of the house of Israel. "Their shepherds have caused them to go astray. They have forgotten their resting place." While in this condition, God's appointed shepherd is represented as saying, "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself; but in me is thy help. I will be thy king." Hosea xiii. 9, 10. The number, "all Israel" to be saved, may not include all related to the house of Jacob or Israel, "For they are not all Israel that are of Israel," (Rom. ix. 6,) but that class spoken of as sheep, who will then occupy a place on the right hand of the shepherd, Matt. xxv. 32, 33. "Who have had a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge. Who being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God." Rom. x. 2, 3. This seems to be the Israel the apostle had in his mind when he asks if God had cast away his people. The class addressed by Jesus when he said, "Behold your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you, ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." This is a strong intimation that those unbelieving Jews, or Israel addressed, will, in some future time, rejoice in seeing him; and seems to be foretold by the prophets. Though the sinful kingdom of Israel has been destroyed, as predicted, yet has God promised not to destroy the house of Jacob. "For I am with thee, saith the Lord, to save thee: though I make a full end of all nations whither I have scattered thee, yet will I not make a full end of thee: but I will correct thee in measure, and will not leave thee altogether unpunished." Jer. xxx. 11; iv. 27. They have been sifted among the nations, "yet shall not the least grain fall upon the earth," to be lost. Amos ix. 9. The chaff to be destroyed, but not the wheat. They have fallen in death throughout all lands, but the word of God says, "Behold, O my people, I will open your graves and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel. And ye shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob my servant, wherein your fathers have dwelt, and my beloved shall be their prince forever." Ezek. xxxvii. 12-25; Isa. xxv. 8; Hosea xiii. 14.

At his first coming they cried out as predicted. Isa. xxx. 11. "Cause the holy one of Israel to cease from before us. And therefore will the Lord wait, (at the right hand of the father until), they, his enemies be made his footstool," Acts ii. 34, 35), that he may be gracious unto them. He will be very gracious unto them at the voice of their cry, when he shall hear it, he will answer thee: "Blessed are all they that wait for him." Isa. xxx. 18, 19. They are still waiting for their promised Deliverer. But the Lord hath a controversy with Judah and will punish Jacob according to his ways." Hosea xii. 2. Speaking of the ten tribes, he exclaims in most pathetic strains: "How shall I give thee up Ephraim? How shall I deliver thee, Israel? How shall I make thee as Admah? How shall I set thee as Zeboim? My heart is turned within me, my repentings are kindled together. I will not return (from the Father's right hand) to destroy Ephraim; for I am God and not man; the holy one in the midst of thee," after his return. Hosea xi. 8, 9. "After their uncircumcised hearts shall be humbled, and they accept the punishment of the iniquity," will God remember the covenant with their father's and the land. Lev. xxvi. 41, 44. Then will God bring again the captivity of Jacob, and have mercy upon the whole house of Israel. "The remnant of his heritage, he retaineth not his anger forever, because he delighteth in mercy." Micah. vii. 18, 20. "Then shall they know that I am the Lord their God, which caused them to be led into captivity among the nations; but I have gathered them into their own land, and have left none of them any more there." Ezek. xxxix. 25, 28. Their Deliverer's prayers: "Father forgive them for they know not what they do," is now answered; also Paul's "desire and prayer to God for Israel, that they might be saved. At this time the Lord says: "Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem,"—the city and capital of Israel's king and Deliverer, the person and place from whence they have, of old, been taught to look for salvation. Isa. lxvi. 13; Psa. xiv. 7; cxxxii. 14. "And cry unto her that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned; for she hath received of the Lord double (two captivities) for her sins."

The all Israel promised salvation at this time, cannot include such as "See Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom, and they themselves thrust out." The had first gathered in the net with the good, are to be cast away. Matt. xiii. 48. The chaff to be burned up with fire unquenchable. The fire baptism mentioned by John the Immerser. Neither as Elias and others have hastily concluded, are all to be lost-past recovery, who have not believed in Jesus during the time allotted the Gentiles. For, says the apostle: "Even so then at this present time also there is a remnant according to the election of grace," when their case seems as hopeless to the professed Christian world as it did to the prophet. Rom. xi. 3, 4, 5. And as predicted "Except the Lord of Sabaoth had left them a seed, they had been as Sodoma, and been made like unto Gomorrah." Rom. ix. 29; x. 5. This saved remnant of the house of Israel seems not to embrace those who, during their dispersion have believed in Jesus, for their salvation takes place before the gathering and salvation of the house of Jacob, or Israel, and is a far greater salvation than is promised the house of Israel when the Lord returns. The restored Israel, are mortal men, women and children, who multiply in the land until their place will become too strait for them, and will say, "give place to me, that I may dwell." Isa. xlix. 20-26. The saints, at the coming of Christ, are made immortal, and constitute with Jesus the royal house of God, whose first business, seems to be, to save the house of Israel; and missionaries will be selected from Israel to preach the Gospel of the next age to all the world. Rev. xiv. 6, 7. Then, "as it is written, how beautiful are the feet of them that preach the Gospel of peace, and bring glad tidings of good things," now enjoyed by Israel, and offered to the world. Isa. lii. 7; lxvi. 12-19. There are two classes, referred to, as waiting for the Lord. Isa. lxiv. 4, 5. Unbelieving Israel who are "Beloved for the Fathers' sakes," Rom. xi. 28, and believers in Christ. "They, (the latter class) have remembered thee in thy ways," and rejoice to meet their Lord, having been clothed upon with his righteousness. While the other class discover that he is wroth—"For we have sinned;" in those, (rejoicing ones), is continuance, "and we shall be saved," though "we are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags." They now learn why their Lord has for so long a time hid his face from them,—that Jesus of Nazareth is, indeed, their King,—and humbly beseech him to "Be not wroth very sore, neither remember iniquity forever," (verse 9). "And shall mourn for him, as one mourneth for his only son." Zech. xii. 10. "Then shall they remember their own evil ways, and their doings that were not good, and shall loathe themselves in their own sight, for their iniquities and for their abominations," Ezek. xxxvi. 31, as typified in the story of Joseph and his brethren. This is the Father's set time to restore again the kingdom to Israel and this saved remnant, selected from all the tribes, (Rev. vii.,) became the subjects of the kingdom of heaven—kingdom of God. Christ and the saints form the royal house promised King David. 1 Chron. xvii. 11, 12. The "little flock," to whom God has now given the kingdom, not of Israel only, but "Over all people, nations and languages," "An everlasting dominion which shall not pass away." The unbelieving house of Judah are known among all nations, while but few seem to realize that the other house of Israel are mixed up among the nations, and have had the Gospel preached to them more or less, since the memorable day of Pentecost, and many doubtless have fallen asleep in Christ and will awake in the morning of the first resurrection. But the large majority of this second house of Israel, as predicted, will be found "turned away from the truth and turned into fables," when the Lord returns; and he will prove a "stone of stumbling and rock of offence," to them as to the other house of Israel, at his first coming. Isa. viii. 14. The house of Judah saw nothing in Jesus of Nazareth to desire him for their King. The other house have fixed up a kingdom above, they know not where, for Christ and the saints, and will as stubbornly oppose the temporality of the kingdom as the others did their king. They have not heeded the admonition to "Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ." Col. ii. 8. This latter house of Israel have heaped to themselves false teachers, who privily have brought in their damnable heresies, and seem as blind, as honest and set as was Saul of Tarsus; and nothing less than the revelation and voice of that just one, will turn them from the error of their way. May that voice soon be heard among them, and Israel arise and shine, and give light to the world. "For behold darkness covers the earth and gross darkness the people," and there is no hope for the world until the Lord shall arise upon Israel, and his glory shall be seen upon them. Isa. lx. 1. "The Lord shall save the tents of Judah first," before the other tribes. Zech. xii. 7, 8. "At that day shall the Lord defend the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and he that is feeble among them at that day shall be as David, and the house of David (Christ and the saints) shall be as God." "Upon Mount Zion shall be deliverance, and there shall be holiness, and the house of Jacob shall possess their possessions. And the house of Jacob shall be a fire, and the house of Joseph (Ezek. xxxvii. 19) a flame, and the house of Esau for stubble,—and there shall not be any remaining of the house of Esau (in the promised land of Israel) for the Lord hath spoken it." The Strait Gate.

Enter ye in at the strait gate; for wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction and many there be which go in thereat. Because strait is the gate and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it.—Matt. vii—13, 14.

Our text, or heading, is taken from the teachings of the Son of God who spoke, or taught, as never man spoke or taught; and is worthy of our most profound consideration. He was the full embodiment of wisdom and knowledge, having proceeded and come forth from the Father, he cheerfully complies with the requirements of his Eternal Father, and proceeds without delay to possess himself of the necessary qualifications to perform the great and wonderful works which God in his wisdom had ordained to be accomplished. At the appointed time, he hastened to the Jordan, and requests John the immerser to perform the ordinance of baptism in which he receives the anointing of the Holy Spirit. Immediately after his baptism and anointing he was led up of the spirit into the wilderness to pass through the fearful conflict with the adversary. After forty days and forty nights fasting, the enemy begins the fearful conflict; the Son of God nobly meets every point of attack with a Thus saith the Lord, or Thus it is written. The devil, being foiled in every attempt, leaves the Savior master of the field, and angels minister unto him. He, without delay, enters his field of labor, and performs most nobly the great work which his Divine Father assigned to him, and most faithfully has he proved his fidelity to the trust confided to him. His first work was in promulgating, or proclaiming, a new code of laws and by-laws, to govern and discipline the church, his body, during the times of the Gentiles. See his Sermon on the Mount, as also his public discourses, his parables, and his private talk to his Apostles. All are interspersed with deep and profound wisdom; that grand legacy we have left us as our guide and instructor, and by its words are men to be judged in the last day. The Son of God, as a teacher, was truthful to the very letter in all things that he uttered. He was eloquent, logical, argumentative and illustrative, often using some symbol or figure that his hearers were familiar with, the more deeply to impress his hearers with the importance of what he was endeavoring to teach them. Hence, the "strait gate;" this was a figure with which his hearers were familiar, and when used and applied as an illustration of Christian life and conduct, they could not escape its force and power. Does it apply to the Gentile church with equal force as to the Jews? Most certainly it does. Then is modern Christianity most beautifully apostate. But it is not our prerogative or purpose to sit in judgment upon modern Christianity. Their condition is, indeed, lamentable. With an open Bible before them, the wonderful fulfilment of prophecy, our near proximity to the judgment, the blind leading the blind, they will not know till the flood comes and takes them all away—the Savior's own words.

Our present work and duty is with the household, the one body, the called-out and separate ones. Allow us to call attention to a parallel passage to our text: "Then said one unto him, Lord are there few that will be saved? And he said unto them, Strive to enter in at the strait gate; for many, I say unto you, will seek to enter in and shall not be able." Luke xiv. 22. This with me is a fearful scripture. After all that God has done on his part to save us poor worms of earth, and the bright shining light that has illumined our pathway, we should cling to some forbidden idol—it may be a wedge of gold, or something I will not name, (dear brethren, you and I well know what it is)—God has placed within each breast a faithful monitor. We can't deceive ourselves. We may try the fearful experiment, and meet the dreadful result, but not to know it is out of the question. A close examination of our hearts, with an honest and a careful comparison of our works with the teaching of the Master, is all-important and very profitable to the devoted servant of the Lord Jesus Christ. That wedge of gold! How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God! It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. What constitutes a rich man, in our Savior's teaching? We answer: Anything he possesses over his real wants and necessities. This comes very close home. We tremble, and ask with the Apostles: Who, then, can be saved? Are we not to lay up for a rainy day? The Savior has given no such commandment. Does it not read: "He that does not provide for his own household has denied the faith and is worse than an infidel?" Yes, it reads just so; but that is a very different thing from hoarding up riches, very likely for our prodigate children to squander, while the cause of God is left to suffer. How easy it is to frame a very plausible excuse whenever urgent call is made to aid in publishing the good news of the kingdom of God. Yes, your claim is a worthy one, and ought to be answered by a liberal donation, but I have no ready cash in hand; my money is all invested in city property and farms; besides, I am paying interest on those investments. I pray thee have me excused. NEWELL BOND.

The monument to John and Charles Wesley has been placed in Westminster Abbey, but it has not yet been unveiled. It stands near the monument to Isaac Watts.

At a fire in Edinburgh the firemen stole jewelry from the burning houses, and got so drunk that many were found, hours afterward, lying in the street. Consequently the brigade is to be reorganized.

A great stir has been made at Nottingham by the new Roman Catholic bishop, Dr. Bagshaw, having done away with the musical beauties of services, and ordered the male portion of his flock to undergo a penitential whipping, by stripping themselves to the waist and striking their flesh so many times with a sort of cat-o'-five-tails.

The Phrenological Journal for April is at hand. We have only room to say that it receives many encomiums of commendation, and it is worthy of them all.

Should any of our readers desire a foreign journal on the great themes of the kingdom of God and eternal life through Christ alone, we would heartily recommend the Rainbow, edited by Dr. William Leask, 34 Sandringham Road Kingsland, London England; or the Bible Echo, by Kellaway & Co., Paternoster Row, London, England. Aside from able editorial articles these journals contain sterling contributions from men distinguished for talent and learning. The March numbers of both have been received.

THE AMERICAN CYCLOPEDIA.

A Comprehensive Library in Itself.

A Great National Enterprise in which every American may Take Pride.

Published by D. APPLETON & CO., 549, 551, Broadway, N. Y.

The Cyclopedia, now in course of publication, is entirely rewritten, and appears with about 4,000 maps and illustrations. To be completed in sixteen volumes of 800 pages each. Fourteen volumes now ready.

In the experience of book making and selling, this work is without a parallel. With the multiplication of steam presses, the publishers are still unable to meet the demand.

The sale has already reached over 200,000 volumes, and this in panic times! The demand for the work is but fairly commenced; the orders are largely multiplying and the indications are that the sales of the work for 1876 will greatly surpass those of the previous year.

Thus the most sanguine expectations of the publishers are more than realized.

The publishers again repeat to the public that no expense has been spared in the written, editing, or publishing departments of the American Cyclopedia.

The cost will be more than $300,000 to prepare the sixteen volumes for the press.

Apostrophe to Death.

O, happy Death! your dart is but the key
Whereby we enter in our Christ to see.
Were there not Death, we should be ever here,
Were there not death, our souls were without cheer,
Were there not death, the bridegroom and the bride—
Christ and his church—would never be allied.
O, blessed Death! for so they shouldst be named,
In presence of the dead be thou not blamed.
For the sweet giving of the needed rest,
That must come to us if we would be blest.
The dead, they are but as the shadow dim,
In the world made by Him that knew not Him.
When into'all that seemed our joy to blot,
Light shone, and darkness comprehended not.
Painters of earth, take counsel, and no more
Let Death stand hideous on a cruel shore;
But paint her softer and with kindlier eyes
Than Helen, or the fairest maid that dies.
So that all may be glad to see her face;
Paint her in smiles, and let her want no grace.
For fair should she seem, who alone can give
Access to Christ, and with Him bid us live.

There! Ain't that a gem? What a pity that such a blessing should be destroyed. That is a fruit of natural immortality, and soul entity in death. Study it well! G. W. STETSON.

EDMBORO, PA.

Landmarks and Keys to Prophetic Interpretation.

BY O. T. HOBBS.

THE COVENANT WITH THE BEAST, AND THE 2,300 DAYS.

"Seventy weeks, (sevens,) are determined upon thy people, (Jews,) and upon thy holy city," (Jerusalem.)

Those seventy weeks are divided into three distinct periods, each distinguished by important national events, all of which are applicable to the Jews and their holy city, as they exist in a national capacity.

The logic of events furnishes us with an undisputed exposition of the seven and sixty and two weeks, at the termination of which Messiah was cut off; and with the cutting off of the Messiah the seventieth week was also necessarily cut off, and could not therefore have its fulfillment until the Jews became a nation under the "covenant confirmed with many for one week," and in the absence of which covenant that week does not begin. This covenant of prophetic notoriety must have a corresponding historic record in the archives of the nations, for without their consent such a covenant would be void; consequently a claim of fulfillment falsifies history and ignores prophecy.

A few days previous to the cutting off of Messiah, he said to the Jews "Behold your house is left unto you desolate;" from which time the Jews could offer no legal sacrifice, for from thence they should be "many days without a king, and without a sacrifice, and without a prince, and without an image, and without teraphim," as it is to-day, but after the many days it is said of them: "Israel hath forgotten his Maker, and buildeth temples," a future event, therefore a place wherein to offer daily sacrifice, and to place "the abomination that maketh desolate;" and a fulfillment of the prediction, "If another shall come in his own name, him will ye receive," and this one who shall come, and whom the Jews will receive as their Messiah, is the antichrist who denieth the Father and the Son, and whose predicted career, under many names and titles, constitutes a principal object of the visions of the seers, and who is recognized in prophecy by his sayings, acts, and investitures, by means of which he is identified with the covenant week, and with the 2,300 days.

In his introductory career he is designated as the "Assyrian," then as the "Prince that shall come," "Prince of the covenant," "Vile person," "King," "Little horn," "King of fierce countenance," "Idol shepherd," "Destroyer of the Gentiles," "Beast," "Man of sin," "Apollyon," and "The Antichrist."

As an "Assyrian," he is the rod of God's anger to punish an hypocritical nation—the Jews—whom he treads in the mire of the streets, and boastingly says: "By the strength of mine hand have I done it, and by my wisdom, for I am prudent, and I have removed the bounds of the people, (division of the Roman empire,) and have robbed their treasures, (Papal Jewish, and Egyptian,) and have put down the inhabitants (of all the earth,) like a valiant man, and my hand hath found as a nest the riches of the people, and as one gathereth eggs have I gathered all the earth, and there was none that moved the wing, or opened the mouth, or peeped;" and it is in his heart to cut off nations not a few."

"He shakes his hand against the mount of the daughter of Zion, the hill of Jerusalem," and then "falls by the hand of a mighty one" when the Lord hath performed his whole work upon Mount Zion and on Jerusalem. If this "Assyrian" has done all that is predicted of his career "in the last end of the indignation," and has fallen by the hand of the mighty one, when in the act of shaking his hand against Jerusalem, thus defying the God of heaven, then the seventieth week has been fulfilled, the Beast has been slain, and the 2,300 days may be year days, not otherwise.

As the "Prince that shall come," he confirms a covenant with many Jews and nations for one week, and this one week is the seventieth in the series seventy, and which is, without controversy, one of the seventy times seventy, which is seven years; and in the midst of the week he (the prince that shall come,) shall cause the daily sacrifice to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate.

As Prince of the covenant, alias vile person, alias the king who does according to his will, arms shall stand on his part, and they shall pollute the sanctuary of strength, and shall take away the daily sacrifice, and shall place the abomination that maketh desolate. The identity, personal, figurative or symbolic, is complete.

Is this sanctuary of strength a pagan sanctuary from which a pagan daily sacrifice was taken away, and out of the way, that the abomination that maketh desolate might be set up under the decree of Justinian, and thus "that man of sin be revealed, sitting in the temple of God—the sanctuary of strength—showing himself that he is God?"

Would the taking away of a pagan daily sacrifice, and placing the greater abomination that maketh desolate in the holy place, where pagan sacrifice was offered, be satisfactory evidence in favor of the year-day system of interpretation?

The "Little horn comes forth, and by him the daily sacrifice was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary cast down." This act of the little horn identifies him with the former actors who performed the same acts.

The little horn is a beast; the beast hath his name Apollyon, and comes from the bottomless pit. The beast rising out of the sea is also from the bottomless pit, and all, by their various names and titles, constitute that man of sin, who is the antichrist, and who will be recognized by his "denying the Father and the Son,"—which has not been done by any dynasty or hierarchy under heaven—and by his "exalting himself above all that is called God or that is worshipped," "sitting in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God."

This temple of God synchronizes with the sanctuary of strength, and I again inquire, is this temple of God a pagan temple? and if so, by what authority did Constantine take away a pagan daily sacrifice that Justinian might decree that the abomination that maketh desolate might be set up in Rome? And why should the inhabitants of Judea flee so instantly to the mountains because of that abomination, of which they had never yet heard?

He is further recognized by the act of taking away the daily sacrifice and placing the abomination of desolation in the midst of the week, by his being revealed, and by his coming after the working of satan. Because he is represented in symbol as having mouth and eyes, and he is the only earthly potentate to whom is imputed direct inspiration and the working of miracles and the distinction of a personal revelation which is from the bottomless pit, did the papal hierarchy come from there?

He is the representative head of the four universal kingdoms, and of the seven kings of Rome, and "he is the eighth and is of the seven;" consequently he could not appear until the seventh king had passed away. He was, is not and yet is. Let "historic echoes of the voice of God in history" apply those things to the papal hierarchy if it can.

He has the number 666. It is the number of his name, the number of a man.

His coming is chronologically identified with the seventieth week, he being the prince of the covenant; and with the 2,300 days, because the days are but a part of the week, and are covered by the week.

He comes when the apostate hierarchy shall be taken out of the way, which is now in process of accomplishment, and "then shall that wicked be revealed."

When he comes he reigns forty and two months. His reign begins in the midst of the week, and ends at the end of the week.

He scatters the power of the holy people, (the Jews,) "in the last end of the indignation," when all things written shall be accomplished. He reigns when the 144,000 are sealed, when the river Euphrates is dried up, when the two witnesses prophecy, and whom he slays twelve days previous to the end of his reign.

He reigns from the time the bottomless pit is opened till the Ancient of days shall come; but when he ascends from the bottomless pit he inaugurates the war of an hour, and a day, and a month, and a year, for to slay the third part of men, and this war terminates only at Armageddon, "in the north country by the river Euphrates, which is dried up because there is no rain on the earth for three years and a half, that the Assyrian kings may pass over. The cavalry alone of that vast army is two hundred millions," and I heard the number of them."

He reigns three years and a half after the angel descends from heaven with the key and the chain, for he can not begin his forty and two months' reign till the bottomless pit is opened, in Eastern Rome, for the star which falls from heaven gets the key from the angel who came down with key and chain.

He reigns when the sixth seal is opened, when the trumpets sound, when the vials are poured out. He reigns after Babylon has fallen, fallen as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah." His army numbers more than all the armies of earth combined. When he reigns there is a great earthquake at Jerusalem, and the cities of the nations fall down.

When the antichrist shall be revealed he will, in all things possible, imitate the true Christ.

Christ will have his servants sealed unto the day of redemption.

Antichrist will have his servants sealed in their foreheads, or in their right hands, unto perdition.

Christ will be seated on his throne at Jerusalem, and before him shall be gathered all nations.

Antichrist will be seated on his throne at Jerusalem, and before him shall be gathered all nations. "Sitting in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God."

Christ will have his herald to announce his coming and kingdom.

Antichrist is already announced as the coming man.

Christ was rejected by his own nation.

Antichrist must be rejected by his own nation. He is a "vile person," to whom they will not give the honors of the kingdom.

Christ takes the kingdom without the consent of the world.

So does antichrist.

Christ will have his kings and priests.

Antichrist will have his kings. "For he saith, Are not my princes altogether kings?" His priest is the false prophet.

Christ will raise the fallen tabernacle of David.

Antichrist will restore it to the Jews first, by covenant.

Christ will destroy his enemies.

The Antichrist will destroy his enemies. His coming is announced by the sound of the trumpet.

"Declare ye in Judea, Let him that is in Judea flee; and publish in Jerusalem, and say, Blow ye the trumpet in the land, and cry, gather together; and say, Assemble yourselves, and let us go into the defended cities. Set up the standard towards Zion; retire, stay not, for I will bring evil upon the North country, and a great destruction."

"The lion is come up from his thicket, and the destroyer of the Gentiles is on his way, he has gone forth from his palace, (Jerusalem,) to make thy land desolate, and thy cities shall be laid waste without inhabitants." "How long shall I see the standard and hear the sound of the trumpet?"

Christ is the Good Shepherd.

Antichrist is an idol shepherd who leaveth the flock" which he covenanted to support.

Christ is King of the Jews.

So will Antichrist be king of the Jews by the covenant.

He is the conspicuous object of every vision of the seers in which he figures, a prodigy and marvel to angels and to men.

As the "Prince that shall come," he is notable for his diplomacy in making a covenant which involved the consent of the nations, for his courage, and audacity, in taking away the daily sacrifice and placing the abomination of desolation, and for the rapidity of his conquests.

He stands conspicuously above his fellows in intellectual cunning in obtaining the kingdom by flatteries, and unrivaled in the annals of history as financier and successful commander-in-chief of earth's grand army of two hundred million of cavalry, ("and I heard the number of them,") and having power over all kindreds and tongues and nations that dwell on the earth, when "there was none that moved the wing, or opened the mouth, or peeped."

This Antichrist king, alias "prince of the covenant," which he confirmed at the beginning of the week, and without which covenant the week can not begin; takes away the daily sacrifice, and places the abomination that maketh desolate in the midst of the week, and falls before the "King of kings" at the end of the week.

He has a "fierce countenance," and "understands dark sentences." He has a mouth, eyes, heart and hands; with his mouth he speaks great swelling words against the Most High. "Opens his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme his name, and his tabernacle, and them that dwell in heaven." He exalts himself above all gods—"above all that is called God or that is worshipped." He gets angry about the covenant which he had made; has it in his heart to destroy nations, goes to Egypt and robs the king of the South, comes back, goes again. He is part of the time in Europe, part in Asia, and part of the time in Africa, but makes Jerusalem his chosen seat of empire. (A movable dynasty is this.)

Christ saw him at Jerusalem when he warned the Judeans to flee to the mountains when they saw him "take away the daily sacrifice, and place the abomination that maketh desolate." "In the Holy Place," the "sanctuary of strength," the "seat of God," Jerusalem.

He obtained the kingdom by flatteries, and loses two kingdoms, both "broken," and he himself broken. But his resources fail him not, for he becomes strong with a reduced people, rubs the Papal Hierarchy, the Jews, and the Egyptians; eats the flesh, and burns with fire the Harlot whose seat is upon many waters, and turns this act of aggression to his own advantage. Charge it is to the Papal Beast! His origin is somewhat in obscurity, but his lineage is plainly revealed.

He has the distinction above all other earthly potentates of prophecy, of a personal "revelation." He comes from the bottomless pit. He slays the "two witnesses," and finally "makes war with the Lamb" with his ten kings, who, at this late period in the world's history, had "received no kingdom as yet," and falls before the King of Kings and Lord of Lords in the Armageddon conflict "in the north country, by the river Euphrates," near Jerusalem, the city of the Great King.

With such a record, we may well understand why Daniel called him a "vile person," Paul "that man of sin," and the revelator a "man," whose number is 666, and which number was given for our benefit, to be understood by the wise at the proper time, which is at the "revelation" of that Man, the number of whose name brands him as "the Antichrist."

The Bible reader having read and analyzed the foregoing, I now invite the attention of all readers to the plain and unequivocal instructions of Daniel the Prophet, in regard to the specific time of the "revelation" of the "Antichrist."

"Shut up the vision." Why? Because "it shall be for many days," a long time before its accomplishment. "For, at the time of the end, shall be the vision, I will make thee know what shall be in the last end of the indignation; For, at the time appointed, the end shall be."

"I am come to make thee understand what shall befall thy people (the Jews) in the latter days, for yet the vision is for many days." "When the transgressions are come to a full." "When he (the Anti-christ) shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people," (the Jews, who have not yet been gathered). "In the latter time of their kingdom," (the four divisions of the Grecian kingdom) which "latter time" is after A. A. 1822, at which time Grecia, which had been "blotted from the list of nations," was restored and is now in her latter time.

"And at that time shall Michael stand up, and then shall be a time of trouble," the "great tribulation" which is caused by the placing the abomination of desolation in the holy place, and by the decree of the false prophet, the cotemporary and associate of the Antichrist, to mark his subjects, that none can buy nor sell save they who have the work of the beast.

I have chronologically identified the beast with the covenant week, with the 2,300 days, with the "last end of the indignation," that his throne is at Jerusalem, and that he is throughout the Scriptures represented as a person, and that earth never witnessed a dynasty to whom the prophecies concerning him can be applied, and now, "How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice and the transgression of desolation to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot?" "And he said unto me unto two thousand three hundred days."

How long is the one week, the seventieth of the seventy? No sophistry can evade the logical sequence, which is one "seven," or one week of years—literally seven years, no more no less. Locate that one week where you will, the fact stands out in bold relief, that it is "in the midst" of that week that the daily sacrifice is taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up.

How long from the "midst of the week" to the end of the week? Just half of seven years—three years and six months. "Forty and two months," "Time, times, and a half," which is 1278 days, the full period of the predicted reign of Antichrist, who falls twelve days before the sanctuary is cleansed.

The mystery of godliness and the mystery of iniquity are matters of revelation. Another mystery intrudes itself for solution. How can any one who reads the Bible misapprehend the important fact revealed, that the 2300 days span, embrace, and cover over the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the abomination that maketh desolate, and that the whole transaction is limited and confined to that one week of seven years?

Therefore, the one week being seven literal years, the covenant being made by the Antichrist at the beginning of that week, the abomination set up in the midst of that week, and the 1290 days reaching but twelve days beyond the "forty and two months," or end of the week, at which time Michael stands up and the resurrection of the dead takes place, demonstrate beyond the possibility of cavil that the 2300 days are literal days, because the week which comes then, is literally seven years, and that "the Antichrist whose whole career is confined within the limits of that week is a 'vile person' a man of sin," a "king of fierce countenance," and a man, the number of whose name is 666, and which may be counted by the wise, when he shall be "revealed" from the bottomless pit.

"Abraham believed God." Do you believe that "from the time the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days" to the cleansing of the sanctuary, the resurrection of the dead, and all the wonders of the vision fulfilled?

If so, do you believe that the "abomination that maketh desolate," was set up at the destruction of Jerusalem, in A. D., 70?

Heaven's arithmetic will test your faith. Take the benefits of the year day system, apply it. To the 1290 days (years) add 70, and according to your landmark the resurrection took place in A. D., 1360! Try the papal "beast?" To the 1290 add 533, and land in A. D., 1823! Do you believe it? If not, why falsify God's words in prophecy, and ground your opinions in the most vain assumptions that Satan ever suggested for your acceptance and delusion?

Here we rest. Upon the testimony of God, angels and inspired men, "from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days," to the cleansing of the sanctuary, the resurrection of the dead and eternal judgment.

Exposition—1. Cor. ii. 9.

Why is it that so much uncertainty and doubt exists concerning the future of the righteous? That there is a future revealed for them is acknowledged by all; but just what that future shall consist of is generally supposed to be very vague and indefinite. Some suppose the future to consist of one interminable Sabbath, where congregations never hear the benediction—what a gloomy thought—one eternal, ceaseless round of singing! Would not such a thing become monotonous? That vocal music will form a part of the grand entertainment is certainly set-forth in the Bible; but that it is to be the unceasing employment of the saints is not the testimony of Bible writers. Others, again, have speculated thus: that the saints will spend millions of years in visiting the distant worlds that compose the great system of the universe. This is certainly an improvement upon the first view, but still far from being satisfactory. Visiting has its pleasures, but they would eventually cease. The grand cause of this indefiniteness may be traced to the wrong application of the following oft-quoted, but little understood, passage: "For eye hath not seen nor ear heard, neither hath entered the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him." But does this mean that God has drawn the curtain between man and his future? Does darkness cover the future with the mantle of gloom? Has no revelation from heaven beamed upon the great hereafter? Surely, the word of God does not warrant such a conclusion!

What, then, is the meaning of the language? Simply this: That man did not reveal to man his glorious future, the incorruptible body, the kingdom of glory, the blessing of the nations, the end of sin, the bright age of glory. That these things have been revealed to man is undoubtedly true; and if man was incapable of imparting the information, how has he received it? This is just what Paul tells us in the next verse: for, after saying, as has been quoted, that man did not reveal these glorious truths, he says: "But God hath revealed them to us by His spirit." This settles the point, and upon this authority we base our hope of immortality—a kingdom and an eternity of active employment in the succeeding ages. J. F. WAGONER.

Correspondence.

Gave twelve lectures at Rock Creek church, closing last night. Weather unfavorable, roads almost impassible, yet attendance and interest good. Two intelligent believers were immersed into the Christ. The "little flock" of faithful ones here, consists of seven members. Quite a large number of persons are searching the Scriptures to see if these things are so, and some are almost persuaded to be Christians, but have not yet obeyed. Brother Skeels first broke up the ground at this place and Bro. J. S. Hatch has labored in this Gospel field. The seed sown by these brethren will, I think, produce much fruit. Bro. C. P. Graham is an untiring worker and valiant soldier in the army of the Lord. A. SANFORD.

DEAR BRETHREN:—It has been a long time since I received a copy of the RESTITUTION, but I am well aware it cannot be published without money and that is pretty hard for us to get away out here on the frontier. Last year's crops were indeed plentiful, but their abundance, while it gives us plenty to eat, also curtails the price of farm products so that the farmer is hardly paid for preparing them for market, and for this cause money is scarcer this year than last. The general health has been very good as compared with Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois, but not so universally healthy as is usual in central Kansas. My ride extends from twelve to twenty miles in each direction from home. Bro. O. H. Barnhill resides two and a half miles south-east from me. He has a beautiful home with about forty acres of improvement, I believe. They are all in good health, and are doing pretty well I think. I should dearly love to meet with the brethren and sisters in Plymouth, and Antioch, once more, and join with them in joyful praises to the glory of our God. The only sermonizing I hear from time to time, is the same old song we always hear from the sects, but thus far they have eluded and evaded my every attempt to storm their strongholds. A few days since I gave into a leading Baptist minister's hand, the following written denials of what he has been teaching, through one of his members: 1. I deny that the Scriptures of Divine truth teach that man is possessed of an immortal soul or spirit. 2. I deny that the Scriptures teach "a home in heaven, at death," as the reward of the righteous. 3. I deny that the Scriptures teach endless torment in a burning hell as the punishment of the wicked. I do not know what disposal he will make of them. He will, it is thought, be compelled by the popular voice to affirm them. I send you some manuscript; if you publish it, please send me a copy with the price and I will try to forward it to you. I remain as ever, your brother in the hope of the Gospel.

We are alone in the faith here, and have no preaching but the RESTITUTION, which is a welcome visitor. We are surrounded with Infidels and Spiritualists, which makes it rather lonely. I love to read the paper and hear from many of the friends, and wish I could write so as to be interesting, and you would then often hear from me. Your sister in hope of a resurrection to everlasting life.

Advantages of Plain Attire at Church.

1. It would lessen the burdens of many who find it hard to maintain their place in society.

2. It would lessen the force of the temptations which often lead men to barter honor and honesty for display.

3. If there was less strife in dress at church, people in moderate circumstances would be more inclined to attend.

4. Universal moderation in dress at church would improve the worship by the removal of many wandering thoughts.

5. It would enable all classes of people to attend church better in unfavorable weather.

6. It would lessen, on the part of the rich, the temptation to vanity.

7. It would lessen, on the part of the poor, the temptation to be envious and malicious.

8. It would save valuable time on the Sabbath.

9. It would relieve our minds from a serious pressure, and thus enable us to do more for good enterprises.

HOW TO ADDRESS LETTERS.

All business letters, or communications must be addressed as follows:—

THE RESTITUTION,
Plymouth, Indiana.

Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the Restoration of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with him in the government of the nations; the resurrection of the literal body of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous; and the final destruction of the wicked: eternal life only through Christ. And many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Communications.—The Editor must not be understood as endorsing all the sentiments expressed by correspondents whose articles are inserted under this head. Each writer is alone responsible for the article bearing his own signature. If the teaching of any writer is not understood, an article setting forth the views of the party differing may be forwarded. Free discussion of Bible doctrines on all sides will be allowed, but the Editor reserves the privilege of criticising those communications which antagonize a belief and obedience of the Gospel as terms of salvation, or which undermine its principles.

Ancient Plan of the Tabernacle.

The Samaritans, "the smallest and the oldest sect in the world," are now reduced to 120 persons, all of whom reside in Nablus. The aged priest Amram, mentioned favorably by Wilson, Dean Stanley, and Mills, has lately been deposed from his office in consequence of an intrigue conducted by his nephew and successor, Yacoub. The latter is about twenty-five or thirty years of age, with remarkably handsome and finely chiseled features, but with a sinister, unpleasant expression. He professes to be able to trace his pedigree in an unbroken line from Aaron. The account he gives of his ancestry is that, down to the time of Nehemiah, the high priesthood continued in an unbroken line, but that then "one of the sons of Joiada, the son of Eliashib, the high priest," having married the daughter of Sanballat, the governor of Samaria (Nehemiah xiii. 28), refused to put her away when required to do so. Hereupon a schism took place, and from this point his genealogy follows a different line to that of the high priest of Jerusalem. He said that a genealogical table, laid up with the copies of the law in the holy place of the synagogue, gave all the generations of this pedigree, and that it recorded the most memorable events that happened in the period of each high priest. He declared that amongst these memorabilia was one recording that "a prophet named Jesus had appeared at Jerusalem, but that the priests there, with their usual wickedness and malignity, had put him to death out of envy." If such a contemporary record does indeed exist, it would be a document of extraordinary interest and value. He adhered to this statement notwithstanding my strongly expressed incredulity, and promised to send me extracts from the original roll. These, however, I have not received. The bad character for untruthfulness which the Samaritans bear excites suspicion, but it is difficult to see what he could hope to gain by deceiving me.

The synagogue of the Samaritans is a small secluded edifice, entered through a walled garden, out of which an enclosed court conducts into the building itself. It is only thirty-seven feet and a few inches in length, and perhaps twenty feet in breadth; the walls are whitewashed and the floor covered with matting. A space is railed off for the holy place, in a recess of which the volumes of the law are kept. We were of course anxious to see the famous copy of the Pentateuch, declared to have been written by "Abishua, the great-grandson of Aaron, at the door of the Tabernacle in the thirteenth year of the settlement of the children of Israel" in the Holy Land. Though this is recorded in the body of the manuscript itself, the statement is discredited, and contradictory opinions are entertained amongst scholars as to its actual date, some ascribing to it a most venerable antiquity, and others insisting that it is comparatively modern.

Having taken off our shoes at the entrance, Yacoub locked the door, so that none of his co-religionists might enter, and took out from the recess a roll of the law which he declared to be the one we desired to see. According to his usual custom, however, he was endeavoring to palm off upon us a duplicate instead of the original. He persisted to the last in the assertion that this duplicate was the one shown to the Prince of Wales and his party in 1853, and there seems reason to believe that this was really the case. The fraud being detected, he, after much hesitation, and a promise of liberal backshish produced the genuine manuscript. It is wrapped in a cover of red satin embroidered with gold, and enclosed in a cylinder of silver which opens on hinges.

Mr. Mills, who resided three months in Nablus in order to acquaint himself thoroughly with the Samaritans, says of it: "The roll itself is of what we should call parchment, but of a material much older than that, written in columns twelve inches deep and seven and a half inches wide. The writing is in a fair hand, but not nearly so large or beautiful as the book copies which I had previously examined. The writing being rather small, each column contains from seventy to seventy-two lines. The name of the scribe is written in a kind of acrostic, and forms part of the text, running through three columns, and is found in the Book of Deuteronomy. Whether it be the real work of the great-grandson of Aaron, as indicated in the writing, I leave the reader to judge; the roll, at all events, has all the appearance of a very rich antiquity, and is wonderfully well preserved, considering its venerable age."

One of the halves of the metal cylinder is very curious, and deserves more attention than it has received at the hands of the Biblical archæologists. It is of silver, about two feet six inches long by ten or twelve inches in diameter, and is covered with embossed work with a descriptive legend attached to each portion. I procured a rubbing from Yacoub, and on my return to England found that it had been photographed by the Palestine Exploration Fund. Yacoub said that it was a plan of the temple and its furniture; on examination, however, it proves to be the Tabernacle of the Wilderness. Mr. Van Straalen, curator of Hebrew manuscripts in the British Museum, has been good enough to examine it for me, and reports that the letters are Samaritan, not later than the fourth century, and probably older. Some of the lettering he has been unable to decipher.

On the outer rim are a series of numbers running from one to sixty. These probably refer to the posts, which appear to have been numbered so as to avoid confusion and delay in the erection of the Tabernacle on its arrival at the camping-ground. The instructions given to Moses "in the Mount," were that there should be twenty boards on each side but at the corners were to be two boards additional. At the end, behind the most holy place, were to be six boards. Nothing is said about the entrance, which apparently was to be left open (Exodus xxvi. 18–25). Posts, however, would be needed to sustain the framework with its covering. This would give 24 + 24, + 6 + 6 = 60, the number shown in the plan.

We then find the names of the twelve tribes. These are placed not according to patriarchal seniority or tribal precedence, but in the order of the encampment and march, as given in the Book of Numbers. Judah, Issachar, and Zebulon are on one side. These tribes formed the vanguard of the army, and were followed on the march by the Tabernacle itself. Then come Reuben, Simeon, and Gad. As soon as they "set forward" they were followed by the ark, which was thus in the midst of the people whether marching or camping. Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin come next; then Dan, Asher, and Naphtali bring up the rear (Numbers ii, x. 11–27.)

In the Holiest of Holies we find the ark, with its crown or rim of beaten gold, upon which are the cherubim kneeling face to face, whilst their wings, projecting behind them, overshadow the mercy-seat (Exodus xxv. 10–22). On one side of the ark is the staff of Moses, on the other that of Aaron. The veil hangs down in front, concealing the mysterious recess. Immediately in front of the veil are the stations of the Levites. The altar of incense comes next, and then the table of shewbread with the candlestick "over against the table, on the side of the tabernacle, southward" (Exodus ix. 22–25). The spoons, bowls, and covers are marked in the plan indicated by Means near the table (Exodus xxv. 29; xxxvii. 16). The entrance from the outer court was as the Talmud describes it, not in the center, but on the right-hand side.

The laver stands at "the door of the tabernacle of the congregation," that the priests might wash as they entered into the holy place (Exodus xl. 12, 30). Near it is the altar of burnt offering, with its "brazen grate of network of brass" (Exodus xxvii. 4–8). This grating or network has been the subject of much controversy amongst Biblical critics. The representation here given favors the view of those who suppose it to have been an inclined plane leading up to the altar. The censer is placed immediately over against the altar of burnt offering, that the priests might take the coals from the sacrifice, and therewith offer the incense of thanks giving (Rev. xviii. 3). The flesh-hooks, forks, knives, pans, and basins, are represented as arranged around the altar (Exodus xxvii. 3). The trumpets at the entrance are peculiar in form, and may throw some light upon a question much debated amongst students of the Talmud as to the shape of one which appears to have been bent in the manner represented.

The date and true value of this curious relic of antiquity are as yet doubtful. Subsequent investigations may throw light upon its origin. The few survivors of the Samaritans are now rent asunder by intestine feuds. Apparently, they will speedily cease to exist altogether. Their synagogue rolls will then, probably, come into the hands of Europeans, and receive a more careful and thorough examination than has been hitherto possible.

Prayer.

Does God hear the prayer of sinners?

This pertinent question is asked by a writer in a recent number of THE RESTITUTION. He proceeds to quote Scripture, which to his own mind, proves the negative.

I agree with the brother that the subject "is worthy of careful study, and reflection." Neither have I any favor with the popular religion getting. I also agree with him, as to the only way of getting into the Christ. Yet I do not agree with him on the subject of prayer. And I will endeavor to show that the Scriptures do not bear him out in his conclusion. One of the principal texts relied on to prove the negative of the question at the head of this article, is found in the John ix. 31.—"Now we know that God heareth not sinners. These words are found in the Bible. It is also recorded in the same book, concerning many of them, Jesus said, "He hath a devil."—John x. 20. Many Jews made this affirmation while one Jew uttered the former words. They each spoke their minds, doubtless. We have no more evidence that the former were inspired than the latter. But before I proceed, I will notice two other texts that are adduced as proof of the negative.

"If I regard iniquity in my heart the Lord will not hear me."—Psa. xvi. 18. "The Lord is far from the wicked, but He shall hear the righteous."—Prov. xv. 29. I fail to see any force or weight in either of these texts, in favor of the negative of the question. No one who believes in the omnipresence of Jehovah, will for one moment suppose that the prayer of a sinner, or any one else, who regarded iniquity in his heart, would be receivable to god. Such a petition could find expression only with a wicked person. But to my mind it is evident that there is a distinction made in the Bible, between a sinner and a wicked person. David says, "I have not wickedly departed from my God."—2 Sam. xxii. 22. And this was near the close of his life. He also acknowledges his sin repeatedly. See 2 Sam. xii. 13; xxiv. 17.

I will now offer a few testimonials that seem to favor the affirmative of the question under consideration. When the Lord pronounced the sentence on Cain for killing his brother, Cain made a short and plaintive petition to the Almighty, desiring mitigation in the punishment; his prayer was heard, and he received a direct and favorable answer. Gen. 4. 11—15. David also when he had committed the sin that he confessed to Nathan the prophet, the penalty of which was death under the law. Lev. xx. 10, he was also under his own sentence of death. 2 Sam. xii. 5. but his confession was answered by a revocation of the sentence. 1 Sam. xii. 13. And again Judah Rex in captivity for their numerous sins, God speaks to them through his servant Jeremiah; in these words "Seek the peace of the city whither I have caused you to be carried away captives, and pray unto the Lord for it." They were exhorted to "call upon the Lord"—"and pray" unto him and he says "I will hearken." Jer. xxix: 7—12. Here sinners are encouraged to pray for themselves, and also for other sinners with a promise that God would hear them.

If the words of the prophet Jeremiah were inspired, then the words of the Jew, whose sight was restored, were not, because they do not agree.

Jesus, the representative of the Father, was always attentive to the prayer of sinners. The petition of the Roman officer who came to Jesus in behalf of his sick servant, received a direct answer: "I will come and heal him."—Mat. viii. 5–8. Also, the Canaanitish woman who came to him for help, was not turned away empty, but received a gracious answer to her prayer. Mat. xxii. 28. And the thief on the cross, who confessed that he was "justly condemned," in answer to his prayer received an answer of peace from the compassionate Savior. Luke xxiii. 42–43.

From the foregoing testimonials it appears evident that there is an abundance of encouragement in God's word for sinners to pray for themselves.

Another question seems to be involved in this, which is, are Christians required, or encouraged to pray for sinners? In Mat. v. 44, it is recorded the Divine teacher commanded His disciples to "pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you." I think we should not hesitate to regard those as sinners who should treat us in such a way.

And the beloved disciple writes, "If we ask anything according to His will He heareth us."—1 John v. 14. And St. Paul settles the question as to what God's will is, concerning "all men." He exhorts the church that "supplications, prayers, intercessions, * * * be made for all men, * * * for this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Savior, who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth."—1 Tim. ii. 4. Now, my confidence in God is such that I believe He is able to accomplish all His will, and nothing is too hard for the Lord. And although death may intervene between the birth of the sinner, and His "coming to the knowledge of the truth," it cannot prevent the accomplishment of the will of the Almighty, for it will require no more Divine energy to raise a dead sinner than it will to raise a saint.

Paul's prayer for Israel was that they might be saved. He very well knew that they could not be saved in their blindness, consequently he must have had faith in God that He would remove their blindness, as He had his.

So there is to-day a "groaning creation" which has a claim on our sympathy and prayers; and if Christians were more imbued with the Spirit that Jesus manifested, and could we but divest ourselves of all our "filthy rags" of "self-righteousness," we should find more time, and disposition to pray for sinners, even those "which despitefully use us, and persecute us," and doubtless some of us might meet some of that class who claim to be of the "household of faith."

I submit the above to the readers of THE RESTITUTION as an argument in favor of the affirmative of this question.

Exposition of Deut. xxxiii. 2.

A RESTITUTION correspondent is desirous of an explanation of the verse above named, which reads as follows:

"And he said the Lord came from Sinai, and rose up from Seir unto them; he shined forth from Paran and he came with ten thousands of his saints: from his right hand went a fiery law for them."

Some people consider this prophetic, and refer it to a future event when Christ will move with His redeemed saints from old Mt. Sinai over to Jerusalem, after His second advent. This seems to be a very crude notion, and unsupported by any Bible authority. It is quite easy to build up a theory if such interpretations of the Divine Word are allowed. Accepting the landbody cannot live is called both "Spirit and breath. That which God gave is called breath of life, life and breath, and Spirit or breath. Without this breath or Spirit, the body is dead. Then that by which we live is what God gave. It is the breath or the Spirit of life. When we die, this breath or Spirit of life returns to God who gave it. That which returns to God who gave it, is also called by different words. That which went to God in the flood, is called the breath of life, and in the margin the breath of the Spirit of life. In Job xxvii. 3, it is called, 'my breath, and the Spirit of God in my nostrils." In xxxiv. 14, it is called "His Spirit and His breath." In Psa. civ. 29, "God takes away their breath." In Psa. cxlvi. 4, that which goes to God is called "breath." In Eccl. iii. 19–21, where it is said man and beast die alike, that which goes to God is called breath once, and Spirit twice. In our text, that which goes to God is called Spirit. In the above, that which returns to God who gave it is called breath, and breath of life six times, and it is called Spirit, Spirit of life, Spirit of God in my nostrils, six times, but the sense is the same. The same original word is sometimes translated breath, and sometimes Spirit. The breath or the Spirit of life by which man lives is all that God gave—the breath or the Spirit of life is all that returns to God when he dies. In all such passages, the word Spirit means the breath or the Spirit of life.

7. This Spirit is not the responsible man.—When the breath of life in Adam returned to God, he died. When, in the time of the flood, the breath of the Spirit of life of all flesh returned to God who gave it, all flesh in whose nostrils was the breath of the Spirit of life, died. When God takes away the breath of all flesh, they die and return to dust. When man's breath goeth forth to God, he returneth to his earth, in that very day his thoughts perish. When the breath or Spirit of man and of beast returns to God who gave it, they will all die alike, they are all of dust, and they will all return to dust again. When the Spirit of all flesh returns to God who gave it, then the dust will return to the earth as it was. Stephen said, "Lord Jesus, receive my Spirit," but Stephen fell asleep, and devout men carried him to his burial. The Savior said, "into thy hand I commit my Spirit," but he died, and was buried in Joseph's new tomb. David said, "into thy hand I commend my Spirit," but Peter said, "David is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us to this day. He is not ascended into the heavens." Thus, in no case is the Spirit that goes to God, the man. In no case did the man ascend to heaven when his Spirit returned to God. But in every case the man, who was made of dust, and who is dust returned to dust again.

8. This Spirit is not alive, or intelligent, or responsible.—The Spirit is the means by which we live, but it is not itself alive. It is the means by which we become intelligent, but the Spirit has no intelligence. It is the means by which we become responsible, but the Spirit has no responsibility. It is not affirmed any where in the Bible, that the Spirit of which we are speaking, is either alive, or intelligent, or responsible. It is not subject to moral law. It has no promises, it has no threatenings. It is neither praiseworthy nor blameworthy. It is to the man what steam is to the engine. But it has no possible influence in determining the character of what we do. It gives us power, but it has nothing to do in directing that power.

The breath or the Spirit of life which God gave us, came out of God's great reservoir of the breath or the Spirit of life which he prepared, to give life to the animal and vegetable world. When we die, this breath or Spirit returns to God in His great reservoir of His breath of life, as it was before.

As the Spirit had no personal identity before it was given to us, it will have none when it returns to God. As the Spirit had no intelligence before it was given to us, it will have none when it returns to God. As the Spirit had no responsibility before it was given to us, it will have none when it returns to God. For it is said "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it, as it was."

What is it to Restore the Earth?

Why speak of restoring the earth to more than its Eden state? as I have just noticed your correspondent, Bro. G. W. Stetson, do; and not him only—it is a quite common expression. I suggest that it is an impossibility. If the earth is hereafter to be made either better or more beautiful than it was made at creation, it is not in its restitution. Restoring can only bring a thing back to its former good condition. If the earth is to be advanced beyond its primeval condition some other word must be found to tell it; some word not so applied in the Bible. If the earth was not in every way most perfectly adapted to promote the highest well-being of the race for whose abode it was made, then God's work was imperfect. To suppose this, impeaches either his wisdom, his benevolence, or his power. Then, if in its primeval state it was best adapted to the welfare of the race, why suppose it is to be brought to a different state? But, it is argued, that that condition was for the race while mortal, but they are to become immortal, when the earth must be proportionately changed.

I reply that this is all assumption. Adam was not encouraged that he and his should become immortal if obedient; and, aside from the saints—"the seed of Abraham," who are taken from the race as the restorers of the race—no promise of immortality is found. To the contrary, clear down beyond the restitution, when there shall "be no more death, sorrow, or crying, and no more curse," we find the same provision for prolonging life that was originally provided, viz.: access to the tree of life. No; restore in the word, and that, taken in its strict sense, tells God's purpose concerning the world. When the race, through the instrumentality of the "seed of Abraham" made immortal, shall be restored to original loyalty; the beasts to their primeval docility; the earth to its uncursed fertility, and the tree of life to its former position upon the earth, so that the loyal race may freely eat of it and live forever, God's purpose will have been reached, and all things will be again "very good."

Baptism into the Name.

DEAR RESTITUTION:—I have not complied to the rite of baptism, and before doing so, I would like to see my way more clearly. I am not able to see why all sects, as far as I know, baptize in the name of the Father, and the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, when there is so much Scripture standing in direct opposition.

Matt. xxviii. 19, in my mind stands in undoubted contrariety to Acts ii. 38. Peter commanded them upon whom the Holy Ghost fell, at the house of Cornelius, to be baptized in the name of the Lord. I understand that to be in the name of Jesus Christ. For Paul to the Colossians says: "As ye have therefore received Christ Jesus, the Lord, so walk ye in him: Rooted and built up in him, and stablished in the faith, as ye have been taught, abounding therein with thanksgiving. For in him (Christ) dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead, bodily." The performance of baptism is the doing of something which we are commanded to do; and Paul tells the Colossians, iii. 17, "And whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God, and the Father by him.

Will one of your contributors, through your valuable paper, or by private correspondence, relieve me of this dilemma? JNO. A. HUGHES.

THE RESTITUTION

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT

☞ It appears from certain letters sent to us, that some good folks really think that if they take the RESTITUTION they must believe all that is published in it. Queer logic! We publish a good many things in the paper which we do not believe but we claim to let all, who take the Bible as their guide, have a breathing place. Of course we cannot publish every wild fancy that extremists teach. Good, sensible articles, if not too long, are always welcome.

☞ We have received a copy of Bro. Wiley Jones' catechism, and have given it a hasty looking over. Brother Jones has said a great many good things, and things that will bear the scrutiny of the Judge, because they are in the words of Him who is the Way, the Truth and Life. We do not like the word catechism any more than we do the word dogmatism. Bro. Jones fails, it seems to us, to comprehend the fact that his little catechism is a little creed, and will, if believed, insure eternal life to its believer. We should terribly dread to hold that little book in our hand as our password to the golden city. In short we don't believe he has made a perfect creed.
